The History of Athens, from the Achæan league to the present time.

TH E Athenians, having recovered their antient liberty by means of the brave Aratus, in the manner we have related elsewhere <sup>h</sup>, were soon obliged to implore the assistance of a more powerful protector, to maintain their freedom against Philip of Macedon, a prince, who seemed to have inherited the ambition of the first Philip, and the bravery of Alexander. This warlike monarch had formed a design of subjecting all Greece, and afterwards extending his conquests into Italy. In prosecution of this scheme, he made use of the following pretence to carry the war into Attica. Two young Acarnianians, who happened to be at Athens while the inhabitants were celebrating the myteries of Ceres (Z), had entered the temple of the goddess with the crowd. As it was not lawful for any person to assist at

(Z) the festival of Ceres was the most celebrated and mysterious solemnity of any in Greece, whence it is often called by way of eminence the mysteries. The Sicilians claimed the glory of having first instituted this solemn worship, pretending, that they had been instructed by Ceres herself in the secret ceremonies, which were performed on this occasion. This goddess, according to the tradition of the country, taught them the art of cultivating the earth, and united them in societies to live under the influence of the wise laws which she had given them. Whence twice a year they renewed the remembrance of these signal benefits, worshipping alternately the mother and her daughter Proserpine; the former in the first seed-time, and the latter in the harvest. After the example of the Sicilians the inhabitants of Attica, who had been likewise enriched with the gifts of Ceres, signalized their gratitude to this goddess, by instituting three festivals in her honour.

Of these the first was called Proerosia, because it preceded the ploughing-time and the seed-time. On this occasion the Athenians, who celebrated this festival in the name of all the Greeks, offered a great many victims in hopes of obtaining a plentiful harvest.

The second festival was called Thesmophoria, this word alluding to the worship which was paid Ceres as a law-giver. Plutarch, Diodorus Siculus, and after them Theodoret, tell us, that the same ceremonies were performed on this occasion in honour of Ceres, as were practised by the Egyptians in the mysteries of Isis. The celebration of this festival lasted five days, and each day the women of the ten tribes, of which the republic of Athens consisted, chose one from among themselves to preside over the ceremonies that were practised at this solemnity. The victims were offered by a priest, who officiated with a crown on his head; whence he was called Stephanophoros. Such women, as had had three talents to their portion, were intitled to demand of their husbands the necessary sums for the expences of the sacrifices; every one being obliged to contribute to them according to their ability.

All the women that were to assist at the ceremonies being assembled in one place, they went in procession from Athens to Eleusis, a small city in that neighbourhood, singing hymns in honour of the goddess, and carrying the books, which contained the secret mysteries of the solemnity, and the laws, for which Attica was indebted to Ceres. But this depositum was intrusted with such only as were of an unblemished character and famous for their virtue. A certain number of young women were brought up at the expence of the public, and with all imaginable care in order to be employed in this office and in the other ceremonies performed at Eleusis. These were always kept confined in the Thesmophorion, a public building in Athens appropriated for that use, and narrowly watched by persons set over them to guard their virtue. However, when they arrived at

at those mysteries, without being initiated, the Acaruanians, who had not been admitted with the usual ceremonies, being discovered at Eleusis, they prepared themselves for the offices of their priesthood, by passing a whole day, at the feet of the statue of Ceres, in fasting and prayer. This severity ended in a kind of comedy ; for as Ceres had laughed at the sight of an old woman, who insulted her, so the young virgins endeavoured by innocent jokes to stir up one another to laughter. The following days were spent in lustrations and sacrifices, from which the men were not excluded ; even the prisoners, who were initiated in the mysteries of Ceres, and not yet convicted of any crime, were indulged their liberty during the five days of the solemnity, that they might join in those religious practices.

The third festival instituted in honour of Ceres was deemed the most holy and solemn, being called the mysteries. It is said by some to have been instituted by Ceres herself, after having supplied the Athenians with corn in a time of famine ; others ascribe the institution of it to king Erechon, and some to Musæus the father of Eumolpus, or to Eumolpus himself. The temple of Eleusis was the place where all those met who were admitted to these mysterious ceremonies ; and thither the Greeks flocked from all parts about the month of August, the temple, as Strabo informs us, being capable of holding an immense multitude. None were admitted to celebrate the great mysteries, till they had been purified at the lesser, which were used as a preparative for the greater. The manner of the purification was as follows : After having kept themselves chaste and unpolluted nine days, they offered sacrifices and prayers with crowns and garlands on their heads, and the skin of a victim sacrificed to Jupiter under their feet. About a year after, having sacrificed a sow to Ceres, they were admitted to the greater mysteries, but not suffered to enter the sanctuary till five years after, assisting in the mean time at the sacred ceremonies, only in the porch of the temple. When the years of probation were expired, the secret rites, some few excepted which were reserved for the priests alone, were frankly revealed to them ; whence they changed the name of Mystai, that is, persons initiated, for that of Epoptai, or eye-witnesses. The manner of the initiation was thus : the candidates were admitted by night into the temple, wearing crowns of myrtle on their heads. At their entering the sacred place, they purified themselves by washing their hands in holy water ; and at the same time were told, that the external cleanness of the body would not be accepted by the deity of the place, unless attended by the internal cleanness of an undefiled mind. After this the holy mysteries were read to them, the priest, who initiated them, having first asked them, whether they had performed all the conditions religion required. To these questions they returned answers in a set form, and then were led by the priest into the most holy discovered by their language to be strangers, were carried before the chief priest, and by him sentenced to die, though in part of the temple, a place of darkness and horror. Then all on a sudden a strong light darted in upon them, and discovered a statue of Ceres richly adorned, and a very indecent figure called Myllos. The light soon disappeared, and then a terrible noise was heard like thunder ; fire fell down like lightning, and dreadful monsters appeared, which by the glimmering light of continual flashes of fire struck the trembling spectators with great terror. Neither could they recover themselves from their fright, till they were shewn an agreeable meadow, which was walled in behind the temple. Lastly, the priest, who attended at the initiation, and was therefore called Hierophantes, or revealer of holy things, took his leave of the initiated, with exhorting them to the practice of virtue. The Hierophantes was by birth an Athenian, and of the family of the Eumolpidae. As he was the chief priest, and held his office for life, he was obliged to perpetual chastity, and forbidden even lustful desires. His name was so venerable, that it was not even mentioned in the presence of the profane, that is, of such as were not initiated. He had three assistants, the first of which was called from his office Daduchos, or torch-bearer ; the second was stiled the sacred herald ; and it was his province to forbid on pain of death such as were not initiated, or were conscious of any crime, to enter the temple ; the third ministered at the altar, imploring the protection of the gods. The superintendant over these mysteries was stiled king ; and it was his duty to offer prayers and sacrifices, to see that no indecency or irregularity was committed, and, after the celebration of the mysteries, to assemble the senate, he being one of the archons, and to take cognizance of all offenders in this kind. The king had four assistants under him called Epimeletai, who were elected by the people, one out of the family of the Eumolpidae, another out of the Cryces, and the remaining two out of the families of other citizens.

This festival began on the fifteenth, and ended on the twenty third day of the month Boedromion ; during which time it was unlawful to arrest any person, or present any petition, and those who were found guilty of such practices, were, according to some fined a thousand drachmas, and according to others put to death. If any woman rode to Eleusis in a chariot, she was obliged to pay six thousand drachmas. The end of this law, which was enacted by Lycurgus, was to prevent all odious distinctions between the rich and the poor.

The different shews, with which the spectators were entertained each day of the feast, were symbolical representations of the travels of Ceres, and the chief incidents of her life. In this consisted the external pomp of the festival. The rest was an impenetrable mystery, which the Hierophantes discovered only to the initiated, after

was well known that they had offended purely out of ignorance. The Acarnanian nation resented this inhuman sentence, and made bitter complaints of it to the king of Macedon, with whom they after having bound them to inviolable secrecy by the most dreadful oaths. Whoever was convicted of divulging these mysteries, or any part of them, became the public curse of the people, was excluded all civil society, and avoided even by his nearest relations, who were afraid to live with him under the same roof. But the ordinary punishment for such a crime was immediate death. If any person, not lawfully initiated, did but, through ignorance or mistake, chance to be present at the mysterious rites, he was put to death. Persons of both sexes and all ages were initiated, the neglect of this ceremony being looked upon as a crime of a very heinous nature; insomuch, that it was one of the chief articles of impeachment against Socrates. However, such as were convicted of any crime, or had even involuntarily committed murder, were debarred from these mysteries.

If the testimony of profane authors may be admitted, these assemblies were schools of virtue and purity. Tully gives a very favourable account of them, saying, that men were there taught the art of living well, and confirmed in the hopes of a better life (11). Other writers call those initiations a more strict engagement than ordinary to live according to the laws of equity, as they were dictated by the goddesses. On the other hand, the fathers of the church tell us, that the Pagans under the venerable names of mysteries consecrated prostitutions, and other more heinous crimes, and call the assemblies of Ceres schools of abominations and debaucheries. Perhaps these ceremonies were at first such as the profane writers represent them to have been, but afterwards came by degrees to degenerate into libertinism and licentiousness, which gave the fathers occasion to exclaim against them. They were celebrated by the Athenians every fifth year at Eleusis, and from thence translated to Rome by the emperor Adrian, and never totally abolished till the reign of Theodosius the elder.

This is the general account which the antients have given us of the mysteries of Ceres. The respect, with which they were prepossessed in favour of these mysteries, did not permit them to be more particular.

The Ceres of the Greeks was, according to Sir (12) Isaac Newton, a woman of Sicily, who came into Attica, and taught Triptolemus, the son of Celeus king of Eleusis, to sow corn, about the thirtieth year of king David's reign, or the year before Christ 1030; she died, and was deified for this benefaction about the year before Christ 1007, by Celeus and Eumolpus, who instituted the Eleusina sacra, with Egyptian ceremonies, and erected a sepulchre or temple to her in Eleusis.

(11) Cic. de leg. l. ii. (12) Chronol. p. 15, 17, 18, 14—136.
were

were then joined in alliance. Philip, without demanding any satisfaction, proclaimed war against Athens, and sent a body of troops to join the Acarnanians and lay waste Attica. Achaia, Lacedæmon, and Corinth had entered into an alliance with Philip; and Athens was no-ways in a condition to make head against so many enemies at once. She resolved therefore to have recourse to Rome, and by a solemn embassy implore the protection of that powerful republic. The Romans were already well known at Athens, and had been honoured there many years before with particular marks of distinction. In the consulship of Sp. Carvilius and Q. Fabius Verrucosius, thirty two years before the æra we are now speaking of, Rome had sent ambassadors to Athens, and several other free states of Greece, to make them sensible of the happiness which she had procured them by humbling the Illyrians, who with frequent piracies infested their coasts. The year before Cn. Fulvius Centumalus had forced the Illyrians to submit to a peace upon very hard conditions; one of which was, that they should not suffer above three of their ships of war at a time to sail beyond the city of Lyssus, which stood on the confines of Illyricum and Macedon, near the mouth of the river Drilon. This article was so agreeable to the Athenians, that they not only received the ambassadors with great demonstrations of kindness, but from that time admitted the Romans in general to partake of the mysteries of Eleusis (A), and of all the privileges which the citizens of Athens enjoyed. They did not therefore doubt in the least but their ambassadors would meet with a favourable reception, and obtain speedy succours against an enemy, whose views could not be unknown at Rome. Neither were they disappointed in their expectation; their ambassadors were treated with great distinction, and assured, that a consular army should be sent without delay to their assistance<sup>1</sup>.

The Athenians enter into an alliance with At-talus and the Rhodi-ans against Philip.

IN the mean time the Macedonians and Acarnanians, after having ravaged great part of Attica, were drawing near to the

(A) In the primitive times, the Athenians excluded from the mysteries of Ceres all strangers, that is, all that were not members of their own common-wealth. Hence, when Hercules, Castor, and Pollux desired to be initiated they were first made citizens of Athens (13). In process of time they admitted all persons, barbarians excepted, and at length these also, the Romans having been the first among the barbarians, as the Greeks called all other nations, who enjoyed this honour.

capital. Their approach struck the citizens with no small terror ; but their fears were soon dispelled by the unexpected arrival of the fleets of king Attalus and the Rhodians. These two powers were already at war with the king of Macedon, and therefore no sooner heard, that hostilities were begun between the Macedonians and Athenians, but they hastened to Athens, with a design to engage that republic in their alliance, and protect their territories from the insults of Philip. All the city went out to meet them, and among the rest the priests in their religious habits, as if the gods themselves had come to the relief of the city. The people assembled in the market-place to conclude the alliance, and expected that Attalus would come thither in person. But the king thought it more suitable to his dignity to treat with them by messengers, than by word of mouth ; and was also willing to decline the acclamations and flatteries of a people, who were too lavish of their praises. In a letter, which he wrote to the magistrates, he gave them a particular account of his exploits against Philip, and the good offices he had done the republic, expressly mentioning four ships, which he had very lately taken from the Macedonians, and restored to Athens. He concluded with exhorting them to take advantage of the succours which both he and the Rhodians now offered them. The league was concluded, and the Athenians, in their transports of joy paid extravagant compliments to the king and the Rhodians. To their ten tribes, each of which bore the name of one of their heroes, they added an eleventh, calling it Attalis in honour of king Attalus (B). As to the Rhodians, they presented them with a crown of gold, and made all the inha-

(B) The number of tribes, of the which the republic of Athens consisted, was not always the same, but varied as the number of the citizens increased. At first they were but four in all ; soon after they were six ; in the times of Æschines and Demosthenes they were increased to ten. In after ages the Athenians erected three more, viz. the tribes Ptolemæis, Attalis, and Adrianis, in honour of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, of king Attalus, and of the emperor Adrian. The ten first tribes took their names from ten Attic heroes ; these were Acamas the son of Theseus, Ajax the son of Telamon, Cecrops the founder and first king of Athens, Ægeus the ninth king of Athens and the father of Theseus, Erechtheus the sixth king of Athens, Hippothoon the son of Neptune, Leo, who sacrificed his daughters for the welfare of his country, Oereus the son of Pandion the fifth king of Athens, and Antiochus the son of Hercules.

bitants of Rhodes free of Athens <sup>k</sup>. The king of Pergamus and the Rhodians, better pleased with the treaty than the shouts of the people, returned on board their ships and set sail, the king for Ægina, where his fleet waited for him, and the Rhodians for their own island.

Philip no sooner heard, that Attalus and the Rhodians were retired, but he sent Philocles one of his generals, at the head of a strong detachment, to ravage the territory of Athens, while he himself with the rest of his army, over-ran all the southern parts of Thrace and the Thracian Chersonesus. From thence he passed over the Hellepont into Asia, and laid siege to Abydos, which city he took by storm, but reaped no advantage by his conquest; the Abydenians, having massacred their wives and children, set fire to the town, burnt their effects, and killed one another; so that the conqueror made not one slave <sup>l</sup>.

THE news of the reduction of Abydos, and the repeated complaints of the Athenians, made the consul Sulpitius at last leave Rome; he imbarqued with his army at Brundisium, and landed at the mouth of the Apfus between Dyrrachium and Apollonia. As he came too late in the year to attempt any thing on that side, he immediately detached Claudius Cento to Athens, with twenty gallies and some legionaries, to cover the Athenian territory from the ravages of Philocles. As soon as he appeared at Piræus, Athens got some respite; a stop was put to the devastations in the inland countries, and the coasts were delivered from the ravages of the Chalcidian pirates. But this was not enough for Cento; he resolved to punish the Chalcidians for their piracies; and accordingly set sail with the best part of his squadron, surprized Chalcis, pillaged it, massacred all the Macedonians and inhabitants that fell into his hands, broke all the statues of king Philip, burnt his magazines, arsenals, and engines of war, and then returned with the spoil to Athens <sup>m</sup>.

Athens attacked, and Attica ravaged by Philip.

As for Philip, early in the spring he assembled his sea and land forces at Demetrias, a maritime city of Thessaly, which he had made the capital of his dominions. He had attempted in the close of the late campaign to revenge himself on the Romans for the surprize of Chalcis, and to surprize them in their turn. But he came too late; the Romans had retired from Chalcis, and left nothing there but dead bodies, ashes, and ruins. Now therefore he turned all his rage against Athens, and having crossed the Euripus over a bridge, marched brought Bæotia towards Attica, hoping to find Athens as ill-guarded as the Romans had found Chalcis. But the Athenians had received notice of his approach, and were prepared. They kept constantly a certain number of men in pay, whose whole business was to fly continually from place to place in the neighbourhood of their dominions, and make what discoveries they could. One of these couriers, having discovered the Macedonian army, returned in haste to Athens, and reaching the city at midnight, brought thither the news of the approach of the enemy. The negligence of the Athenians was not less than that of the Chalcidians; they were all asleep, and both the gates and walls unguarded. But the trumpets soon roused them; both citizens and soldiers ran to arms, took their posts, and put themselves in a posture of defence. Philip, finding he could not surprize the city, resolved to attack it. He therefore ordered his troops to advance to the largest gate, called Dipulon. The street which led to it from the market-place, and continued through the suburbs, was of an extraordinary breadth; so that the besieged and the besiegers had room enough to draw up their troops in battalia. The Athenians did not wait till the king came to the gate; the best part of the garison, consisting of auxiliaries sent by king Attalus, and a body of Athenians, commanded by one Dioxippus, marched out to meet the enemy. Philip, overjoyed at an opportunity of joining battle, encouraged his men with this short exhortation; Fix your eyes on me, and do as I do. He then fell upon the Athenians with incredible fury, forced them to retire, and pursued them to the very gate. But he soon found that he had ventured too far, such showers of darts were discharged upon him from the ramparts, that he was obliged to sound a retreat. If the Athenians had not been afraid of wounding their men, who were mixed with the Macedonians, few of the latter would have escaped unhurt. The next day the besieged, being reinforced with some Roman companies, and the troops of Attalus which guarded Piræus, made another sally with much greater advantage; so that Philip was obliged to decamp, and post himself about three miles from Athens. But before he retired, he vented his rage in a most barbarous manner in that neighbourhood. He spared neither temples, nor tombs, nor the Lyceum, nor sacred groves, nor houses of pleasure; all were, without distinction, pillaged, and reduced to heaps of rubbish. Nay, he commanded his Macedonians to break in pieces the very stones, that they might not be serviceable in the reparation of the demolished edifices. All these devastations, with a great many aggravations, were afterwards set forth before the Ætolian diet by the Athenian ambassadors, in order to draw that nation into an alliance with Rome. And indeed the king's behaviour on this occasion prejudiced many of the Greeks so strongly against him, that they were afterwards easily gained over to the Roman interest, not knowing, that they were bringing into their country more haughty lords, or rather arbitrary tyrants, than Macedon had ever produced, or Greece ever seen<sup>a</sup>.

How the Athenians expressed their resentment against Philip.

THE irruption of the Romans into Macedon, which soon after happened, obliged Philip to leave Attica and all Greece, and hasten to the defence of his own country. About the same time Apustius, to whom the pro-consul Sulpicius had given the command of the Roman fleet, having joined the naval forces of king Attalus off the coast of Argolis, sailed from thence to the port of Athens. These succours so elevated the Athenians, that they expressed their resentment against Philip in a most ridiculous manner. They had formerly erected statues to Philip and his ancestors of both sexes, and even instituted sacrifices and festivals, and appointed priests in their honour. But now, out of a childish revenge, they destroyed the idols which they had worshipped, and passed a decree in their assembly, which lessened their esteem even in the opinion of their friends. The purport of this decree was, that all the statues of Philip and his ancestors should be broke in pieces; that the inscriptions in their commendation should be every-where erased; that their altars should be overturned, their festivals abolished, and their priests degraded; that even the places, where any monuments had been erected to them, should be deemed accursed, and no monuments ever after raised there; that the priests for the future should in the religious assemblies pronounce curses against Philip and the Macedonian armies; that if any citizen should have the impudence to excuse Philip, or speak in his favour, he should instantly be put to death; and lastly, that Philip and his posterity should be treated in the same manner as Pisistratus and his family had formerly been<sup>b</sup>. These were the only acts of hostility which the degenerate Athenians committed against Philip, the only revenge which they took of the dreadful havock he had lately made in their territory. The officers of the Roman fleet and king Attalus, who had put in at Pyræus, were witnesses of these shameful proceedings, and at the same time surfeited with the fulsome praises of which the Athenians were no less lavish on them, than of their curses on the king of Macedon<sup>p</sup>. Athens, heretofore so renowned in arms, was now become one of the most insignificant cities of Greece; for during the whole course of this war with Philip, and of that which was afterwards carried on by the Romans and their allies against his son Perfes, to the utter destruction of the kingdom of Macedon, the Athenians performed nothing, which the antient writers have thought worth transmitting to posterity. They continued indeed inviolably attached to the Roman interest, not having been even suspected to favour the Macedonian party, while in the other states of Greece the friends of Macedon were far more numerous than those of Rome. This steadiness gained them the affection of the Romans, who left them in the full possession of their antient liberties, even after the destruction of Corinth and dissolution of the Achaean league.

In this state Athens continued without any remarkable alteration till the Mithridatic war, when that city openly declared against the Romans her patrons and allies, being induced thereunto by one Aristion an Athenian philosopher of the sect of Epicurus. Aristion was of a mean extraction, but greatly esteemed among the followers of Epicurus, for his pretended contempt of power and riches. But these the hypocrite had only affected to despise, as afterwards appeared, in hopes of obtaining them more easily that way. For Archelaus, whom Mithridates had sent with a numerous army into Greece to stir up the inhabitants against the Romans, found it no difficult task to gain over this despiser of riches and honours, by promising to raise him to the chief employments of his republic. Archelaus having thus engaged him in the interests of his master, sent him over to Asia to confer there with the king himself, and concert measures about drawing Athens off from the Roman party, to which many of the citizens were greatly addicted. The scheme which they formed succeeded to their wish, but proved fatal to that unhappy city. Archelaus had some time before reduced the island of Delos, and plundered the rich temple of Apollo Delius. As this island had been formerly subject to the Athenians, Aristion advised the king to send the spoils to Athens, and with the present a strong body of men under pretence of guarding it. The Athenians were taken with this bait, and admitted the troops to the number of two thousand into the city. By the help of these Aristion, who accompanied them, took upon him to dispose of all the employments at Athens, and reigned there with great authority. All those who favoured the Romans were either cruelly murdered, or sent prisoners to Mithridates. Nor did the friends of Rome fare better in the other countries of Greece; the Achæans, Lacedemonians, Bæotians, &c. openly declared for Mithridates, and drove out such of their countrymen as refused to come into their measures<sup>9</sup>. Thespia was the only city of Greece that continued faithful to the Romans (C).

UPON the news of this general revolt, C. Sextius prætor of Macedon detached Bruttius Sura his lieutenant general, at the head of a thousand men, to put a stop to the progress of Archelaus. The prætor could spare him no more, being in apprehension that Macedon might follow the example of Greece. With this small body Bruttius penetrated into Bæotia, fought several battles with the joint forces of Aristion and Archelaus, and continued to harass them, till the Lacedemonians and Achæans taking the field joined the Asiatics. Then Bruttius, not being able with a handful of men to make head against so many enemies at once, reimbarqued his troops, and with his small squadron blocked up the port of Athens. While he continued here, the fleet of Mithridates commanded by Metrophanes drew near to Eubæa, with a design to seize that island. Whereupon Bruttius put to sea, and with one single squadron forced Metrophanes to sail back into Asia, sunk some of his ships, and on his return to the port of Athens made a descent on the island of Sciathus, which the Asiatics had seized. He recovered the island, crucified all the slaves he found there, and cut off the right arms of all the islanders that fell into his hands, both slaves and inhabitants having joined in the revolt and treated the friends of the republic in a very barbarous manner. The brave Bruttius, having thus preserved the island of Eubæa and recovered that of Sciathus, returned to the Pyræus or port of Athens, in order to prevent the Athenians from receiving any succours by sea from the king of Pontus<sup>r</sup>.

(C) Thespia stood at the foot of mount Helicon in Bæotia, whence the poets give the surname of Thespiades to the nine muses, who were supposed by the poets to have lived on this mountain. When Thespia was sacked by the Thebans under the command of Epaminondas, many of the inhabitants fled to Athens, where they were kindly entertained. Whence the Thespians had ever after such a regard for the Athenians, that they never failed to come into their measures, till Athens declared against Rome (14).

SUCH was the state of affairs in Greece, when Sylla, who had been appointed to carry on the war against Mithridates, landed in Thessaly, with five legions, some Italian cohorts, and a small body of cavalry. With these he was to make head against the joint forces of Archelaus and the states of Greece, amounting in all to an hundred and fifty thousand men. Upon Sylla's arrival, the Greek cities returned to their duty, and opened their gates to the Roman general. Athens alone, which was held by the tyrant Aristion, persisted in the revolt, and would not hearken to any terms. Whereupon Sylla resolved to reduce it by force, thinking it necessary to settle the affairs of the republic in Greece before he passed over into Asia against Mithridates. This capital of Attica, or rather of all Greece, consisted at that time of two cities, the upper called Cecropia from Cecrops its first founder, and the lower named Athens from Athene, or Minerva, its tutelary goddess. Both these cities were surrounded by one common wall, but parted by another which lay across between them, both walls being defended by strong towers raised at small distances from each other. The two ports of Piræus and Munychia were no less fortified than the city itself, being encompassed with walls of an uncommon thickness, and forty cubits high. Both these ports were joined to the city, though forty furlongs distant from it, by a wall which Themistocles had caused to be built, in order to secure the removal of such effects as were brought by sea from the port to the city. Besides these two ports or citadels, Athens was defended on the east by the Cephissus, and by the Ilissus on the west, which two rivers, winding about the plain, rendered the access to the city very difficult<sup>c</sup>. However, Sylla undertook to reduce Athens besieged by it with a far smaller army than that which had been brought from Asia to defend it. Upon his entering Attica he was met by Aristion and Archelaus, but he obliged them both to retire with a considerable loss, and shut themselves up in the two cities and citadels of Athens. Archelaus took upon him to defend Piræus, and Aristion to sustain the siege of Athens and Cecropia. On the other hand, the Roman general divided his troops into two bodies; one he sent to invest the city; with the other he marched in person to attack Piræus, hoping to take it by storm. But the besieged made such a vigorous defence, that he was obliged, after many unsuccessful attacks, to retire and take up his winter quarters at Eleusis and Megara. However, he did not drop the enterprise, having left a sufficient number of troops to keep the city and

castle blocked up against his return in the beginning of the spring. The whole winter he spent in making preparations for besieging the place in form, as soon as the season of the year would allow him to take the field. Entire woods were cut down, and the timber employed in making the warlike engines, which were then used in sieges. Nay, he did not spare the sacred groves, nor the trees in the walks of the academy and lycæum, which were the finest in Attica. He caused the high walls that joined the port to the city to be demolished, making use of the ruins to raise the works, and carry on the approaches; and as the enemy had laid waste the whole country, which was barren of its own nature, twenty thousand mules were continually employed in bringing provisions from Bœotia and other countries of Greece. These extraordinary expences soon drained his military chest, which was but very indifferently furnished at his first setting out from Rome: neither had he any hopes of receiving supplies either of men or money from thence, the contrary faction, headed by Marius and Cinna, prevailing in Italy, and watching all opportunities of thwarting his attempts in the east. In this distress he had recourse to the sacred and inviolable treasures of the temples, and wrote a letter to the amphictyones (D) assembled at Delphos, desiring them to send him the treasures of Apollo, and promising in the most solemn manner, that he would return to the god, whom he himself revered, the value of whatever should be sent him. One Caphis a native of Phocis, in whom Sylla confided, was charged to deliver this letter to the amphictyones, and excuse to the assembly a step, which the Roman general was forced to take against his will. When Caphis arrived at Delphos, he wept in the presence of the amphictyones, and told them, that nothing but the utmost distress could have obliged Sylla to make such a demand, or himself to be the messenger of it, and desired that the god might be consulted. The oracle indeed returned no answer, but the sound of Apollo's lyre was heard from the inside of the sanctuary, and Caphis, whether he was really terrified with the pretended prodigy, or willing to save the

(D) The amphictyones were, as we have observed elsewhere, the deputies of the cities in Greece that enjoyed the amphictyonic right. These, before they were admitted into the assembly, bound themselves by a most solemn oath, to preserve the public peace, maintain the interests of religion, and to the utmost of their power secure the riches of the temple at Delphos. But they durst not refuse a demand, which was made at the head of a formidable army.

treasure by filling Sylla with a religious fear, would not meddle with the gifts consecrated to the god, till he had acquainted the general with what had happened. But Sylla deriding his simplicity, replied, that he was surpris'd he should not comprehend that music was a mark of joy, and by no means a sign of anger and resentment; he therefore desired him to take the treasures, and be assured, that in so doing he acted agreeable to the will of the god. Pursuant to this order, all the gold, silver, and brass, all the vases, presents, and offerings, which the superstition of the neighbouring and most distant nations had brought thither, were loaded on carts, and amidst the lamentations and outcries of the amphietyones and Delphians, sent to the Roman camp, where the gold, silver, and brass was coined by Sylla's orders. The person he employed to take care of the coinage was Lucullus one of his quæstors, who made so beautiful a coin, that it was ever after highly valued, and known by the name of the Lucullian money. The treasures of the god Æsculapius at Epidaurus, not much inferior in value to those of Apollo at Delphos, were at the same time by Sylla's orders brought to the camp, and by his quæstor turned into money<sup>c</sup>.

Sylla, being thus furnished with money to pay his troops, and engines to carry on the siege, took the field early in the spring, and shut up both the city and port more closely than before. As he could not possibly reduce the city by famine, so long as it received supplies of provisions by sea from the Pyræus, he began by making a breach in the wall, which secured the passage from the port to the city, and lodging in the breach a strong body of legionaries, so that nothing could be conveyed from one place to the other. Having thus cut off the communication between the city and the sea, he drew a line of circumvallation which prevented the inhabitants from abandoning their native country, or receiving any supplies from the neighbouring villages. The city being thus closely shut up, Sylla applied himself entirely to the reducing of Pyræus, hoping, that in the mean time the Athenians would be obliged by famine to shake off the tyrannical yoke of Aristion, and return to their duty. It is not easy to say, whether the attack of Pyræus or the defence was conducted with most vigour, both the besiegers and besieged behaving with incredible courage and resolution. The sallies were frequent, and attended with almost formal battles, in which the slaughter was great, and the loss generally equal. In one of these Archelaus put the Romans to flight, set fire to their machines, and obliged them to retire at a greater distance from the place. They no sooner returned than he attacked them anew, and would have obtained the like advantage, had not Murena, a legionary tribune, encouraged the Romans, and brought them back to the charge with such fury, that the besieged in their turn were forced to give ground, and save themselves within their walls, after having lost two thousand men in the engagement. The Romans pursued them so close, that they would have entered pell-mell with the Asiatics, had not the gate been timely shut, and a considerable part of the garison left without the walls at the discretion of the enemy. Among these was Archelaus himself, who would have been taken prisoner with the others, had not the soldiers on the ramparts observing his danger thrown him down a rope, and by that means drawn him up the wall <sup>u</sup>.

THE disadvantage of this action did not dishearten the besieged, who were still numerous enough to defend the place. The treachery of two slaves that were in the Pyræus proved far more prejudicial to them, than the attacks of the enemy. These, either out of affection to the Roman party, or in hopes of recovering their liberty, if the place should be taken, wrote upon leaden balls all that passed within, and threw them with slings into the Roman camp. By this means all the wise measures which Archelaus took were immediately communicated to the enemy, and none of his attempts attended with the usual success. He resolved one night to sally out against the enemy's works, and at the same time to send all his cavalry to fall upon their camp. But he no sooner took this resolution, than Sylla, who caused all the balls of lead to be carefully gathered, found one with this intelligence; To night at such an hour the foot will attack your works, and the cavalry your camp. He made use of this advice, and posted his troops so, that the besieged were soon forced to retire with considerable loss. As the city began to be in great want, Archelaus designed to send a great quantity of provisions to relieve the garison, and to convey it into the city by a strong detachment, which might have easily broke through the body of Romans that guarded the passage. But Sylla, who was timely acquainted with this design by the two slaves, doubled the guard, placed his men in ambushes, intercepted the convoy, and cut in pieces most of the Asiatics who escorted it <sup>w</sup>.

Mithridates's generals, who was marching through Epirus to his assistance at the head of a hundred thousand foot and ten thousand horse, with ninety chariots armed with scythes. As the approach of this formidable army, which had already reduced Thrace and Macedon, gave new courage to the besieged, so it disheartened the Romans. Whereupon Sylla exerted his utmost endeavours to take the place by storm, before the arrival of so numerous an army. One night, while the centinels on the walls were asleep, he ordered some of the boldest among his legionaries to scale the ramparts, which they did accordingly, and drove off the enemies that were posted to guard them. But the rest of the garison taking the alarm, the Romans were obliged to save themselves by leaping down into the ditch, and retiring in great disorder. Archelaus took advantage of the confusion the Romans were in, and made a vigorous sally with a design to burn a tower which had been lately raised by Sylla, and from whence the Romans greatly galled the besieged on the walls. Sylla hastened to the defence of a work, which had cost him much time and labour; the engagement lasted from morning to night, many falling on both sides; but the tower was preserved entirely by the valour of Sylla, who on that occasion distinguished himself in a very eminent manner *.

In the mean time the two cities of Athens and Cecropia began to be greatly distressed for want of provisions; Archelaus had several times attempted to throw in convoys, but had always found on that occasion the Romans on their guard, and the detachment, which was posted between the port and the city, reinforced with new troops from the camp. He therefore began to suspect that he had traitors about him, but nevertheless resolved to attempt once more the relief of the city. He did not doubt but Sylla would be soon acquainted with his design, and in consequence of that intelligence send a considerable detachment from his camp to reinforce the legionaries that guarded the road. As the army would be greatly weakened by this detachment, he thought that would be a proper time to make a sally against the camp, and demolish the works. This design he imparted to none, and therefore the sally proved very successful, several of the enemy's machines being reduced to ashes; but the convoy was intercepted, and most of the Asiatics that guarded it cut in pieces †.

Sylla had raised many castles round the walls, from the several floors of which such showers of arrows were discharged against the besieged, that they could not, without great danger, appear on the ramparts. To obviate this inconvenience, Archelaus ordered his men to undermine the castles which were raised on large foundations of stone, and by this means several of them were thrown down, and the Romans, who were lodged in them, either killed, or dangerously wounded. While the besieged were thus busy under-ground, the Romans beat down with their rams great part of the wall, and thought themselves at last masters of the place. But in a general assault Archelaus repulsed the besiegers with such resolution, that they were forced to abandon the enterprize, and apply all their thoughts to the widening of the breach, before they could entertain any hopes of taking the place by storm. The Asiatics had, in imitation of the Romans, raised wooden towers without the walls, which rendered the approach to them very difficult and dangerous. Sylla therefore altered his measures, and, instead of using the ram, ordered his men to dig a way to the bottom of the walls, and sap their foundations, supporting them with large beams, lest they should be buried themselves in the ruins. The wall being thus undermined, fire was set to the props, which being burnt, great part of the wall fell down with a dreadful noise, which struck the besieged, who did not expect it, with great terror. Sylla laid hold of this opportunity to mount the breach at the head of his best troops; but Archelaus opposed him with such resolution, that he was obliged to give ground. The Roman general returned thrice to the assault, but was as often repulsed; nay, in the last attack his men suffered so much, that he himself thought it advisable to give over the attempt, and lead his weary legions back to the camp. There they continued inactive for several days, and in the mean time Archelaus built another wall within that which the besiegers had with so much pains and labour beat down. This new wall Sylla began to batter before it was dry; but the prodigious quantity of arrows and burning materials, which were from thence discharged upon the aggressors, obliged him not only to desist from the attempt, but to retire with some precipitation<sup>2</sup>.

AND now Sylla gave over all thoughts of taking the place by assault, and therefore turned the siege into a blockade, in hopes of reducing it by famine. All the avenues both to the city and the port were guarded by strong detachments, so that neither provisions of any sort could be carried in, nor any of the inhabitants find a way out. By this means the city, which was then one of the most populous of the world, was reduced to such straits, that a bushel of barley was sold for a thousand Athens drachmas. Many of the citizens had nothing else to maintain <sup>in great</sup> themselves with but the roots and grass, which they found <sup>distress for</sup> growing about the walls. In this distress the senators and <sup>want of</sup> priests went to throw themselves at the tyrant Aristion's feet, <sup>provisions.</sup> conjuring him to have pity on the city, and to submit to the Romans upon any tolerable terms. But the tyrant was so far from being touched with their complaints, that he ordered his guards to discharge their arrows against them, and in that manner drove them from his presence. In the midst of the public misery, Aristion and his accomplices in the tyranny were plentifully provided with all sorts of provisions: their tables were served with the most exquisite meats, while the common people and many of the nobility, after having consumed their horses, dogs, and all other animals, were forced to live upon leather, which they softened by steeping it in water, and even upon human flesh <sup>a</sup>. The tyrant was at last prevailed upon by the importunities of the people to send ambassadors to the Roman camp; but as these made no proposals, but only descants on the exploits of Theseus, Eumolpus, and their ancestors against the Medes and Persians, Sylla interrupted them, desiring the haranguers to keep their rhetorical flourishes for themselves, since he was not come to Athens to be informed of the prowess of their ancestors, but to punish their present rebellion. Aristion had sent these declaimers with no other view but to quiet the people, and make them believe, that he was willing to save the city by capitulating with the Romans; but he still depended on the succours which were on full march to the relief of the city under the command of Taxiles; these he daily expected, and therefore, though, in compliance with the importunities of the people, he sent out ambassadors to Sylla, yet he had no mind to come to any agreement, nor even proposed any terms, which he imagined the Roman general might accept <sup>b</sup>.

Sylla had spies in Athens, as well as in Piræus, who were continually running about and intruding into all companies. One of these having one day over-heard some old men, that were walking in a place called Ceramicus (E), blaming the tyrant for not fortifying and guarding a certain part of the wall, where the enemy might easily surprize the city, upon his return to the camp acquainted Sylla with what he had heard. Upon this advice, the Roman went at midnight to take a view of the place, and finding that it might be easily scaled, ordered his legionaries without delay to apply their ladders, which they did accordingly with great chearfulness, being tired out with so long a siege, and entered the city sword in hand. While the legionaries were engaged within the city, Sylla battered the walls so violently with his rams, that he opened a large breach, and, at the head of his whole army, came to the relief of those who were fighting on the ramparts. The Athenians were struck with terror when they saw the Romans advancing in good order within their walls, and, throwing away their arms, implored the clemency of the conqueror. But Sylla had been too much provoked by the satyrical reflections of the Greeks from their ramparts on himself and his wife (F), to grant them any quarter. He allowed his soldiers to plunder the city, and inhumanly to murder even the women and children. The slaughter was so merciless, that the very channels in the streets flowed with blood. The next day all the slaves were sold by auction, and liberty granted to the few citizens who had escaped the swords of the soldiers. A few days after the reduction of Athens, Cecropia, whither Aristion had retired, was likewise forced to surrender. The tyrant, his guards, and all who had been in any employment under him, were put to death; but the others by Sylla's orders spared. He would not suffer the city to be set on fire, saying, that he pardoned the children for the sake of their fathers. The only punishment he inflicted upon the few citizens, who had the good luck to outlive that fatal day, was, that they should not for the future have the power of choosing their own magistrates, nor ever repair the breach which he had made in the wall. The first part of this punishment he soon remitted, and restored the city to the full enjoyment of its antient liberties. Some time after the reduction of Athens and Cecropia, Archelaus, having held out till his new wall was beat down, thought it advisable to abandon the place, and accordingly, after a long and most glorious defence, em-

barqued his troops, and retired first to Afunychia, and from thence advanced to join Tariles°. Sylla having possessed himself of the Pyræus, to leave behind him some marks of his resentment, destroyed most of the stately buildings, and, amongst others, the magazines and the arsenal, which had been built by the celebrated architect Philo, and was reckoned a master-piece of art.

THIS storm being blown over, the Athenians enjoyed a profound tranquility, till the civil war broke out between Cæsar and Pompey, when they sided with the latter, and were therefore closely besieged by Q. Fufius Calenus, Cæsar's lieutenant, who committed great devastations in Attica, destroyed several edifices which had been spared by Sylla, and reduced the city of Athens to great straits. However, they held out so long as they had any hopes of being relieved by Pompey; but when news was brought them that he was entirely defeated, they surrendered at discretion, and met with a more kind treatment than they expected; for Cæsar not only pardoned them, but received their city under his protection, saying, that he spared the living for the sake of the dead. But this kindness was not sufficient to keep a people in obedience, that had an utter aversion to any thing that favoured of servitude; for they no sooner heard of Cæsar's death, but they openly declared for his murderers, received Brutus and Cassius into their city, and even erected statues to them, which they placed next to those of Harmodius and Aristogiton, who had asserted the liberty of their country against the tyrannical usurpations of the sons of Pisistratus. After the defeat of Brutus and Cassius they sided with Anthony, who not only restored them to the full possession of all the privileges they had enjoyed in the most flourishing times of their republic, but enlarged their dominions, by subjecting to Athens the islands of Cea, Sciathus, Peparethus, and Ægina†. After the defeat of Anthony, Augustus punished their ingratitude to Julius Cæsar, by taking from them the island of Ægina, and forbidding them to sell the freedom of their city. Towards the latter end of Augustus's reign they began to revolt, but were without much trouble reduced to their former obedience. Germanicus, the adopted son of Tiberius, honoured them with the privilege of having a lictor, which was deemed a mark of sovereign power; this grant was confirmed to them by Tiberius and his successors, under whose protection they maintained their antient form of government till the reign of Vespasian, who reduced Attica, with the rest of Greece, to a Roman province, saying, that the Greeks knew not how to enjoy their liberty. But the emperor Adrian, who had been archon of Athens before his accession to the imperial throne, restored them to the full enjoyment of all their antient privileges, and bestowed upon them a large sum of money with an annual provision of corn. In his reign and at his charge the two ports of Piræus and Munychia were repaired, and a whole region of new buildings added to the old city. This quarter was called Adrianopolis from Adrian, whom the Athenians, as appears from some antient inscriptions <sup>e</sup>, not undeservedly used to stile the second founder of their city. All the privileges granted them by Adrian were not only confirmed, but extended, by his successors M. Antoninus Pius and M. Antoninus the philosopher; the latter of which allowed them handsome salaries for the maintenance of their public professors. But Severus abridged them of a great many privileges, to revenge, as is supposed, an affront which he received at Athens while he studied there <sup>f</sup>. Valerian was more favourable to them, and gave them leave to repair that part of the wall which had been thrown down by Sylla. In the reign of Gallienus, as Zosimus informs us, or of Claudius, as Cedrenus will have it, the city was taken and plundered by the Goths, who were soon obliged by Cleodemus, who had escaped their fury, to abandon their new conquest, and save themselves by a timely flight. Constantine the Great was a peculiar patron and benefactor of the Athenians, honouring their chief magistrate with the title of grand duke, and granting them many other privileges of greater consequence, which were confirmed and enlarged by Constantius, who moreover put them in possession of several islands in the Archipelago. In the time of Arcadius and Honorius they were cruelly harassed and pillaged by the Goths, who turned all the stately and magnificent structures, that were still standing, into heaps of ruins. From this time there is scarce any mention made of Athens till the thirteenth century, when it was in the hands of Baldwin, as Nicetas informs us <sup>g</sup>, and besieged by one of the generals of the Greek emperor Theodorus Lascares, who was forced to raise the siege after having suffered a considerable loss. The same author tells us, that it was not long after besieged and taken by the marquis Bonifacius. It fell afterwards into the hands of one Delves of the house of Arragon, upon whose death it was seized by Ba- jacet <sup>h</sup>, who did not hold it long, being driven out by the Catalonians under the command of Andronicus Palæologus the elder. The Catalonians were in their turn dispossessed of it by Reinerius Acciaoli a Florentine, who, having no lawful issue, left the state or dukedom of Athens, as it was then called, to the Venetians, and Thebes with Bæotia to his natural son Anthony. Anthony made war on the Venetians, and in one campaign recovered the whole state of Athens, which continued for some years under the government of the Acciaoli, but was at last reduced by the Turks in 1455<sup>i</sup>. Francus Acciaoli, the last duke of Athens and prince of Acbaia, seeing his country threatened with an invasion by the Mohammedans under the conduct of Omares, and not being in a condition to make head against so numerous an army, had recourse to the western princes, called then the Latines; but these refused to assist him, unless he engaged his subjects to renounce all the articles wherein the Greek church differed from the Latin, which he not being able to perform, was forced to deliver up both himself and the city to the Barbarians, who first treated their captive with great humanity, but afterwards put him to death<sup>k</sup>. Athens remained subject to the Turks till the year 1687, when it was after a short siege taken by the Venetians, and not many years after retaken by the Turks, who continue masters of it to this day.

To what we have said of the greater republics of Greece, we shall add something relating to the smaller states, namely those of Bæotia, Acarmania, and Epirus. The Bæotians, after having driven out their kings, as we have related above<sup>l</sup>, formed themselves into a republic, whereof the chief magistrates were the Prætor or Strategos, the Bæotarchi, and the Polemarchi. The prætor was always chosen from among the Bæotarchi, and his authority lasted only a year, it being death for the prætor, according to the laws of the republic, not to resign his office before the first month, called Boucatios, of the new year was expired. His authority was much the same with that which was vested in the prætors of Acbaia and Ætolia. The province of the Bæotarchi, was to assist the prætor with their advice, chiefly in war, and to command under him; they were the supreme court of the nation in what related to military affairs, the prætor himself, who was one of their body, not daring to act contrary to their determinations. As to their number we are in the dark, some authors mentioning seven, some nine, and some even eleven, all vested with some command in the army. But their authority was not confined to military affairs only, they bore a great sway in the civil administration, and were from thence stiled Bæotarchi, or governors of Bæotia. They were chosen yearly, and obliged by law, as well as the prætor, to lay down their employment on pain of death before the first month of the new year was expired. The Polemarchi were entirely civil magistrates, it being their province to maintain peace and concord at home, while the Bæotarchi were employed abroad in the wars of the republic. Besides these magistrates there were four councils, in which the whole authority of the state, as Thucydides informs us <sup>m</sup>, consisted. These were made up of the deputies that were sent by all the cities of the Bæotian republic, and without their approbation the Bæotarchi could not declare war, make peace, conclude alliances, or transact any other business of importance, as appears from Thucydides <sup>n</sup>, who tells us, that an alliance with some of the neighbouring states, which had been approved by all the Bæotarchi, was rejected by a plurality of voices in the four great councils of the nation. At Thebes, the chief city of Bæotia, merchants, and even artificers, were admitted into the number of citizens, an honour which they enjoyed in no other city of Greece. However, they were excluded there, as in all the other Greek states, from public employments, pursuant to a law which obtained all over Greece, and declared those only qualified for the administration of public affairs, who had abstained for the space of ten years from all manner of trade and traffic <sup>o</sup>. We find another of the Bæotian laws mentioned by the antients <sup>p</sup>, which forbids on pain of death any parent to expose his child; if he had not wherewithal to maintain the infant, he was by the same law directed to put it into the hands of a magistrate, and the magistrate to dispose of it to any one that was willing to bring it up; but the child thus brought up, was condemned to perpetual slavery, being entirely at the disposal of the person who had taken care of it during its childhood.

THE Bæotians, and especially the Thebans, were continually harassed by the princes of Macedon, as we shall relate in the history of Alexander and his successors. Nevertheless they sided with Philip against the Romans, and could not be prevailed upon by the Athenians and Achæans to desert him and join the other states of Greece, till he was intirely defeated in the famous battle of Cyncephalæ. As they were then sensible, that the Romans would at last prevail, they thought it advisable to provide by time for their own safety, and accordingly sent deputies to Flaminius, imploring his protection. The proconsul received them with great humanity, and put them upon the same foot with the other allies of the republic in Greece. Not long after they offered a petition to Flaminius, which seemed reasonable. A great many Bæotians had served in the Macedonian army, and these the proconsul was desired to demand of Philip, who had then made a truce with the Romans. Flaminius complied with their request, and obtained what he desired of Philip, who immediately sent back the Bæotian troops, and with them one Brachyllas, who had been banished for appearing too zealous in the cause of the Macedonians against the Romans. The Bæotians, though indebted to Flaminius alone for the return of their troops, thanked the king of Macedon only, and to shew their gratitude, in the first election they made of a prætor, they preferred Brachyllas, famous for his attachment to Philip, and hatred to the Romans, to Zeuxippus and Pisistratus, who were both zealous partizans of Rome; nay, they had the confidence to make this impolitic election in the sight of the Roman camp. In like manner all the other employments were filled with such only as were enemies to Rome and friends to Macedon. These steps greatly exasperated Flaminius, and Zeuxippus and Pisistratus joined their resentment to that of the proconsul. These two Bæotians foresaw that Brachyllas would not fail to vent his rage upon them, as soon as the Roman troops were withdrawn from Greece, and therefore resolved to be beforehand with him, while Flaminius continued there. All the friends of Rome concurred in this design, persuading the proconsul, that neither their lives nor fortunes could be safe so long as Brachyllas was alive. Flaminius approved of their design, but refused to contribute to it himself. His approbation was sufficient encouragement; Zeuxippus and Pisistratus, having hired three Ætolians and three Italians, fell upon Brachyllas, as he was one night returning home from an entertainment, and dispatched him. Some of his companions, who were conducting him to his house from the banquet when the assassins attacked him, were at first the only persons suspected of the murder. But Zeuxippus appeared with an air of confidence in the assembly of the people, undertook the defence of the accused, and shewed, that it was not at all probable, that debauchees should have courage enough to make any attempts on the life of the prætor. This assurance made some of the Bæotians believe, that Zeuxippus was no ways privy to the murder; but others took umbrage at seeing him so mighty solicitous in having those cleared who were apprehended, and began to suspect, that the prætor had been murdered by them, and the plot laid by Zeuxippus. On this suspicion, those who were in his company being put to the rack, though innocent, accused Zeuxippus and Pisistratus, purely upon the public suspicions, without being able to bring any proofs of their accusation. Hereupon Zeuxippus, who was conscious to himself of the crime laid to his charge, changing his presumption into fear, privately withdrew from Thebes, where the murder was committed, to Tanagra another city of Bœotia, Pisistratus continued in Thebes, not fearing the deposition of men who had not been any ways privy to the crime; he was only under apprehension of being discovered by a slave, who had been employed in the assassination by Zeuxippus his master; he therefore wrote to Zeuxippus at Tanagra, desiring him to dispatch the slave, as one more fit to be employed in a bad action than to keep it a secret. The messenger was ordered to deliver the letter into Zeuxippus's own hands; but he, thinking the slave faithful and affectionate to his master, trusted it with him. The slave read it, and finding it contained sentence of death against himself, left his master that instant, and repaired to Thebes, where he discovered the whole affair. Pisistratus was apprehended and put to death; but the odium of the murder fell intirely on the Romans, Zeuxippus retired to Athens, and lived there without any apprehension, being recommended to the magistrates of that city by his protectors the Romans.

THE Bœotians were inclined to take up arms, but having no officer of experience to head them, and Philip refusing to lend them any assistance, they contented themselves with a private revenge, murdering all the Romans they found straggling about the fields; insomuch, that they could no longer cross the country, but in large bodies. At last Flaminius being informed that many of his men were missing, and that there were just grounds to suspect they had been murdered by the Bœotians, sent officers with troops to inquire into the matter, and apprehend the authors of such treacherous proceedings. The officers upon their return acquainted him, that great numbers of Romans had been murdered, and their bodies, to prevent discovery, thrown into the lake of Copias (G). He was at the same time assured, that the cities of

(G) This lake, which is the same with the lake called by Pausanias (15) the lake of Cephissus, took its name from the city of Cope.

Coronæa and Acraephia (H) had on that occasion signalized their hatred to the Romans. Upon this information the proconsul ordered the murderers to be delivered up to him, and as he had lost five hundred men, the Bæotians were condemned to pay five hundred talents; troops were likewise sent to ravage the fields of Acraephia, and lay siege to Coronæa. The Bæotians, who were conscious to themselves that they deserved severe punishment, seeing the proconsul drawing together his troops, with a design to treat them as they deserved, had recourse to the Athenians and Achæans, whose mediation was of such weight with Flaminius, that he immediately ordered the siege of Coronæa to be raised, and remitted four hundred and seventy talents of the fine he had laid upon the treacherous cities of Bæotia. He insisted only on their delivering up to him the murderers, who were accordingly apprehended and carried to the Roman camp, where they were brought to condign punishment. This mixture of mildness and severity was highly extolled and applauded by the Bæotians, who ever afterwards continued faithful to the Romans. But as some of their leading men joined Perfes king of Macedon in his wars against the Romans, the whole country was on that score treated with great severity, Rome being at that time under no apprehension of an invasion from Antiochus, as she was when Flaminius suffered himself to be so easily appeased. At the dissolution of the Achæan league, Bæotia with the rest of Greece was reduced to a Roman province <sup>9</sup>.

Acarnania lay between Ætolia and Epirus, was a free Acarnania state and governed by a prætor, a general assembly, and other subordinate magistrates of the same nature and authority as those of the Achæans and Ætolians. The Acarnanians

It was in former times, as Strabo tells us (16), three hundred and seventy one furlongs in compass; but is now much less. It is fed by the river Cephisus, and the poets tell us, that Hercules made it by turning the Cephisus into the plain of Orchomenus. The people of this neighbourhood are said to have been the first inventors of ours, whence the city next to the lake was called Copæ from the Greek word κόπαι.

(H) Coronæa, a city of Bæotia, stood on the river Cephisus, where it discharges itself into the lake Copias, not far from mount Helicon (17). It is famous on account of the victory which Agésilæus gained there over the Thebans and Athenians. The city of Acraephia stood between the springs of the Ismenus and the Asopus.

were above all the other Greeks addicted to the kings of Macedon, and chiefly to Philip, the father of Perfes. They alone adhered to him after the famous battle of Cynocephalæ, valuing themselves upon an inviolable fidelity in the observation of treaties. However, Lucius Flaminius, brother to Titus Flaminius, took upon him to bring them over to the Romans, and deprive Philip of this his only support. With this view he engaged the chief men of the nation to meet him in the island of Corcyra, whither they resorted according to their appointment; but the result of this conference was to appoint another in the city of Leucas, the capital of Acarmania (I). In this second interview the leading men of the nation, after warm disputes, drew up the plan of a confederacy with the Romans, and were inclined to desert Philip. But some, who had been bribed by the king, leaving the assembly with indignation, filled all the city with their complaints; the people joined them, and, as they were generally inclined to the princes of Macedon, who had often protected them against the Ætolians, the whole city was in an uproar. During this general commotion, Philip sent Echedemus and Androcles, two Acarnanians greatly esteemed in their own country, and steady friends to Macedon. These declaimed with great virulency against their slavish countrymen, who, without any regard to the faith of treaties, were betraying the interest of their country, in order to deliver up the whole nation to the mercy of an imperious republic. The people, already prepossessed against the Romans, backed the remonstrances of the two deputies, and openly protested, that they would not enter into any engagements prejudicial to the interest of Phi-

(I) Leucas was the capital of Acarmania, where the general assembly of the Acarnanians used to meet. The city gave its name to the whole island, which was called Leucadia, but is now known by the name of Santa Maura. It lies in the Ionian sea, and is now divided from the continent by a streight, which is not above fifty paces over. The Carthaginians are said to have settled a colony here, and to have formed this streight or canal; for Leucadia was formerly a peninsula, being joined to Acarmania by a neck of land. Near this city stood in antient times a stately temple consecrated to Apollo, and the famous rock, whence despairing lovers leaped into the sea. During the feast of Apollo the Leucadians yearly threw down from the top of this rock a criminal, who had been sentenced to die, imagining that the gods would load the criminal with all the evils that threatened the city. They fastened a great many birds and feathers to his body, believing they would make his fall less violent. If he happened not to be killed by the fall, his life was spared, but he was banished for ever.

lip. Thus the decree, which had been drawn up in favour of the Romans, was unanimously rejected in the assembly, and Archelaus and Bianor, who were the authors of it, declared enemies to their country, and guilty of the blackest treachery. Zeuxidas, their prætor, was deposed, for no other reason, but because he had proposed the affair in the assembly. However, upon more mature deliberation, the sentence past against these three was disannulled, and they restored to their former honours. But at the same time their alliance with the king of Macedon was renewed, and the treaty, made by some private men with the Romans, rejected with indignation. Lucius, who had in the beginning of the tumult retired from Leucas, resolved to reduce the Acarnanians by force; and accordingly having made the necessary preparations, he sailed from Corcyra with a design to lay siege to Leucas. He thought that the very sight of the Roman troops would frighten the citizens into a compliance with his request; but he was disappointed; the Leucadians appeared on the walls, and prepared to make a vigorous resistance. Whereupon the Roman general began his approaches, being resolved to take the place by storm. Leucadia, or the territory of Leucas, was at that time a peninsula, being joined to the western part of Acarnania by a neck of land, about five hundred paces in length, and a hundred and twenty in breadth; in after-ages this isthmus being dug through, Leucadia became an island. Lucius, having viewed the situation of the place, resolved to attack it on that side which was washed by the sea, and on that account the least fortified; the water being very low near the walls, the earth was easily removed, and the wall without much trouble undermined, and thrown down. But the besieged made such a vigorous resistance, that the Romans were repulsed in three successive attacks, which obliged the general to allow them some rest; and in the mean time the Leucadians raised a new wall stronger than the former. The siege would have been protracted to a great length, had not some Italian exiles, who were well acquainted with the place, brought a great many Romans privately into the city. These, uniting themselves into one body, marched strait to the market-place, and while the inhabitants were engaged with them there, the rest of the army scaled the walls, and marched in good order to the relief of their companions. The Acarnanians were surrounded, and those who refused to submit put to the sword. The reduction of the capital struck such terror into the whole nation, that they deserted Philip, and submitted to the Romans, under whose protection they lived, according according to their own laws, till the destruction of Corinth, when Acarmania became part of the province of Achaia<sup>1</sup>.

Epirus was bounded on the east by Ætolia, on the west by the Adriatic, on the north by Theffaly and Macedon, and on the south by the Ionian sea. This country was antiently governed by its own princes, in which state it made no small figure, as we shall see in a more proper place. Deidamia, great grand-daughter to the famous Pyrrhus, having no issue, gave the Epirots their liberty, who formed themselves into a republic, which was governed by Magistrates annually elected in a general assembly of the whole nation. Their neighbourhood to Macedon obliged them to be continually on their guard against those princes, who made frequent incursions into their country, took and pillaged their cities, and forced them to contribute, as if they had been their subjects, to all the charges of the wars they carried on with the other states of Greece. The Romans, after having conquered Philip, restored them to their antient liberty; but they, forgetful of this favour, took up arms against their friends and benefactors and joined Perfes, which so provoked the Roman senate, that they dispatched peremptory orders to Paulus Æmilius, after the reduction of Macedon, commanding him to plunder the cities of this ungrateful people, and level them with the ground. This decree drew tears from the eyes of Æmilius, but he could not decline the execution of it. He therefore set out at the head of his victorious army, and arriving on the confines of Epirus, sent small bodies of troops into all the cities, under pretence of withdrawing the garisons; that the Epirots might enjoy the same liberty which Rome had granted to Macedon. The Romans were received in all the cities of Epirus with great demonstrations of joy; for Æmilius had not communicated his orders to any one for fear of terrifying the Epirots, who would not have failed to defend themselves and their country with their usual bravery. In the mean time Paulus Æmilius sent orders to the ten chiefs, who were dispersed in the different provinces, and governed all Epirus, enjoining them to bring to his camp all the gold and silver they had in their respective districts. The chiefs with great reluctance complied with his order, and by this means what was most valuable in Epirus was saved out of the hands of the greedy soldiers, and delivered to the quæstors to be laid up in the public treasury. All the rest was given up as a prey to the soldiery. Though the consular troops were cantoned in different places, the execution was made the same day and hour, the Roman soldiers falling every where with incredible fury on the houses, which were abandoned to their mercy. The whole booty was sold, and of the money raised by the sale each foot soldier had two hundred denarii, that is 6 l. 9 s. 2 d. and each of the horse the double of this sum. An hundred and fifty thousand men were made slaves, and sold to the best bidder for the benefit of the republic. Nor did the vengeance of Rome stop here ; all the cities of Epirus, to the number of seventy, were dismantled, and the chief men of the country carried to Rome, where they were tried, and most of them condemned to perpetual imprisonment<sup>c</sup>. After this fatal blow Epirus never recovered its antient splendor. Upon the dissolution of the Achaean league, it was made part of the province of Macedon ; but when Macedon became a diocesis, Epirus was made a province of itself, called the province of Old Epirus, to distinguish it from New Epirus, another province lying to the east of it. On the division of the empire, it fell to the emperors of the east, and continued under them till the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, when Michael Angelus, a prince nearly related to the Greek emperor, seized on Ætolia and Epirus, of which he declared himself despote or prince, and was succeeded by his brother Theodorus, who took several towns from the Latins, and so far enlarged his dominions, that disdaining the title of despote, he assumed that of emperor, and was crowned by Demetrius archbishop of Bulgaria. Charles, the last prince of this family, dying without lawful issue, bequeathed Epirus and Acarmania to his natural sons, who were driven out, as we have related above, by Amurath the second. Great part of Epirus was afterwards held by the noble family of the Castriots, who, though they were masters of all Albania, yet stiled themselves princes of Epirus. Upon the death of the famous George Castriot, Epirus fell to the Venetians, who were soon dispossessed of it by the Turks, in whose hands it still continues, being now known by the name of Albania, which comprehends the Albania of the antients, all Epirus, and that part of Dalmatia which is subject to the Turks.

Thus we have seen, through a series of many ages, the rise, progress, declension, and lastly the final ruin, of the several states of Greece. The first form of government introduced among them was monarchical, which, as Plato observes, is formed upon the model of paternal authority, and of that gentle and moderate dominion, which fathers exercise over their families. But as power, when lodged in one person, becomes often haughty, unjust, and oppressive, especially if it is hereditary, the several states of Greece, in process of time, began to be weary of a kingly government, and to put the administration of public affairs into many hands ; so that monarchy every where, except in Macedon, gave way to a republican government, which was diversified into as many various forms as there had been different kingdoms, according to the different genius and peculiar character of each people. However, they all had liberty for their fundamental principle, but this liberty was prevented from degenerating into licentiousness by wise laws, which awed the people, and kept them to their duty. As every individual, at least in the early times of Greece, was capable of attaining the chief honours of his republic, he considered his country as his inheritance. The children were taught from their infancy to look upon their country as their common mother, to whom they more strictly appertained than to their parents, and not as private persons, who regard nothing but their own interest, and have no sense of the misfortunes of the state, but as they affect themselves. They studied above all things to maintain among the citizens and members of the state a great equality, without pride, luxury, or ostentation. Magistrates, who had bore a great sway during their office, became afterwards private men, and had no authority but what their experience gave them. Those who had commanded armies one year, served perhaps the very next as subalterns, and were not ashamed to perform the most common functions, either in the armies or fleets. The principles, which prevailed in all the states of Greece, were the love of poverty, contempt of riches, disregard of self-interest, concern for the public good, desire of glory, love for their country, and above all such a zeal for liberty as no danger could intimidate. So long as they adhered to these principles, they were invincible ; we have seen them not only making head with a handful of men, against the innumerable armies of the Persians, but putting them to flight, and obliging the most powerful monarch then upon earth to submit to conditions of peace, as shameful to the conquered as they were glorious to the conquerors. But as soon as luxury and the love of riches prevailed among them, they began to degenerate, and in a short time became a quite different people. The Persians soon perceived this alteration, and, by bribing those who had the greatest share in the government, found means to make them turn their arms against themselves. These intestine divisions, carefully fomented by the Persians, so weakened them, that Philip of Macedon and his son Alexander met with no great opposition in reducing a people, that had for so many ages maintained their liberty, against the whole power of the Persian monarchy. They made several attempts to reinstate themselves in their antient condition ; but these efforts were ill-concerted, and only served to increase their slavery. They were therefore at last obliged to have recourse to the Romans, who after having gained them by the attractive charms of liberty, which was their darling passion, and made use of them to destroy the Macedonian power, at last turned their arms against those they were come to assist, and reduced to slavery the nations which they pretended to deliver. Greece, thus deprived of its antient power, still retained another sovereignty, to which the Romans themselves could not help paying homage. Athens continued to be the school of polite arts, and the center of refined taste in all the productions of the mind. Rome, haughty as she was, acknowledged this glorious empire, and sent her most illustrious citizens to be finished and refined in Greece. Cicero, already the admiration of the bar, did not think it below him to become the disciple of the great masters Greece then produced. The emperors themselves, who were by more weighty affairs prevented from going into Greece, brought Greece in a manner home to themselves, by receiving into their palaces the most celebrated philosophers for the education of their children and their own improvement. Thus by a new kind of victory Greece triumphed over Rome, and made the conquerors of the world submit to her laws.

Ionia.

Phocæa.

THE most remarkable cities of Ionia were, Phocæa, now Foggia, built, according to Vellerius<sup>a</sup>, by the Ionians, according to Pausanias<sup>b</sup>, by the Phocenses of Greece, and according to Strabo<sup>c</sup> by the Athenians. Some writers tell us, that while the foundations of this city were laying there appeared near the shore a great shole of sea-calves, whence it was called Phocæa, the word Phoca signifying in Greek a sea-calf. Ptolemy, who makes the river Hermus the boundary between Æolia and Ionia, places Phocæa in Æolis, but all other geographers<sup>d</sup> reckon it among the cities of Ionia. It stood on the sea-coast between Cuma to the north, and Smyrna to the south, not far from the Hermus, and was in former times one of the most wealthy and powerful cities of all Asia, but is now a poor beggarly village, though the see of a bishop. The Phocæans were, as Herodotus<sup>e</sup> informs us, expert mariners, and the first among the Greeks that undertook long voyages, which they performed in gallies of fifty oars. As they applied themselves to trade and navigation they became acquainted pretty early with the coasts and islands of Europe, where they are said to have founded several cities, namely Velia in Italy, Alalia, or rather Aleria in Corfica, Marseilles in Gaul<sup>f</sup>, &c. Neither were they unacquainted with Spain; for Herodotus tells us<sup>g</sup>, that in the time of Cyrus the Great, the Phocæans arriving at Sartessus a city in the bay of Cadiz, were treated with extraordinary kindness by Arganthonius king of that country, who hearing that they were under no small apprehension of the growing power of Cyrus, invited them to leave Ionia, and settle in what part of his kingdom they pleased. The Phocæans could not be prevailed upon to forsake their country; but accepted of a large sum of money, which that prince generously presented them with, to defray the expence of building a strong wall round their city. The wall they built on their return, but it stood them in no stead against the mighty power of Cyrus, whose general Harpagus investing the city, with a numerous army, soon reduced it to the utmost extremities. The Phocæans having no hopes of any succour, began to capitulate, but the conditions, offered by Harpagus, seeming somewhat hard, they begged he would allow them three days to deliberate, and in the mean time withdraw his forces. Harpagus, though not ignorant of their design, complied with their request, and the Phocæans taking advantage of this condescension put their wives, children, and all their most valuable effects on board several vessels which they had ready equipt, and conveyed them safe to the island of Chios, leaving the Persians in possession of empty walls. Their design was to purchase the OEnessian islands, which belonged to the Chians, and settle there : but the Chians not caring to have them so near, lest they should engross all the trade to themselves, as they were a sea-faring people, they put to sea again, and having taken Phocæa their native country by surprise, put all the Persians they found in it to the sword. As they were well apprised that the Persians would resent such inhuman proceedings, they re-imbarked with all expedition, steering their course towards Cyrnus now Corfica, where twenty years before they had built the city of Alaria or Calaris. Before they left Phocæa the second time they uttered most dreadful imprecations against such as should stay behind, binding themselves by a solemn oath never to return till a red-hot ball of iron, which on that occasion they threw into the sea, should appear again unextinguished. However, above half the fleet broke through all the engagements, and returned soon to Phocæa, the Persians, who were desirous the city should be re-peopled, offering a general pardon to such as had been concerned in the massacre. The remaining part arrived safe at Alaria, where they continued five years, infesting the neighbouring seas with piracies, and ravaging the coasts of Italy, Gaul, and Carthage. Hereupon the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians entering into an alliance against them, fitted out a fleet of 120 sail, with a design to drive them from Cyrnus. The Phocæans, not at all dismayed at the sight of so powerful a fleet, engaged them in the sea of Sarabia with half their number, and after a bloody engagement put them to flight. But the victory cost them dear, forty of their ships being sunk and most of the rest quite disabled (A). Whereupon not finding themselves

(A) Herodotus tells us, that such of the Phocæans as had lost their ships in the engagement fell into the hands of the Carthaginians and Tyrrhenians, who attacked them as they came ashore in their small boats, and put them all to death. As this happened in the territory of Argilla in Tuscia, both the inhabitants and cattle of that district were seized with a dreadful distemper, which obliged the Argyllians to have recourse to the oracle of Delphos, being desirous to atone for the crime they had committed in what manner the god of that place should direct. The oracle enjoined them to commemorate yearly the death of the Phocæans, with great magnificence and gymnastic combats ; which they did accordingly, beginning as soon as their deputies returned from Delphos, and were immediately deli-

themselves in a condition to stand a second shock, (and the enemies were preparing to attack them anew) they resolved to abandon the island, and retire with their wives and children to Rhégium; which they did accordingly, but soon left that place, and settled in OEnotria, now Ponza, a small island in the Tyrrhenian sea, over-against Velia in Lucania, which their ancestors had founded. Those who returned home lived in subjection either to the Persians or tyrants of their own. Among the latter we find mention made <sup>h</sup> of Laodamas, who attended Darius Hystaspis in his expedition against the Scythians, and of Dionysius, who joining Aristagoras, tyrant of Miletus and chief author of the Ionian rebellion, retired after the defeat of his countrymen first to Phœnicia, where he made an immense booty, seizing on all the ships he met with trading to that country. From Phœnicia he sailed with immense riches to Sicily, where he committed great depredations on the Carthaginians and Tuscans; but is said never to have molested the Greeks <sup>i</sup>. In the Roman times the city of Phocæa sided with Antiochus the Great; whereupon it was besieged, taken, and plundered by the Roman general, but allowed to live according to its own laws. In the war, which Aristonicus, brother to Attalus king of Pergamus, stirred up against the Romans, they assisted the former to the utmost of their power, which so displeased the senate, that they commanded the town to be demolished, and the whole race of the Phocæans utterly rooted out. This severe sentence had been put in execution, had not the Massilienses, a Phocæan colony, interposed, and with much ado asswaged the anger of the senate <sup>k</sup>. Pompey declared Phocæa a free city, and restored the inhabitants to all the privileges they had ever enjoyed; whence under the first emperors it was reckoned one of the most flourishing cities of all Asia Minor. This is all we have been able to gather from the antients, touching the particular history of Phocæa.

Smyrna.

Smyrna, called by the Turks Ismyr, is situated on the isthmus of the Ionian peninsula, at the bottom of a bay, to which it gives name, and is reckoned one of the largest and richest cities of the Levant. Smyrna was not at first one of the twelve cities of the Ionian league, so often mentioned by the antients, but was in process of time admitted into that confederacy by means of the Ephesians, who lived, as Strabo<sup>1</sup> informs us, for many years in the same district with the Smyrnæans; and hence it is, that Ephesus is sometimes called Smyrna. Velleius Paterculus<sup>m</sup> reckons it among the cities of Æolis, wherein he agrees with Herodotus<sup>n</sup>, who tells us, that Smyrna was built by the Æolians, but afterwards destroyed by the Ionians, who claimed the ground on which the city stood, and all the neighbouring country. Be that as it will, it must have been soon after rebuilt; for the same Herodotus, or whoever else is the author of Homer's life, describes it as a famous emporium in that poet's time, whither merchants resorted from all parts. Pliny<sup>o</sup> is of opinion, that it was founded by an Amazon named Smyrna; and adds, that it was many ages after rebuilt and embellished by Alexander. What he says of the Amazon is commonly looked upon as quite fabulous, though the present inhabitants pretend, that it borrowed its name of an Amazon, who, coming into Asia at the head of a female army, possessed herself of this city. Neither was it rebuilt by Alexander; for Strabo, a writer far more exact, informs us<sup>p</sup>, that Smyrna four hundred years after it had been destroyed by the Lydians, during which time the Smyrnæans lived in villages, was begun to be rebuilt by Antigonus, but that Lyfimachus put the last hand to the work. This new city was built, according to the same writer, twenty furlongs distance from the place where the old city stood; between the castle on the shore and the present city, as our best modern travellers conjecture<sup>q</sup> from the many ruins of edifices, that are still to be seen in that place (B). This new city, as it was most conveniently situated for trade, became in a short time one of the most populous and wealthy of all Asia, as is plain from several inscriptions, in which it is stiled The metropolis, The first and chief city of Asia, The ornament of Ionia, &c. But nothing can give us a greater idea of the magnificence of antient Smyrna, than the description of it we read in Strabo<sup>1</sup>. “It is at present, says he, the finest city in Asia. “One part of it is built on a hill, but the finest edifices “stand on a plain not far from the sea, over-against the temple of Cybele. The streets are the most beautiful that can “be, strait, wide, and paved with fine stone. It has many “stately buildings, magnificent porticoes, majestic temples, a public library, and a convenient harbour, which “may be shut up at pleasure”. There are still to be seen many vestiges of the antient grandeur of Smyrna, namely of a marble theatre, which was reckoned the finest in Asia, of a circus, of baths, temples, &c. for the description of which we refer our readers to Le Bruyn, Tournefort, Spon, and other modern travellers. Neither the circus, nor the theatre were built, it seems, in Strabo’s time, else he would have mentioned them among the other edifices that embellished the city. The walls of Smyrna were washed by the Meles, a river of great note in the republic of letters, for Homer is said to have been born near its banks; whence, as the name of his father was unknown, he was called Melesigena, Some writers add<sup>2</sup>, that he composed his inimitable poem in a cave near the spring of this river (C). Under the Roman emperors the city of Smyrna was at the height of its grandeur, and ever courted by them, as it was the finest harbour in Asia, and distinguished with titles, exemptions, and privileges above all the cities of Asia, Ephesus alone excepted. Tiberius shewed on all occasions a great esteem for the Smyrnæans, and Marcus Aurelius rebuilt their city, after it had been almost quite ruined by an earthquake, and the succeeding emperors heaped such favours on them as raised no small jealousy among the other Greeks of Asia. The Smyrnæans on the other hand

(B) A modern traveller (2) tells us, that many valuable pieces of antiquity have been found there, and mentions four ancient statues that were dug up in that place, while he was at Constantinople, and are still to be seen at Troja. Our author adds, that in 1671. an urn was discovered in the same place with this inscription, Marcus Fabius, the son of Marcus Fabius, of the Galerian family, surnamed Junius, one and twenty years old. Upon opening the urn they discovered the bodies both of the father and son lying together in their armour which was still entire.

continued ever faithful to the Romans, and are said to have been the first in Asia that honoured Rome, under the title of Rome the Goddess, with a temple, priests, and sacrifices ; which they did while Carthage was at the highest pitch of its glory, and Asia in great part possessed by powerful princes, who had not yet experienced the Roman valour.

As to the present city, it is situated on the shore at the foot of a hill which commands the port, and may be justly stiled the centre of trade to the Levant. Its convenient harbour and situation have saved it from undergoing the same fate which most cities in Asia, though formerly of great note, have suffered. The great cities of Sardis so famous in the Greek history, of Pergamus, the capital of a rich kingdom, of Ephesus, the metropolis of all Asia, are at present but small villages : Thyatira, Philadelphia, Laodicea, &c. are known only by some antient inscriptions ; whereas Smyrna, tho' often destroyed by earthquakes (D), is still one of the richest and most populous cities in the east, being resorted to by all the trading nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa. They reckon in the city fifteen thousand Turks, ten thousand Greeks, eighteen hundred Jews, two hundred Armenians, and as many Franks. Its territory is very fertile and pleasant, abounding chiefly in vines and olive-trees ; but the air is not reckoned very wholesome. Smyrna was one of the seven churches mentioned in the revelations, and is the only one that still remains in any reputation.

As for the particular history of the Smyrnæans ; their city at first belonged to the Æolians, as we have hinted above, but was taken from them by the Ionians in the following manner. A great many of the inhabitants of Colophon, an Ionian city, being driven out on account of a sedition they had raised at home, fled to the Smyrnæans, who received them with great kindness, which they requited with the utmost ingratitude. For not long after, while the inhabitants were performing certain religious ceremonies in honour of Bacchus without the walls, they shut the gates, and seized on the city. This alarmed all the Æolians, who hastened to the assistance of their countrymen with what forces they could raise ; but the Colo-

The Smyrnæans consenting to these conditions were distributed among the other eleven Ionian cities, and allowed to enjoy the same privileges. The Colophonians continued in possession of Smyrna, which was thenceforth reckoned among the twelve Ionian cities<sup>u</sup>. It was afterwards taken by Alyattes king of Lydia, and continued subject to the Lydians till the time of Cyrus, by whose general Harpagus it was brought under the Persian yoke, with the other cities of Ionia. The Smyrnæans, according to the character Aristides gives them<sup>w</sup>, followed their pleasures, and lived in great luxury, but, what seldom happens, were at the same time ready to exert themselves, when called upon, and behaved with great gallantry (E).

Clazomenæ, now Vourla as is commonly believed, was one of the twelve Ionian cities, and of great note in the flourishing times of Greece. The antient city, as Pausanias * informs us, stood on the continent, and was by the Ionians fortified at a vast expence, in order to put a stop to the Persian conquests. But the inhabitants were so terrified after the defeat of Cræsus and surrender of Sardis, that they abandoned the city on the continent, and withdrew with all their effects to one of the neighbouring islands, where they built the city of Clazomenæ, so often mentioned in the Roman history. Alexander joined it to the continent by a causeway two hundred and fifty paces long<sup>y</sup>; whence Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny, and most of the antient geographers count it among the cities on the continent. The Romans always treated the inhabitants with great kindness, knowing of what importance their city was for carrying on their conquests in Asia; for they not only declared them a free people, but moreover put them in possession of the island of Drymusa, and often quarrelled with the princes of Asia on their account<sup>z</sup>. Augustus repaired and embellished their city with many stately buildings, whence on some medals he is stiled the founder of Clazomenæ (E), though this as Herodotus observes <sup>e</sup>, who preferred banishment to slavery, and are therefore greatly commended by that writer. Some of them returned afterwards to their antient habitation, for in the Roman times the city of Teos was of some note, and well peopled <sup>f</sup>. Augustus in several medals is called the founder, which title he may have deserved by repairing and embellishing that, as he did most other cities of Asia. Pliny <sup>g</sup> counts Teos among the islands, wherein he is contradicted by all the antient geographers. The small towns of Eræ and Myonnesus, between Teos and Lebedus, were formerly subject to the Teians, who enjoyed a large territory, extending from their city to the neighbourhood of Lebedus.

Lebedus. Lebedus, counted by Mela, Strabo, and Herodotus among the twelve Ionian cities, stood on the isthmus of the Ionian peninsula over-against Smyrna, and was famous in antient times for the sports that were there yearly performed in honour of Bacchus. Lyfimachus utterly ruined the city, and transferred the inhabitants to Ephesus <sup>h</sup>. Upon his death they left Ephesus and rebuilt Lebedus, which, however, never afterwards made any figure, being a village rather than a city <sup>i</sup>.

Colophon. Colophon, now Altobosco, or as others will have it Belvedere, was one of the chief cities of the Ionian league, seated on the coast, and not an inland city, as Pliny <sup>k</sup> calls it. It was destroyed by Lyfimachus, and the inhabitants sent to people Ephesus; but after his death rebuilt in a more convenient situation. The Colophonians were so skilled in horsemanship, that those they sided with were always sure of the victory, which gave rise to the trite proverb <sup>l</sup> (G). Colophon was the birth-place of Nicander, and one of the seven cities that claimed Homer, who lived there some time, as Herodotus informs us in the life of that great poet <sup>m</sup>. The antients mention a famous grove and temple of Apollo Clarius in the neighbourhood of this city <sup>n</sup>. Whence that fabulous deity borrowed the epithet of Clarius is uncertain, some pretending that his temple stood in a small town near Colophon called Claros, and others maintaining that he was so called from a mountain bearing that name. The small town of Notium on the same coast often mentioned by Livy belonged to the Colophonians, and was by the Romans allowed to enjoy the same privileges as Colophon itself °.

Ephesus, called by the present inhabitants Aiasolaue, was Ephesus. in former times the metropolis of all Asia. Stephanus gives it the title of Epiphanestate or most illustrious, Pliny styles it the ornament of Asia, and Strabo the greatest and most frequented emporium of that continent. How different was the antient Ephesus from the modern, which is but a sorry village inhabited by thirty or forty Greek families, who are not capable, as Spon observes, to understand the epistle St. Paul wrote to them ! The antient city stood about fifty miles south of Smyrna near the mouth of the river Cayster, and the shore of the Icarian sea, which is a bay of the Ægean ; but as it has been so often destroyed and rebuilt, 'tis no easy matter to determine the precise place ; most of our modern travellers are of opinion that the antient city stood more to the south than the present, which they argue from the ruins that still remain. Ephesus was in antient times known by the names of Alopes, Ortygia, Morges, Smyrna Trachæa, Sarmornion, and Ptela <sup>p</sup> ; it was called Ephesus, according to Heracledes <sup>q</sup>, from the Greek word Ephesis, signifying permission, because Hercules, says he, permitted the Amazons to live and build a city in that place ; others tell us that Ephesus was the name of the Amazon that founded the city, for Pliny <sup>r</sup>, Justin <sup>s</sup>, and Orosius <sup>t</sup> unanimously affirm, that it was built by an Amazon, while others bestow this honour upon Androclus, son of Codrus, king of Athens, who was the chief of the Ionians that settled in Asia. But in matters of so early a date, it is impossible to come at the truth, and therefore not worth our while to dwell on such fruitless enquiries. What we know for certain is, that the city, which in the Roman times was the metropolis of all Asia, acknowledged Lyfimachus for its founder ; for that prince having caused the antient city to be entirely demolished, rebuilt at a vast expence a new one in a place more convenient and nearer the temple. Strabo tells us, that, as the inhabitants shewed a great reluctance to quit their antient habitations, Lyfimachus caused all the drains, that conveyed the water into the neighbouring fens and the Cayster, to be privately stopt up ; whereby the city being on the first violent rains in great part laid under water, and many of the inhabitants drowned, they were glad to abandon the antient, and retire to the new city. This new Ephesus was greatly damaged by an earth-quake in the reign of Tiberius, but by that emperor repaired and embellished with several stately buildings, of which there are now but few ruins to be seen, and scarce any thing worthy of antient Ephesus. The aqueduct, part of which is still standing, is generally believed to have been the work of the Greek emperors; the pillars, which support the arches, are of fine marble, and higher or lower as the level of the water required. This aqueduct served to convey water into the city from the spring of Halitee mentioned by Pausanias. The gate, now called by the inhabitants, for what reason we know not, the gate of persecution, is remarkable for three bas-reliefs on the mould, of an exquisite taste. The port, of which so many medals have been struck, is at present but an open road, and not much frequented. The Cayster was formerly navigable, and afforded a safe place for ships to ride in, but is now almost choaked up with sand.

But the chief ornament of Ephesus was the so much celebrated temple of Diana, built at the common charge of all the states in Asia, and for its structure, size, and furniture, accounted among the wonders of the world. This great edifice was situate at the foot of a mountain, and at the head of a marsh, which place they chose, if we believe Pliny, as less subject to earthquakes. This doubled the charges, for they were obliged to be at a vast expence in making drains to convey the water that came down the hill, into the morasses and the Cayster. Philo Byzantius tells us, that in this work they used such a quantity of stone, as almost emptied all the quarries in the country; and these drains or vaults are what the present inhabitants take for a labyrinth. To secure the foundation of the conduits or sewers, which were to bear a building of such a prodigious weight, they laid beds of charcoal, says Pliny, well rammed, and upon them others of wool. Two hundred and twenty years, Pliny says four hundred<sup>p</sup>, were spent in building this wonderful temple by all Asia. It was four hundred and twenty five foot in length, and two hundred in breadth, supported by a hundred and twenty-seven marble pillars seventy foot high, of which twenty-seven were most curiously carved, and the rest polished. These pillars were the works of so many kings, and the basreliefs of one were done by Scopas the most famous sculptor of antiquity ; the altar was almost wholly the work of Praxiteles. Gheiramecrates, who built the city of Alexandria, and offered to form mount Athos into a statue of Alexander, was the architect employed on this occasion. The temple enjoyed the privilege of an asylum, which at first extended to a furlong, was afterwards enlarged by Mithridates to a bow-shot, and doubled by Marc Anthony, so that it took in part of the city ; but Tiberius to put a stop to the many abuses and disorders that attend privileges of this kind, recalled them all, and declared that no man guilty of any wicked or dishonest action should escape justice, though he fled to the altar itself (H). A great many medals are to be seen with the heads of divers emperors, and on the reverse the temple with a frontispiece of two, four, six, and even of eight pillars.

THE priests, who officiated in this temple, were had in great esteem, and trusted with the care of sacred virgins or priestesses, but not till they were made eunuchs. They were called Estiatores and Essenæ, had a peculiar diet, and were not allowed by their constitutions to go into any private house. They were maintained with the profits accruing from the lake Selinusius, and another that fell into it, which must have been very considerable, since they erected a golden statue to one Artemidorus, who being sent to Rome recovered them, after they had been seized by the farmers of the public revenues<sup>9</sup>. All the Ionians resorted yearly to Ephesus with their wives and children, where they solemnized the festival of Diana with great pomp and magnificence<sup>1</sup>, making on that occasion rich offerings to the goddess, and not forgetting her priests. The Asiarchæ mentioned by St Luke† were, according to Beza‡, those priests, whose peculiar province it was to regulate the public sports that were an-usually performed at Ephesus in honour of Diana ; they were maintained with the gatherings that were made during the sports, for all Asia flocked to see them. The great Diana of the Ephesians, as she was stiled by her blind adorers <sup>u</sup>, was according to Pliny <sup>w</sup>, a small statue of ebony, made by one Canetia, though commonly believed to have been sent down from heaven by Jupiter. This statue was at first placed in a niche, which, as we are told, the Amazons caused to be made in the trunk of an elm. Such was the first rise of the veneration that was paid to Diana in this place. In process of time, the veneration for the goddess daily increasing among the inhabitants of Asia, a most stately and magnificent temple was built near the place where the elm stood, and the statue of the goddess placed in it. This was the first temple, but not quite so sumptuous as that which we have described, though reckoned as well as the second among the wonders of the world. The second was still remaining in Pliny's time, and in Strabo's, and is supposed to have been destroyed in the reign of Constantine, pursuant to the edict by which that emperor commanded all the temples of the heathens to be thrown down and demolished ; the former was burnt, the same day that Alexander was born, by one Erastratus, who owned on the rack that the only thing which had prompted him to destroy so excellent a work was the desire of transmitting his name to future ages. Whereupon the common council of Asia made a decree forbidding any one to name him ; but this prohibition served only to make his name more memorable, such a remarkable extravagance, or rather madness, being taken notice of by all the historians who have wrote of those times. Alexander offered to rebuild the temple at his own expence, provided the Ephesians would agree to put his name on the front ; but they rejected his offer in such manner as was no-ways taken amiss by that vain prince, telling him, that it was not fit one god should build a temple to another <sup>x</sup>. The pillars and other materials that had been saved out of the flames were sold, and also the jewels of the Ephesian women, who on that occasion willingly parted with them, and the sum raised from thence served for the carrying on of the work till other contributions came in, which in a short time amounted to an immense treasure. And this is the temple which Pliny, Strabo, and other Roman writers speak of. It stood between the city and the port, and was built, or rather finished, as Livy <sup>y</sup> tells us, in the reign of king Servius. Of this wonderful structure there is nothing at present remaining but some ruins, and a few broken pillars.

(H) Pope Pius II. in relating this, observes that the many sanctuaries of Rome, open to ruffians, and all offenders without distinction have changed that city, otherwise quiet, into a den of thieves (8). Thus he wrote before he was raised to the papal chair ; but that dignity inspired him, it seems, with different sentiments, for he was the whole time of his pontificate a most strenuous asserter of what they call the Ecclesiastical Immunity.

THE Ionians first settled at Ephesus, under the conduct of Androclus, who drove out the Carians and Leleges, by whom those places were possessed at his arrival. The city, whether built by him, as Strabo affirms, or by one Cræsus, or Ephesus, long before the Ionic migration, as others maintain, became soon the metropolis of Ionia. It was at first governed by Androclus and his descendants, who assumed the royal title, and exercised regal authority over the new colony; whence even in Strabo's time the posterity of Androclus were stiled kings, and allowed to wear a scarlet robe, a sceptre, and all the ensigns of the royal dignity. In process of time a new form of government was introduced, and a senate established, but when, or on what occasion, this change happened, we know not. This kind of government continued till the time of Pythagoras, who lived before Cyrus the Great, and was one of the most cruel and inhuman tyrants we read of in history; for having driven out the senate, and taken all the power into his own hands, he filled the city with blood and rapines, not sparing even those who fled to the temple of Diana for shelter<sup>2</sup>. Pythagoras was succeeded by Pindarus, who bore the same sway in the city, but treated the citizens with more humanity. In his time Ephesus being besieged by Cræsus king of Lydia, he advised the inhabitants to devote their city to Diana, and fasten the wall by a rope to the pillars of her temple. They followed his advice, and were, in regard of the goddess, not only treated with great kindness by Cræsus, but restored to their former liberty<sup>1</sup>. Pindarus being obliged to resign his power, retired to Peloponnesus. He was, according to Ælian<sup>b</sup>, grandson to Alyattes king of Lydia, and Cræsus's nephew. The other tyrants of Ephesus, mentioned in history, are Athenagoras, Comas, Aristarchus, and Hegesias, of which the last was driven out by Alexander, who, coming to Ephesus after having defeated the Persians on the banks of the Granicus, bestowed upon Diana all the tributes which the Ephesians had paid to the Persians, and established a democracy in the city. In the war between Mithridates and the Romans they sided with the former, and, by his direction, massacred all the Romans that resided in their city; for which they were severely fined, and reduced almost to beggary by Sylla, but afterwards treated kindly, and suffered to live according to their own laws, as is plain from several antient inscriptions and medals (I). The Ephesians were mightily given to Superstition, forcery, and curious arts, as the scripture styles them<sup>c</sup>, whence came the proverb, Ephesian letters, signifying all sorts of spells or charms (K).

Priene. Priene was one of the antient cities of Ionia, and the birth-place of Bias, one of the seven wise men. Ptolemy places it at a great distance from the sea, but all other geographers count it among the maritime towns of Ionia.

Miletus. Miletus, now Palatschia, was formerly a city of great note, being styled, by Pliny<sup>d</sup> and Pomponius Mela<sup>e</sup>, the first city and metropolis of all Ionia. The same Pliny<sup>f</sup> mentions the antient and new Miletus, the former he calls Lelegeis, Pithyusa, and Anaëtoris, and Strabo tells us that it was built by the inhabitants of Crete<sup>g</sup>. The latter was founded, according to Strabo<sup>h</sup>, by Nelus the son of Codrus king of Athens, when he first settled in that part of Asia. This great city stood on the south side of the river Meander near the sea-coast. The inhabitants applied themselves very early to navigation, having founded, according to Pliny<sup>i</sup> eighty, according to Seneca<sup>k</sup> three hundred and eighty, colonies in different parts of the world. The city itself was no less famous for a temple and oracle of Apollo surnamed Didymæus, than for the wealth and number of its citizens. This temple was burnt by Xerxes, but rebuilt by the Milesians to such an immense size, that it was accounted the greatest in the world,

To this purpose Suidas tells us, that a famous wrestler of Miletus, having for a long time struggled with an Ephesian, without being able to conquer him, observed at last that his adversary, who had already got the better of thirty robust and expert wrestlers, was armed with the Ephesian letters, which he was no sooner deprived of, than he fell to the ground, owning himself conquered (9).

being equal in compass, as Strabo attests<sup>1</sup>, to a village; whence it remained uncovered, but was surrounded with a thick grove, in which the priests dwelt who served the temple. Pliny places this temple and grove at a hundred and fifty eight furlongs distance from the city, but Strabo says that it stood near the walls<sup>2</sup>. Our modern travellers tell us, that there are still large ruins of the temple to be seen, but that the town is reduced to a few shepherds cottages. Near Miletus stood mount Lathmus, where the moon, as the poets feigned, made her private visits to Endymion. Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece, and the first that foretold an eclipse of the sun, was born in this city, and thence surnamed the Milesian, to distinguish him from a famous Lyric poet bearing the same name.

Miletus was in a most flourishing condition in the time of Darius Hystaspis, and accounted the ornament of Ionia, as Herodotus informs us<sup>3</sup>, though it had been strangely afflicted with domestic troubles for two generations before, and almost reduced to the last extremities. Their differences were at last composed as the same writer informs us<sup>4</sup>, by the Parians, whom they had chosen from among all the Greeks for that purpose. These arriving at Miletus, and observing that the fields round the city lay in great part uncultivated, told the Milesians, that they designed to survey their whole country; which they did accordingly, writing down the name of the owner where-ever they saw in that desolate country any portion of land well cultivated. After they had thus viewed the whole territory, and found but a very small part of it well kept, they returned to the city, and having called an assembly, put the government into the hands of those whose lands they had found in good condition; not doubting but they would administer the public affairs with the same care which they had taken of their own. They strictly enjoined the rest of the Milesians, who till that time had been rent into parties and factions, to obey the magistrates they had appointed, and in this manner reformed the state of the city<sup>5</sup>, which thenceforth daily increased in wealth and power. In the time of Psammiticus king of Egypt a colony of Milesians settled in that country, and built a wall, as Strabo tells us, called by the Egyptians the Milesian wall<sup>6</sup>. We may judge of the wealth, power, and flourishing condition of Miletus in those days, from the long and expensive war which they maintained against Gyges, Ardayes, Sadyattes, and

Alyattes kings of Lydia, without being assisted by any of the Ionians except the Chians, whom they had supported against the Erythræans. In what manner this war was carried on, and how Alyattes was at last obliged to sue for peace, we have already related in the history of Lydia<sup>1</sup>. After the defeat of Cræsus, and taking of Sardis, all the Ionians sent ambassadors to Cyrus, offering to submit to him on the same terms which had been granted them by Cræsus; but that prince, rejecting the proposals of the others, admitted the Milesians alone on the foot of their former agreement with the Lydians. By this indulgence of Cyrus, Miletus flourished above all the cities of Ionia, till it fell into the hands, of Histiæus and Aristagoras, who brought ruin not only on their own country, but on all Ionia; for Miletus was besieged, taken, and laid in ashes by the Persians, whom they had provoked, and the inhabitants transferred first to Susa, and thence to Ampæ, a city on the red sea, not far from the mouth of the Tigris. The Athenians were so grieved at their misfortune, that they mourned and shed tears when they first heard it, no otherwise than if the like calamity had happened to Athens itself; and some time after one *Phrynica*s, a dramatic poet, having wrote a tragedy on the destruction of Miletus, the whole theatre burst out into tears when it was exhibited, and the magistrate fined the author in a thousand drachmas for renewing the memory of a misfortune, which they looked upon as their own, ordering at the same time that the piece should never more be acted<sup>2</sup>. The Persians having thus utterly ruined Miletus, and transplanted the inhabitants, the lands about the town and level country they reserved for themselves, but bestowed the hilly and less fruitful parts on the Carians of Pedieis. This misfortune befel Miletus six years after the revolt of Aristagoras in the reign of Darius Hystaspis, and had been long before foretold, if we believe Herodotus, by the oracle of Apollo Didymæus (L). However, the

(L.) That author tells us (10), that the Argians having consulted the oracle touching the fate of their city, received a double answer, partly concerning themselves, and partly the Milesians; the answer relating to the Milesians was uttered in the following terms;

Milesians were suffered afterwards to return and rebuild their city, which they did in a different place from that of the former, as we conjecture from the prediction of Thales related by Plutarch <sup>t</sup>; for that philosopher desired his body might be buried in an abandoned and solitary place at some distance from the city, saying, that it would one day become the market-place of the Milesians. The inhabitants never afterwards recovered their former power; for we find them eight years before the Peloponnesian war contending with the Samians for the sovereignty of Priene, and obliged to call in the Athenians to their assistance, for which piece of service they sided with them in the Peloponnesian war, till they were persuaded by Alcibiades, then in banishment, to join the Lacedemonians <sup>u</sup>. In the time of Cyrus the younger they attempted to shake off the Persian yoke, and join that prince against his brother Artaxerxes; but Tissaphernes, governor of that province, having timely notice of their design, put some of the chief conspirators to death, banished others, and reduced the city to a miserable state of slavery. At the famous peace of Antalcidas it was given up to the Persians, and remained subject to them till the time of Alexander, who restored them to their antient liberty, notwithstanding they had shut their gates against him, and did not submit till reduced to the last extremities <sup>w</sup>. By the Romans they were treated very kindly, and suffered to enjoy their liberty, especially under the emperors.

THE Milesians, like the other states of Ionia, when free from a foreign yoke, were often reduced to a miserable state of slavery by tyrants of their own, who governed them with an arbitrary sway, and made them feel all the evils of a foreign subjection. The first, who usurped this power over their fellow-citizens, were Thoas and Damasenor, who, as Plutarch informs us <sup>x</sup>, filled the city with blood and slaughter, and spared none but such as submitted to their usurped authority. These being destroyed, or driven out, Thrasymbulus usurped the sovereignty, which he maintained to his death. In his time and by his means an end was put to the war, which had been for many years carried on between the Lydians and Milesians, as we have related at length in the history of Lydia <sup>1</sup>. He was so famous for his prudence in the administration of public affairs, that most of the petty tyrants of Greece courted his friendship, and governed themselves in their unjust usurpations by his advice. Among these Periander tyrant of Corinth is said to have dispatched a messenger to him, to inquire what methods he had pursued in so settling his authority among the Milesians, that none of the citizens entertained any thoughts of shaking off the yoke which he had imposed upon them. Thrasylbulus, unwilling to send an answer either in writing or by word of mouth, took the slave into a corn-field, and there, as it were by way of amusement, struck off all the ears of corn that overtopped the rest. Then he sent back the messenger without any answer. Periander understood the hint, put all those to death whose overgrown power gave him any umbrage, and thereby enjoyed, without disturbance, the authority he had usurped <sup>2</sup>. Upon the death of Thrasylbulus several other tyrants rose up, mentioned by Herodotus <sup>3</sup>, Plutarch <sup>4</sup>, and other writers <sup>5</sup>. Among these the most famous in history are Histiæus and Aristagoras, who in attempting to shake off the yoke of the Persian kings, by whom they were supported, brought utter destruction upon all the Greek colonies in Asia, as we have related at length in the history of Persia <sup>6</sup>. In the time of Antiochus II. king of Syria, we read of one Timarchus reigning in Miletus, and practising great cruelties on the citizens, till he was driven out by that prince, who was on that account honoured by the Milesians with the surname of Theos or God <sup>7</sup>. Miletus gave birth to the celebrated philosophers, Anaximander, Anaximenes, and Thales. The islands of Chios and Samos were likewise inhabited by the Ionians, and belonged to their confederacy; but we shall have occasion to speak of them in the following chapter, containing the history of the Greek islands.

Æolis, so called from the Æolians, who settled in this part of Asia, extended, according to Strabo <sup>8</sup>, from the promontory Leclus to the river Hermus, and contained the following cities, Cyme, Larissa, Neontichos, Tenus, Cylla, Notion, Ægiræssa, Pitane, Ægæa, Myrina, and in more antient times Smyrna, which, as we have related above, was taken from the Æolians by the Ionians. These are the eleven ancient cities of Æolis mentioned by Herodotus <sup>g</sup>. Cyme stood on the sea-coast, and was the last of the maritime cities of Æolis towards Ionia. Larissa belongs properly to Troas, and is placèd by Strabo <sup>h</sup> between Achæum and Colonnæ. In former times Æolis comprehended all Troas, and extended along the coast from Ionia to the Propontis. Neontichos, or Neontichos, is mentioned by Thucydides <sup>i</sup> as situate in the country of the Apodoti, who were a peculiar tribe of Æolians inhabiting the sea-coast <sup>k</sup>. Tenus, called also Temnos, is placed by Pliny at the mouth of the Hermus, but by all other geographers, in the inland parts of Æolis. Cylla was a colony of the Æolians on the sea-coast of Myfia. Notium stood on the sea-side about two miles from Colophon <sup>l</sup>, and was in after-ages subject to the Colophonians. Authors do not agree about the precise situation of Ægiræssa, some placing it on the coast, and others at a great distance from the sea. Pitane was a considerable town not far from the mouth of the Caicus <sup>m</sup>. The inhabitants of this city are said to have had the art of making bricks that floated, like wood, upon the water. Ægea or Ægæ, bordered on the territory of Syme, and is counted by Strabo <sup>n</sup> among the mediterranean cities of Æolis. Myrina, the most antient city of all Æolis, stood on the coast, and had a very safe and capacious harbour. It was in after-ages called Sebastopolis in honour of Augustus. To these, Pliny, Strabo, and Pomponius Mela, add Grynium and Elæa; the former was about forty furlongs distant from Myrina, and famous for a temple and grove consecrated to Apollo, whence the surname of Grynæus is often given by the poets <sup>o</sup> to that deity; the latter, which was the port of Pergamus, and the birth-place of Zeno the philosopher, stood near the mouth of the Caicus <sup>p</sup>. Cyme, or as others write it, Cuma, was the metropolis of all Æolis.

Doris, properly so called, was that large promontory of Doris. Caria, which runs into the sea over-against the island of Telos. The chief cities of Doris were, Halicarnassus, formerly the capital of Caria, and famous for the Mausoleum or tomb built by queen Artemisia, in honour of her husband Mausolus, which was of so noble a structure, that the ancients looked upon it as one of the wonders of the world. It stood between the Ceramic and Jasian bays, and was reckoned one of the strongest cities of Asia <sup>9</sup>. It is now a heap of ruins, and known by the name of Nesi. Cnidus stood on the sea called Triopium, having on the north the Ceramic, or as others call it the Ceraunian, bay, and on the south the Rhodian sea. This city was formerly famous for the Venus of Praxiteles; and as Venus was the tutelary goddess of the place, she is thence often stiled by the poets, the Cnidian goddess <sup>r</sup>. Lindus, Jalissus and Camirus, were likewise cities of the Dorians, as Herodotus informs us, but we find nothing relating to them worth mentioning <sup>l</sup>.

Origin of the Ionians, Dorians and Æolians.

THAT the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians, who settled in Asia Minor, were Greek nations, is not to be doubted. Profane writers give us the following account of their origin, and first settling on the coast of Asia. Deucalion, say they, who reigned in Thessaly, and is famous for the flood that happened in his time, had by his wife Pyrrha two sons, Helenus and Amphietyon. Helenus, who is supposed to have given the name of Helenes to the Greeks, had three sons, Æolus, Dorus and Xuthus. Æolus, who was the eldest, succeeded his father, and, besides Thessaly, had for his share Locris and Bæotia. Many of his descendants went into Peloponnesus with Pelops the son of Tantalus king of Phrygia, and settled in Laconia. The country in the neighbourhood of mount Parnassus fell to Dorus, and was from him called Doris. Xuthus being obliged by his brothers to quit his native country, for appropriating part of his father's effects to himself without their knowledge, retired to Attica, where he married the daughter of Eretheus king of Athens, by whom he had two sons, Achæus and Ion.

AN involuntary murder committed by Achæus, obliged him to retire to Peloponnesus, which was then called Ægialea or Ægiales; but the country where he settled, ever after bore the name of Achaia. Some writers tell us, that he afterwards left Achaia, and recovered his grandfather's kingdom of Thessaly. Ion commanded the Athenian forces against Eumolpus the Thracian, who had invaded Attica, and so distinguished himself on that occasion, that the Athenians intrusted him with the government of their city, and were from that time called also Ionians. Though in process of time they thought fit to lay aside this name, yet it was not altogether out of use in the time of Theseus, as appears from the pillar erected by him in the Isthmus, to shew the bounds of the Athenians on one side, and the Peloponnesians on the other ; on the east side of the pillar was this inscription ; This is not Peloponnesus, but Ionia ; and on the south side, This is not Ionia, but Peloponnesus <sup>t</sup>. In the time that Ion governed Athens the citizens increased to such a degree, that their country, being not only unfruitful, but confined within narrow bounds, was no longer able to furnish them with necessary provisions. This forced them to contrive some means to disburden it, and therefore they sent colonies to settle in Peloponnesus, and these gave the name of Ionia to that part which they possessed. Thus all the inhabitants of Peloponnesus, though composed of different nations, were blended under the general names of Achæans and Ionians <sup>u</sup>.

ABOUT fourscore years after the taking of Troy the Heraclidæ, or descendants of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus with a design to recover that country, which of right belonged to them. They were conducted in this enterprize by three chief leaders, the sons of Aristemachus, namely Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus ; the last dying before the reduction of the country, his two sons Eurysthenes and Procles succeeded him. The expedition proved successful, and the Heraclidæ, having recovered the possession of their antient dominions, divided them among themselves ; in which division Argos fell to Temenus, Messenia to Cresphontes, and Laconia to the two sons of Aristodemus <sup>w</sup>.

SUCH of the Achæans as were descended from Æolus, and had inhabited Laconia, being driven from thence by the Dorians, who attended the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus, settled in that part of Asia Minor, which from them took the name of Æolis, and built there Smyrna with eleven other cities ; but Smyrna, as we have related above, was afterwards seized by the Ionians. From Æolis they sent colonies to the island of Lesbos, and there founded several cities. The Achæans of Mycenæ and Argos, being expelled by the Heraclidæ, seized upon that part of Peloponnesus, which was held by the Ionians. The latter at first returned to Athens, their original country, and soon after departed from thence under the conduct of Nileus and Androcles, the two sons of Codrus, and possessed themselves of the western coast of Asia Minor, lying between Caria and Lydia, which from them was named Ionia. There they built the cities, which we have described above*.

THE power of the Athenians, who were then governed by Codrus, increasing daily, the Heraclidæ thought proper to oppose their progress, but were defeated in a general engagement. Notwithstanding this overthrow they maintained themselves in possession of Megariss, where they built the city of Megara, placing there the Dorians, who had assisted them, in the room of the Ionians whom they had driven out†. Of these Dorians some continued in Megara after the death of Codrus, others passed over into Crete; but the greatest part being perpetually harassed by the Athenians, abandoning their country, settled in that part of Asia Minor, which was from them called Doris, and built there Halicarnassus, Cnidus, and the other cities mentioned above‡. The Ionic migration is said by all chronologers, except Eusebius and his followers, to have happened a hundred and forty years after the taking of Troy, and sixty after the return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus, that is, about one thousand and forty four before the Christian æra. The Æolic migration preceded the Ionic about fifty two years, and that of the Dorians was posterior to the Ionic near seventy.

THIS is the account which profane writers give us of these migrations; but their authority in matters of so remote a date is not much to be depended on. There were scarce any records in those rude and illiterate ages, even among the Greeks; whence they have obscured their origin with idle tales, and poetical fictions, there being scarce any thing related by their historians concerning their origin that deserves credit, or carries in it the least appearance of truth. Others, perhaps upon better grounds, take the Ionians to be descended from Javan, the fourth son of Japheth; and indeed the Greek translators of the holy scripture instead of Javan read Jaon, and those who are by other writers called Jones, are by Homer named Iaones. Now Javan and Jaon sound so like each other, that one may conclude they were the same. This opinion receives no small confirmation from holy writ, where the name of Javan is used for Greece (M). Javan is said to have have come into Greece after the confusion of Babel, and to have settled in Attica, whence the Attics were named Iaones and Iones. This name the inhabitants of Attica, as we have observed above, laid aside, but these who passed into Asia retained the same appellation. According to this opinion the Ionians were a colony from Attica; but Hecataeus, as quoted by Strabo<sup>a</sup>, tells us, that the Athenians or Iones of Greece were a colony of those in Asia. As the parts of Asia possessed by the Greeks lye directly in the way from the valley of Shinaar into Greece, it is not without foundation, that some have believed Javan to have first settled in Asia, and from thence, not having room enough on the coast, to have sent colonies into Greece, at that time uninhabited, under the conduct of his eldest son Elisba, who founded, according to them, the city of Elis in Peloponnesus. From Elisba Josephus supposes the Æolians to be descended, and therefore calls them Elisæi<sup>b</sup>.

(M) Two instances we have in Daniel: And when I am gone forth,

THE Ionians, Æolians, and Dorians, were at first governed by kings, and divided into many petty kingdoms, the monarchical form of government prevailing, at the time of their migration, all over Greece. Besides, Herodotus tells us in express terms, that some of the Ionians chose only Lycian kings of the race of Glaucus, others such only as were sprung from Codrus, and that some indifferently raised to the throne princes of either of these families<sup>c</sup>. But the actions and very names of their kings are buried in oblivion. Monarchy gave way to a republican government, which was settled in almost all the Greek cities of Asia Minor, each of them being governed by their own laws, and no-ways dependent on one another. However, in most of these states some private citizens, without any right to the throne, either by birth or election, endeavoured to advance themselves to it by cabal, treachery, and violence, sacrificing to their own security all those, whom merit, rank, zeal for liberty, or love of their country rendered obnoxious to them. It was this cruel and inhuman treatment that rendered these usurpers so odious to the people, and furnished such ample matter for the declamations of orators, and the tragical representations of the theatre.

THE Ionians, on their arrival in Asia, divided themselves into twelve small states or cantons, having been thus divided, while they inhabited Peloponnesus, as were afterwards the Achæans who drove them out. Of these twelve states consisted the Ionian confederacy, so often mentioned by the antients. The chief and most powerful city of the whole confederacy was Miletus. To those we have already described Thucydides adds the cities of the islands of Lemnos and Imbros <sup>d</sup>, and Velleius <sup>e</sup> those of Delos, Paros, Andros, Tenos, which were all, according to that writer, peopled by the Ionians. Some of the cities we have mentioned were built by the Ionians, others they possessed themselves of after driving out the antient proprietors. As they brought no women with them out of Greece, they forced those of Caria away from their parents, putting to death such of their relations as opposed them; in revenge of which violence and cruelty the Carian women bound themselves by an oath, which they transmitted as sacred to their daughters, never to take any repast with their husbands, or call them by their names <sup>f</sup>. The Ionians being thus established in the most fruitful and pleasant part of all Asia, their number soon increased, new adventurers joining them from other countries of Greece; the Abantes from Eubæa, who had nothing in common with the Ionians, were no inconsiderable part of this colony; the Mynian Orchomenians, the Cadmæans, Dryopians, and Molossians, with the Pelæsgians of Arcadia, the Dorians, Epidaurians, and many others of the several states of Greece, were, as Herodotus informs us <sup>g</sup>, intermixed with the Athenians, who were sent by the Prytanæan council. The latter who were true and genuine Ionians, as deriving their original from Athens, built a temple, which from themselves they called the Pan-Ionium (N). The privileges of this place they communicated communicated to no other Ionians ; neither did the others, as we read in Herodotus, ever desire to be admitted, except the Smyrnæans, most of them being of the name of Ionians, that people having soon degenerated from the virtue of their ancestors, and given themselves up to all manner of vice. The Pan-Ionium was a sacred place on the promontory of Mycale, dedicated by the Ionian confederacy to Neptune, surnamed Heliconius. Here the Ionians met to perform solemn exercises in honour of that deity, and to hold their general assemblies. This festival was peculiar to the Arbenian Ionians ; but the Apaturian solemnity (O) was common to all those of the Ionian name, except the Ephesians and Colophonians, who were excluded under pretence of a murder committed in their cities <sup>b</sup>.

Heliconius, from Helice a city of Achaia, which afterwards perished by an earthquake. One thing was remarkable in this sacrifice, viz. that if the bull offered happened to bellow, it was accounted a good omen, because that sound was thought to be acceptable to Neptune.

(O) This festival was first instituted at Athens, and from thence derived to the Asiatic Ionians. It was so called from the Greek word ἀπάτη signifying deceit, having been first instituted in memory of a stratagem, by which Melanthius king of Athens overcame Xanthus king of Bæotia. For a controversy arising between the Athenians and Bæotians about a piece of ground lying on the confines of Attica and Bæotia, Xanthus proposed, that an end should be put to the dispute by a single combat between himself and the Athenian king. Thymætes, at that time king of Athens, declined the fight, and was deposed. In his room was chosen one Melanthius a Messenian, who, having accepted the challenge, met his enemy at the appointed place. But before they began the fight, Melanthius pretending to see one behind Xanthus, habited in a black goat's skin, cried out, that the articles were violated. Upon this Xanthus looking back was treacherously slain by his adversary. In memory of this success Jupiter was surnamed Ἀπατήνῳ, that is deceiver. Others tell us, that the Apaturian festival was so called from the Greek word ἀπατρόια, because upon that solemnity children accompanied their fathers, to have their names entered into the public register. Some are of opinion, that the Apaturian festival had its name from the Greek word ἀπάτρις, that is, without fathers, in a civil sense, it not being till that solemnity publicly recorded, to whom they belonged. The Apaturia was celebrated in the month Pyanepsian, and lasted three days (14).

THE Dorians, on their arrival in Asia, formed themselves into six independent states or small republics, which were confined within the narrow bounds of so many cities; these were Lindus, Jalissus, Camirus, Cos, Cnidus, and Halicarnassus. Other cities in that tract, which was from them called Doris, belonged to their confederacy; but the inhabitants of these alone, as true and genuine Dorians, were admitted into their temple at Triope, where they exhibited solemn games in honour of Apollo Triopius. The prizes were tripods of brass, which the victors were obliged to consecrate to Apollo, and leave in the temple on an altar of gold. When Agasicles of Halicarnassus won the prize, he transgressed this custom, and carried the tripods to his own house: Wherefore the city of Halicarnassus was ever afterwards excluded from the Dorian confederacy; so that the Dorians were from that time known by the name of the five cities<sup>1</sup>.

THE Æolians were divided, like the Ionians and Dorians, into several small states or cantons, independent of each other, but united in one common confederacy or league. They possessed at first twelve cities; but Smyrna, as we have related above, was taken from them by the Ionians of Colophon. Their country was of greater extent than that of the Ionians, but far inferior to it in all other respects, Ionia being in the opinion of Herodotus<sup>2</sup>, the most fruitful and agreeable region of all Asia. The Dorians, besides the cities which belonged to them on the continent, possessed five in the island of Lesbos, one in Tenedos, and another in the hundred islands, which we shall have occasion to speak of in a more proper place. Thus the Greek states in Asia were governed much after the same manner as those in Europe, forming three different confederacies, of which the cities were governed by their own laws, and the three different confederacies by their respective general assemblies or diets.

THE religion and laws of the Greek colonies in Asia were much the same with those of Greece. Their principal deities were Ceres, Apollo, Diana, and Neptune. The Ionians, who came from Athens, celebrated every fifth year, the mysteries of Ceres Eleusina, which we have already described<sup>3</sup>. The Milesians worshipped Apollo Didymæus as their tutelary god, whence he was likewise called Apollo Milesius. Near the city of Miletus was a famous oracle of Apollo, called the oracle of Apollo Didymæus, and also the oracle of the Branchidæ; the former denomination it had from Apollo or the sun, who was surnamed Didymæus, as Macrobius informs us <sup>m</sup>, from the double light imparted by him to mankind; the one directly from his own body, and the other by reflection from the moon; the latter appellation was given both to the oracle and to Apollo himself, who was called Branchides, from one Branchus the reputed son of Macareus, but begotten, as was believed, by Apollo (P). This oracle was, as we are assured by Herodotus, very ancient, and the best of all the Grecian oracles, except that of Delphos <sup>m</sup>. In the time of the Persian war the temple was burnt down to the ground, being betrayed to the Barbarians by the Branchidae, or priests, who had care of it. Xerxes in requital of their service allowed them to settle, and build a city, in a remote part of Asia, where they thought themselves out of the reach of their angry countrymen. But for all this, their treachery did not escape condign punishment; for Alexander having conquered Darius, and possessed himself of all Asia, utterly demolished their city, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, revenging on the children the treachery of their forefathers <sup>n</sup>.

AN annual feast was celebrated by the Ionians in honour of Diana Triclaria, to appease whose wrath for an incest committed in her temple, men and women used to walk barefooted to it. This solemnity was instituted by the Athenians, who till after the Trojan war used annually to sacrifice to the angry goddess a male and a female child.

THEIR trade we can only guess at from their situation, Trade. which very likely drew merchants from all the neighbouring

(P) Varro tells us, that the mother of Branchus, being with child, dreamed, that the sun entering into her mouth penetrated to her womb; and that from thence the child was called Branchus from ἔγχεῖς, the throat, through which the god passed. Branchus received, when he grew up, a crown and sceptre from Apollo, and began to prophesy, but soon disappeared. Whereupon a magnificent temple was dedicated to him and Apollo Phileus, so called from φιλεῖν to kiss, because he was supposed to have imparted the spirit of prophecy to Branchus by a kiss. This temple was burnt by the Persians, but afterwards rebuilt with such magnificence, that it surpassed all the other Greek temples in bigness, being raised to such a bulk, that they were forced to let it remain uncovered, for it was no less than five furlongs in compass (15).

parts to traffic in their country, as well for their own growth, as for foreign productions. Their country was stocked with many useful commodities, and abounded in all things necessary for life. They had a safe coast, convenient harbours, and whatever may incline us to think that they carried on a considerable trade. Besides, we know that they were very powerful by sea, maintained great fleets, and planted colonies, not only in the neighbouring islands, but even in Gaul, and beyond the pillars of Hercules.

Character. THEY soon degenerated from the valour of their ancestors, and became a most superstitious, effeminate, and voluptuous people; insomuch, that the Ionians, in the time of Herodotus, were looked upon as quite unfit for any military service <sup>o</sup>. They are said to have been the first who introduced the use of perfumes and garlands at banquets, and also of sweetmeats or desserts <sup>p</sup>. Maximus Tyrius, speaking of the different affections and inclinations of the various Greek nations and colonies, tells us, that the Crotoniates loved the Olympic sports, the Spartiates fine armour, the Cretans hunting, the Sybarites pompous dress, and the Ionians lascivious dances <sup>q</sup>. The Æolians and Dorians, being planted in a less fruitful country, were not so soon debauched by the soft climate of Asia; they were accounted no-ways inferior to the European Greeks, till they were subdued by the Persians, but having lost their liberty, they gave themselves up to idleness, and in a short time became quite unfit for action, and no less effeminate than the other Asiatics.

Their history. THE Greek colonies settled in Asia enjoyed their liberties, and lived according to their own laws, from the time of their migration to the reign of Cræsus king of Lydia, to whose superior power they were forced to submit, after having baffled all the attempts of his predecessors. They paid him a yearly tribute, furnished him with ships and mariners in time of war, and sent their respective quotas of land-forces when required; but at the same time were free from all oppression, and suffered to enjoy a profound tranquility under his mild government<sup>r</sup>. This made them oppose Cyrus when he first invaded Lydia, and reject the advantageous proposals of that prince. But, after the defeat of Cræsus and taking of Sardis, they sent ambassadors to the conqueror, offering to submit to him upon the same terms which had been formerly granted to them by Cræsus. Cyrus having heard them with attention, returned an answer in the following apologue : A piper seeing numerous shoals of fish in the sea, and imagining he might entice them ashore by his music, began to play ; but finding his hopes disappointed, he threw a net into the water, and drew a great many of them to the land. When he saw the fish leaping on the ground, since you would not dance, said he, to my pipe before, you may now forbear dancing at all. With this answer the Greek ambassadors returned home, and having communicated it to their countrymen, they resolved in a general assembly to fortify their cities against any sudden attack, and send ambassadors to solicit succours from the Lacedemonians. Pythermus, a Phocæan, was sent in the name of all the Greeks in Asia ; but the Spartans could by no means be prevailed upon to lend them any assistance. However they dispatched by sea some of their chief men to observe the motions of Cyrus, and interpose their good offices with him in behalf of their countrymen. These, putting in at Phocæa, sent Lacrines, the most considerable person among them to Sardis, with instructions to acquaint Cyrus, that if he committed any hostilities against the Grecian cities, the republic of Lacedemon would resent them as offered to herself. Cyrus, hearing them speak in this stile, inquired of the Greeks about him, who the Lacedemonians were, and what number of men they could bring into the field ? Being informed of these particulars, he answered the deputy, that he was no-ways afraid of a people, who in the midst of their cities had a place of public resort, where they met to impose on each other by mutual oaths ; and that if the gods preserved his life, they should have sufficient cause to be concerned for their own calamities, instead of troubling themselves about those of the Asiatics. These words were levelled at the Greeks in general, who had in their cities large squares, where they met to trade, a custom unknown to the Persians<sup>l</sup>.

Cyrus, having dismissed the Lacedemonian ambassadors with this answer, left Sardis, and, setting out for Ecbatan, charged Mazares one of his lieutenants with the reduction of Æolis, Doris, and Ionia. Mazares pursuant to his commission entering Ionia, took and destroyed the city of Priene, laid waste the fertile plains that were watered by the Mæander, and advancing to Magnesia, laid that city likewise in ashes. From Magnesia he marched to Phocæa, but before he made any attempts upon that important place, he fell sick and died. Upon his death Harpagus, being appointed to command the army in Ionia, laid close siege to Phocæa. The Phocæans, de-testing slavery, chose rather to abandon their native country, than submit to the Persian yoke; and accordingly, having put their wives, children, and all their most valuable effects on board their vessels, they set sail for the island of Chios, leaving the Persians in possession of an empty city. The example of the Phocæans was followed by the Teians, who, after Harpagus had made himself master of their walls, went on board their ships, and conveyed themselves and their families to Thrace, where they settled in the city of Abdera, which had been founded by the Greeks of the Ionian confederacy, under the conduct of Timesius, a native of Clazomenæ. The other cities of Ionia were all reduced by Harpagus, and likewise the Dorians, Æolians, and all the inhabitants of the upper Asia, except the Milesians, who, distrusting their own strength and that of the Ionians, had made a separate peace with Cyrus, and by a timely submission obtained the same terms which had been formerly granted them by Cræsus. The rapidity of these conquests struck the islanders with such terror, that they all submitted of their own accord. Thus all the Greek states, both in the islands and on the continent of Asia, were a second time conquered, and forced to live, under the Persian monarchs, in a state of greater subjection and dependency than they had ever proved before<sup>1</sup>. In the reign of Darius Hystaspis, they made an attempt towards the recovery of their antient liberty, and maintained a war against the whole power of the Persian monarchy, for the space of six years; but were again, in spite of their utmost efforts, brought under subjection, and punished with great severity by the haughty conqueror, for endeavouring to assert the rights which they had been unjustly deprived of. But of this war, and the many calamities which it drew upon the Greek states in Asia Minor, we have already given a particular and distinct account in the history of Persia<sup>2</sup>, to which we refer the reader.

THE Ionians assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Athens with an hundred ships; but as the king had undertaken this war for no other end but to be revenged on the Athenians for having sent some ships to the assistance of the Ionians when they attempted to shake off the Persian yoke, Themistocles, who commanded the Athenian fleet, imagined, that the Ionians served in this expedition against their will, and might therefore be easily prevailed upon to desert the Persians, and join their ancient allies and countrymen. But as no opportunity offered of conferring with them, or sending messengers, he sailed in person to the place where they used to take in fresh water, and there engraved on the rocks the following words :

 “ Men of Ionia, you are guilty of a heinous crime in fighting against your fathers, and helping to enslave Greece. Resolve therefore to come over to us ; or if you cannot do that, withdraw your forces from the enemy, and persuade the Carians to imitate your example. But if both these ways are impracticable, and you find yourselves under an absolute necessity of continuing in the Persian fleet, favour us at least when we come to an engagement ; and remember, that you are not only descended from us, but are the original cause of the Barbarians enmity against us”.
Themistocles had in so doing a double view ; he believed that this invitation, if not discovered to the king, would induce the Ionians to come over to the Greeks ; and on the other hand, if it should come to the king’s ears, he hoped it would make him distrust the Ionians, and dismiss them. The Ionians coming ashore the next day, as usual read on the rocks the invitation of Themistocles, and resolved to comply with it ; pursuant to which resolution when the two fleets engaged, the Ionians instead of falling upon the Athenians tacked about and made to sea. Their flight, which was soon followed by that of the Phœnicians, contributed not a little to the famous victory gained by the Athenians at Salamis <sup>w</sup>. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the Ionians by means of a certain Samian gave private notice to the Athenians of all that passed in the enemy’s fleet, assuring them, that as soon as the battle was joined they would desert the Barbarians <sup>x</sup>. This, according to our author, so encouraged the Greeks, before disheartened, that they attacked the Persian fleet, contrary to their former determinations, and gained that victory which is so famous in history <sup>y</sup>.

THE same stratagem was used by Leotychides, commander of the Greek fleet, before the battle of Mycale. The Ionians, Dorians, Æolians, and the inhabitants of the islands made no small part of the Persian army, which was drawn up along the shore in order to prevent the Greeks from making a descent into the country. Leotychides therefore, standing into the shore as near as he could, ordered a herald to speak thus to the Ionians in his name :
 “ Men of Ionia, hearken with attention to my words, for the Persians will not understand the advice I give you ;

“ when the battle begins, every one of you ought in the first “ place to remember liberty ; and the next, that the word “ agreed upon is Hebe, if any of you hear me not, let those “ who hear inform him”. These words had such an effect on the Greeks, that in the heat of the engagement they deserted the Persians, and joined their countrymen, which occasioned the total overthrow of the Persian army. Before the engagement the Persian generals had appointed the Milesians to guard the passes leading to the eminences of Mycale, that they might have a safe retreat in case they were put to flight, and guides to conduct them over the mountains, the Milesians being well acquainted with the country. But they, acting quite contrary to their orders, brought back by other ways to the enemy such as fled ; by which means few Persians escaped the general slaughter of that day <sup>a</sup>. Thus the Asiatic Greeks revolted a second time from the Persians, and their behaviour on this occasion was so pleasing to the Lacedemoni- ans, that they were for transplanting them out of Asia into Greece. For they were well apprised, that if the Ionians continued in Asia, they would be in perpetual alarms from an enemy that far excelled them in strength, and was near to them ; whereas their friends, who were at a great distance, could not be assistant to them so opportunely, and at such seasons, as their necessity might require. The Peloponnesians proposed to drive those nations out of Greece, which had sided with the Persians, and to bestow their territories and estates on the Ionians. Upon these promises the Ionians and Æolians were preparing to convey themselves and their effects over into Europe. But the Athenians persuaded them to remain in Asia, faithfully promising to assist them on all occasions to the utmost of their power. The Athenians were afraid that if the Ionians should settle in Europe, by the common concurrence of the Greeks, they would not for the future own Athens as their metropolis, and place of their original. The Pelopon- nesians readily yielded to the Athenians, and the Ionians upon second thoughts determined not to remove out of Asia <sup>a</sup> ; but upon the conclusion of the peace between the Greeks and Persians, which happened in the reign of Artaxerxes, one of the articles, sworn to by both parties, was, that all the Greek states of Asia should be made free, and allowed to live according to their own laws <sup>b</sup>.

THE Ionians, being thus delivered from the Persian yoke, entered into an alliance with the Athenians, who came by degrees to treat them as subjects rather than allies, obliging them to contribute to all the charges of the Peloponnesian war, no otherwise than if they had been their vassals. Nay, Euphemus, who was sent in the time of the Peloponnesian war to draw the Camarinæans into an alliance with Athens, owned that the Athenians had subjected both the Ionians and islanders, for having joined, said he, the Persians against their mother city <sup>c</sup>. This was but a poor pretence, since the victory which the Athenians gained at Salamis, was in great measure owing to the Ionians and other Greeks, who served on board the Persian fleet, as we have seen above. In the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, we find them again subject to the Persians, and governed by Tissaphernes, from whom they revolted to Cyrus the younger. Upon the death of Cyrus they sent ambassadors to the Lacedemonians, imploring their assistance and protection against Tissaphernes, who was returning to his government at the head of a numerous army, with a design to punish them for their revolt. The Lacedemonians, having now ended the long war which they had waged with the Athenians, laid hold of this opportunity of breaking again with the Persians, and sent first Thimbro, after him Dercyllidas, and lastly Agésilas their king, to invade the Persian provinces in Asia, where they made great conquests, and would have endangered the whole empire, had not Darius, by distributing large sums among the leading men in Greece, found means to rekindle the war there, which obliged the Lacedemonians to recal their king, and conclude a peace with the Persians equally disadvantageous and dishonourable to the Grecian name. For one of the articles was, that all the Greek cities in Asia should be subject to the king of Persia, and besides the islands of Cyprus and Clazomenæ. Thus were all the Greeks settled in Asia, with the utmost injustice and baseness, given up to the Persians <sup>d</sup>, whose yoke they bore till they were delivered by Alexander, who restored all the Greeks in Asia to the enjoyment of their antient rights and privileges <sup>e</sup>. After the death of Alexander, as they had neither strength nor courage to defend themselves, they fell under the power of the kings of Syria, and continued subject to them till the Romans, after having delivered Greece from the oppressions of Philip king of Macedon, obliged Antiochus III. surnamed the Great, to grant the same liberty to the Greek colonies in Asia, which they had procured for the Greek states in Europe <sup>f</sup>. Being thus again reinstated in their antient rights, most of the free cities entered into an alliance with Rome, and enjoyed such liberty as the Romans used to grant, till they were again brought under subjection by the famous Mithridates king of Pontus, whom they joined against the Romans, partly out of fear, and partly out of hatred to Rome. By his order they massacred, without distinction, all the Romans and Italians, whom either trade, or the sweetness of the climate had drawn into Asia. On this occasion the Ephesians distinguished themselves above the rest, not suffering even their famous temple of Diana to be an asylum to such Romans as fled to it. However, their ready compliance with the cruel and inhuman orders of Mithridates did not exempt them from the most tyrannical oppression. No wonder then, that, upon Sylla's arrival in Asia, they abandoned Mithridates, and declared for the Romans, as they had formerly deserted the Romans to side with Mithridates. Ephesus was the first that revolted, and the example of that metropolis was soon followed by Smyrna, Colophon, Sardis, Trallis, Hypæpene, and Mesopolis. The revolt of these cities made the king change his conduct, in hopes of keeping the Greek cities steady in his interest, and supporting his faction on the coasts of Asia, he restored all the Greeks to the full enjoyment of their liberties, declaring that even the slaves should have their share of this universal freedom<sup>a</sup>. But they did not long enjoy the liberty, which the king out of a selfish policy bestowed upon them. Sylla, having routed the several armies of Mithridates, and reduced all the Lesser Asia, revenged on the Asiatics the death of so many thousand Romans, whom they had inhumanly murdered, by depriving them of their liberty, and laying such heavy taxes and fines on their cities, as reduced them to beggary. The city of Ephesus was treated with most severity, Sylla having suffered his soldiers to live there at discretion, and obliged the inhabitants to pay every officer fifty drachmas, and every soldier sixteen denarii a day. The whole sum, which the revolted cities of Asia paid Sylla, amounted to twenty thousand talents, that is, 3,875,000 l. sterling, for the raising of which they were forced to sell not only their moveables, but even great part of their lands<sup>b</sup>. This was the most fatal blow Asia ever received, nor did the inhabitants ever after recover their antient splendor, notwithstanding the favour shewn them by many of the emperors, under whose protection they enjoyed, for many years at least, some shew of liberty.

The History of SICILY.

HAVING delivered in the two foregoing volumes and the former part of this, the history of the European and Asiatic Greeks inhabiting the continent, we shall now proceed to their various settlements in the adjacent islands, beginning with Sicily, the most considerable of all the islands in the Mediterranean, and in former times the theatre of many great and memorable events.

THIS great and fruitful island was antiently known by the Name. names of Sicania, Sicilia, and Trinacria or Triquetra; the two former were borrowed from the Sicani and Siculi, who peopled a considerable part of the country, and the latter from its triangular figure, formed by the three famous promontories of Pelorum, Pachynum, and Lilybæum (A). Cape Pelorum is now called by the natives Capo di Faro, or Capo della torre di Faro. It took its antient name, if we believe Valerius Maximus<sup>a</sup> and Pomponius Mela<sup>b</sup>, from the pilot

Pelortes,

Pelorus, who was killed by Hannibal. The Carthaginian seeing his ship brought into the straits of Sicily, and fancying that the pilot designed to deliver her up to the Romans, put him to death; but being afterwards convinced of his innocence, he erected a statue to him on the promontory, which from that time was called Pelorum, Pelorus, and Peloris. This fact is related by the abovementioned historians; but their disagreement in the circumstances of the story has made some writers doubt of the truth of this event. This promontory faces Italy, from which it is divided by the straits of Messina, reaching from the tower of the Faro, which is the most northern point of the island, to the Capo dell' armi, or Cape of arms, the most southern part of Calabria. These straits, called by the Latins Fretum Siculum, by the Italians il Faro di Messina, and by us the Fare of Messina, are, according to Pliny<sup>c</sup>, Strabo<sup>d</sup>, and other geographers, between twelve and fifteen miles over in the broadest place, and in the narrowest about a mile and a half; insomuch that when Messina was taken by the Carthaginians, many of the inhabitants are said to have saved themselves by swimming to the opposite coasts of Italy. This narrowness gave rise to an opinion, which once obtained among the antients, viz. that Sicily was originally joined to the continent of Italy by an isthmus, which was in process of time wore away by the fury of the waves and the violence of earthquakes. Pliny<sup>e</sup>, with his usual credulity, speaks of this separation as a thing not to be questioned. A modern writer of no mean character<sup>f</sup> goes farther, and even pretends to ascertain the time of this memorable event, telling us, that it happened in the reign of Acastus the son of Æolus, who was raised to the throne by the Siculi, about the time that the Israelites were delivered from the Egyptian bondage. He owns himself indebted for this remarkable discovery to Eustathius in his observations on Dionysius Periegetes<sup>g</sup>. But the most judicious among the antients look upon this pretended separation as fabulous, and speak of it as a thing that is only said to have happened<sup>h</sup> (B). The Fare of Messina is famous for the rapidity rapidity of its currents, and the flowing and ebbing of the sea, which is very irregular, and sometimes rushes in with such violence, that the ships riding at anchor are in danger. The famous Scylla and Charybdis, so much celebrated by the poets, are at the north entrance into the straits. The former is a rock on the coast of Italy, the latter a whirl-pool on the side of Sicily. The passage between these two was in antient times reckoned very dangerous<sup>1</sup>. The other two promontories are Pachynum facing Greece, and Lilybæum over-against Afric; the former is now known by the name of Capo Passaro, and the latter by that of Capo di Marsella, or Capo di Boeo (C).

THIS island lies between the 35th degr. 40 min. and the 38th 30 min. of north latitude, extending in longitude from 35 to 39 degrees. Its greatest length from Pelorum to Lilybæum is two hundred miles, its breadth from Pachynum to the city of Cephalædium, now Cefalu, 180, and the whole circuit of the island 600. Situation.

WE need not enlarge on its fertility, it being well known, Soil and that Sicily was antiently called the granary of Rome, and that climate. to this day, whatever desirable things nature has frugally bestowed here and there on other countries, are found in this as in their original seminary.

(C) Ælian, Pliny, Solinus, and Valerius Maximus tell us, that one, to whom they give the surname of Strabo, had such an extraordinary sight, that from a watch-tower on the promontory Lilybæum he discovered a fleet sailing out of the port of Carthage, and acquainted the Lilybæans with their bigness and number; and yet Carthage is about 180 miles distant from the coast of Sicily.

Cities, Messana
now Messina.

THE most remarkable cities on the eastern coast of Sicily, which faces Greece, and extends from Pelorum to Pachynum, are Messana on the straits of Sicily over-against Rhegium in Italy. This city was formerly called Zancle, which appellation some derive from the old Sicilian word Zanclos, signifying a hook, the shore on which it was built being of that shape<sup>k</sup>; others think it was so called from one Zanclus, who reigned in that part of the island<sup>l</sup>. But however that be, this city, according to the chronologists, was founded five hundred and thirty years before the siege of Troy, and nine hundred sixty four before Romulus laid the foundations of Rome. The inhabitants of this city, being greatly harassed by the pirates of Cuma, had recourse to the Messenians, a people of Greece, who, hastening to the assistance of the Zancleans, cleared their coasts, entered into an alliance with the citizens, and settled in their city, which was from them called by the Greeks Messene, and by the Latins Messana<sup>m</sup>. Pausanias<sup>n</sup> tells us, that Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, having entered into an alliance with the Messenians of Greece against the Zancleans, overthrew their forces, and, with the assistance of his allies, possessed himself of their city, which, in compliment to the Messenians, who had assisted him in this expedition, he called Messene. This event is mentioned also by Herodotus<sup>o</sup>, who ascribes all the glory of it to the *Sami*ans, the allies of Anaxilas, or, as he calls him, Anaxilaus. This city was afterwards seized by the Mamertini, as we shall relate anon, and made their capital, by which means it became one of the most wealthy and powerful cities of Sicily. It was the first town which the Romans possessed in the island, being put into their hands by the Mamertini. Taurominium, built on the ruins of the ancient city of Naxos, which was destroyed by Dionysius the tyrant, stood on the declivity of mount Taurus. The river Taurominius watered the territory of this city<sup>p</sup>; and its hills were famous for the excellent grapes they produced. It is now called Taormina, and is still a place of some consideration. The coast on which it stood was antiently called Copria, that is, dunghil, because the sea was supposed to discharge there the wrecks of such ships as had been swallowed up by the Charybdis<sup>q</sup>. The river Taurominius, which gave its name to the city, is now called Cantara. Catana stood on a gulf of the Ionian sea called the gulf of Catana, and is commended by the antients as one of the richest and most powerful cities of Sicily. It was built and peopled by the inhabitants of Chalcis, and continued in great splendor for many ages; but at last underwent the same fate as most of the other cities in the neighbourhood of mount Ætna, having been in great part consumed by the eruptions of that mountain, and buried in ruins by the dreadful earthquakes, which have often laid waste the whole neighbouring country. Its territory was watered by the river Amenes or Amenanus, now called the Judicello<sup>c</sup>. Murgentium, or Morgantia, was founded, according to Strabo<sup>d</sup>, by the Morgetæ, a people of Italy, who crossed over into Sicily with the Siculi, and built this city, at a small distance from the mouth of the Symæthus, now la Faretta. Thucydides<sup>e</sup>, Scylax, and Pliny<sup>f</sup> place it near the conflux of the Chrysas, now the Dittaino, and the Symæthus. Fazellus is therefore mistaken in supposing Morgantia to have stood at the mouth of the river Terias, called by the natives Fiume di San Leonardo. Stephanus confounds this city with another in Samnium bearing the same name. There are now no footsteps remaining of either of these cities. Leontini stood about five miles distance from the coast, ten from Catana, and twenty from Syracuse. It was built by the Chalcidians, under the conduct of Theocles the Athenian, in the first year of the thirteenth olympiad, as Thucydides informs us<sup>g</sup>. The territory of Leontini was watered by the Lissus, which falls into the Terias at the distance of eight furlongs from the city<sup>h</sup>. Leontini was defended in the time of Thucydides<sup>i</sup> by two strong citadels, the one called the citadel of Phocæa, the other the citadel of Bricinnia. At a small distance from the city was a lake abounding in fish, and about twenty miles in compass. The vapours arising from the marshes, made by the overflowing of the lake, greatly infected the air, which was there deemed very unwholesome; but to make amends for this, the fields were so fruitful, that, according to Pliny, they yielded an hundred fold<sup>k</sup>; whence the city of Leontini was called by Tully the grand magazine of Sicily<sup>l</sup>. The wines it produced were thought the most delicious of the whole island; but the inhabitants abused this benefit by their intemperance, which gave rise to the proverb, The people of

or Hybla.

Leontini are always at their cups<sup>b</sup>. Dionysius the tyrant, having made himself master of this city, removed the inhabitants to Syracuse. Polybius gives a very exact and minute account of Leontini, and to him we refer our readers for a more particular description of it<sup>c</sup>. The city of Hybla was built by the Sicani, who were driven out by a colony from Megarís in Greece. These new-comers, having enlarged and embellished the place, gave it the name of their native city<sup>d</sup>. The Hyblæan honey is, as every one knows, much celebrated by the Latin poets. The antient geographers mention three cities in Sicily bearing the name of Hybla; the city we are here speaking of stood on the eastern coast, and gave name to the gulf which the present natives call the gulf of Augusta, from the city of Augusta or Aousta on that bay. The second city of Hybla was situate on an eminence in the same place where the small town of Ragusi now stands, and was called the Little Hybla. The third, which was called the Great Hybla, is supposed to have stood between Catana and Hadranum in the territory of the present Paderno. Some pretend, that there are some traces of it still to be seen near the mouth of the Catara, formerly the Alabon or Alabis<sup>e</sup>.

Syracuse.

Syracuse, once the metropolis of all Sicily, and a most flourishing commonwealth, was, according to Tully<sup>f</sup>, the greatest and most wealthy of all the cities possessed by the Greeks. Thucydides equals it to Athens when that city was at the height of its glory<sup>g</sup>, and Strabo calls it one of the most famous cities of the world for its advantageous situation, the stateliness of its buildings, and the immense wealth of its inhabitants<sup>h</sup>. It was built, according to Thucydides and Strabo<sup>i</sup>, by Archias, one of the Heraclidæ, who came from Corinth into Sicily, in the second year of the eleventh olympiad. The abridger of Stephanus, and Marcianus of Heraclæa tell us, that it borrowed the name of Syracuse from a neighbouring marsh called Syraco. This stately city contained within its walls, which were eighteen miles in compass, four very considerable cities, as Strabo calls them, united into one, viz. Acradina, Tyche, Neapolis, and the island or Ortygia. In Acradina, the largest of the four, there was a vast square surrounded with porticoes, a magnificent temple dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, the Prytaneum, where the the public councils were held, and a spacious palace for the administration of justice ; not to mention several other buildings which were deemed master-pieces of architecture <sup>k</sup>. This quarter was situated on the sea-side, and divided from Neapolis and Tyche by a wall of an extraordinary thickness and height. The second city, called Tyche, stood between Acradina and the hill Epipolæ, having the former on the east, and Neapolis on the south. The chief ornaments of this division were a spacious and beautiful gymnasium, whither the youth resorted to learn all sorts of exercises, and several temples greatly admired for their inimitable structure, especially that of fortune, called by the Greeks Tyche, whence this division borrowed its name <sup>l</sup>. The third quarter, called the island or Ortygia was joined to Acradina, Tyche, and Neapolis by a bridge ; the most remarkable buildings in this part were the palace of Hiero, which afterwards became the habitation of the Roman prætors, and two magnificent temples, the one dedicated to Diana, and the other to Minerva, the two tutelary goddesses of Syracuse <sup>m</sup>. The last city was called Neapolis, or the new city, because built after the other three ; the chief ornaments of this city were a spacious amphitheatre, and two temples of wonderful architecture, consecrated to Ceres and Libera, or Proserpine. The statue of Apollo Temnites, which was afterwards carried to Rome, is celebrated by Tully as the most valuable monument in Neapolis <sup>n</sup>. Of these four cities Ortygia alone is now remaining ; there are indeed some footsteps still to be seen of the antient Syracusa in the ruins of the porticoes, temples, and palaces, which are described at length by Fazellus, to whom we refer the reader <sup>o</sup>. its spring is now dried up. Near the city stood a hill called Epipolæ, exceeding steep, and of very difficult access. When the Athenians besieged Syracuse, this hill was not inclosed with a wall as in after-ages, but defended by a fort called Labdalon<sup>p</sup>. On Epipolæ was the famous prison Latomia, which word properly signifies a quarry. Cicero gives us a minute account of this dreadful prison, which was a cave one hundred and twenty five paces long, and twenty foot broad, cut out of the rock to an incredible depth. It was the work of Dionysius the tyrant, who caused those to be shut up in it who had the misfortune to incur his displeasure<sup>q</sup>. The whole city was environed with a treble wall, so flanked with towers and castles at proper distances, that it was deemed impregnable. It had two harbours at a small distance from each other, being separated only by the island, viz. the great harbour and the small one, called otherwise Laccus; both were surrounded by stately edifices<sup>r</sup>. The great harbour was above five thousand paces in circumference, and the entrance of it five hundred paces wide, being formed on one side by a point of the island Ortygia, and on the other by the little island and cape Plennyrium, which was defended by a fort of the same name. Above Acradina was a third port, called the harbour of Trogilus. The river Anapris ran about a mile and half distance from the city, and emptied itself into the great harbour. Near the mouth of the river, and about five hundred paces from the city, stood a castle, called Olympia from the temple of Jupiter Olympius, which was the chief ornament of the place. Thucydides in his description of the city mentions only these three divisions, viz. the island, Acradina, and Tyche; whence it is plain, that Ncapolis was added after his time<sup>s</sup>. Syracuse underwent several revolutions before it was taken by the Romans, as we shall have occasion to relate in the sequel of this history; but was always one of the most wealthy and powerful cities of those times; for Gelon, who had made himself master of Syracuse in the year of Rome 260, and the other tyrants his successors, were become formidable both to the Greeks, Africans and Asiatics. Dionysius the younger, who governed this city, kept in constant pay 100000 foot and 10000 horse, besides a fleet of 400 sail. It is still a very considerable place, and well peopled, having two harbours, and a great many fine buildings.

the Frascolari and Camarana, near the coast. Nothing now remains of this great city but some ruins, and the name of Camarana, which the natives give to a tower and a neighbouring marsh. Thucydides <sup>r</sup> and Strabo <sup>s</sup> tell us, that Camarina was founded by the Syracusians, who afterwards, upon some dispute between the two cities, took it by storm, and levelled it with the ground. It was rebuilt by Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, and after many revolutions brought under subjection by the Romans in the first Punic war (E). This is the first city of note on the southern coast of Sicily, which lies opposite to Africa, and extends from cape Pachynum to Lilybæum. Next to Camarina stood Gela, a city once of great note, and Gela. said by Thucydides <sup>w</sup> to have been founded by one Antiphemus, who had made a descent in the island, being assisted in the enterprize by a body of two hundred Rhodians from the city of Lyndus. These gave the name of Lyndus, their native city, to their new habitation. Some years after a body of Cretans, under the conduct of one Entimus, landing in this part of the island, joined the Rhodians, and together with them peopled the city. In process of time the name of Lyndus was changed for that of the river Gela, called at present Fiume di Terra Nova, which watered the neighbouring territory <sup>x</sup>. This city is commonly thought to have stood at the mouth of the Gela, where Terra Nova now stands; but some place it in the neighbourhood of the present Alicate <sup>y</sup>. Agri- Agrigen-

(E) This city stood near a marsh, which infected the air with its pestilentious exhalations, and occasioned contagious distempers. Hence, though it was a defence to the city, the inhabitants drained it, contrary to the direction of the oracle which they had consulted. They had scarce finished the work, when the Syracusians attacking them on that side, took their city by assault, and utterly destroyed it. Hence the proverb Camarinam ne moveas, which was the answer of the oracle, and signifies that we ought not to expose ourselves to a greater evil in order to avoid a less (4). The marsh was the same with the present Lago di Camarina. Ptolemy is certainly mistaken in placing the city of Camarina at ten miles distance from the sea, and contradicts therein all the antient geographers.

der the conduct of the duumviri Aristo and Pistillus, about the 99th olympiad. It stood between the rivers Agragas and Hypsa, of which the former is now called Fiume di Gergenti and Fiume di San Biaggio, the latter Fiume Drago. We may judge of the situation and splendor of the antient Agrigentum from the description which Polybius gives us of it. “ It exceeds, says he, most cities in Sicily for its fortifications, beautiful appearance, and magnificent buildings. It stands a hundred and eighteen furlongs distant from the sea, but can conveniently import by water all sorts of provisions. It is by reason of its situation and fortifications one of the strongest places in the island. Its walls are built upon a rock, which by art is become inaccessible. The river, from which it takes its name, covers it to the south, and the Hypsa to the west; to the east it is defended by a fortress built on the brink of a precipice which serves instead of a ditch”. Among other remarkable buildings in it there were three temples greatly commended by the antients, viz. the temple of Minerva, the temple of Jupiter Olympius, and that of Jupiter Atabyris, so called from a mountain in the island of Rhodes, where that god was worshipped: For Agrigentum, as we have observed above, was built by the inhabitants of Gela, who were composed of Rhodians and Cretans. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the citadel called Omphace, which stood at a little distance from the mouth of Agragas, was much more antient than the city itself <sup>b</sup>. The temple of Jupiter Olympius was one of the most magnificent in Sicily. It was, according to Diodorus <sup>c</sup>, three hundred and forty foot in length, threescore in breadth, and in height a hundred and twenty. This writer highly extols the beauty and size of the columns which supported the building, the admirable structure of the porticoes, and the exquisite taste, with which the bas-reliefs and paintings were performed; and adds, that the last hand was never put to that stately edifice. We shall have occasion hereafter to speak of the immense and almost incredible wealth of the Agrigentines. Heraclea Minoa, so called, according to Diodorus <sup>d</sup>, because built by Minos king of Crete, stood on the banks of the Halycus, now the Platani, not far from the place which the natives call Castel bianco. Some writers tell us, that this city was built before the Cretans arrived in Sicily, and was called Macara, which name was by the Cretans, who seized on the place, changed into that of Minoa in honour of their king Minos. Diodorus is not very coherent with himself in the account he gives of it ; for in one place <sup>c</sup> he tells us, that it was built by Minos, and in another <sup>e</sup> that it was founded by the Cretans after their king's death. The Cretans were driven out by the Selinuntii, and these in their turn by a colony of Lacedemonians under the command of one of the Heraclidæ, from whom it borrowed the name Heraclea. There are still extant some medals with the name of this city and the figure of Hercules, from whom the leader of the Lacedemonians pretended to be descended.

Selinus was formerly a city of great note, and is rank- Selinus:
ed by the antients among the chief cities of Sicily. Ptolemy places it between the river Mazara and the promontory Lilybæum ; but herein he differs from all the antient historians and geographers, who speak of it as standing between the Mazara and the Hypsæ. Strabo <sup>g</sup> tells us, that it was built by the inhabitants of Megara in Sicily under the command of one Pammilus, about an hundred years after the foundation of their own city. Thucydides seems to allude to their origin when he calls them Selinuntians of Megara <sup>h</sup>. They had great quarrels with the inhabitants of Segesta about their frontiers, which kindled a bloody war between the two cities. The Segestani, being overpowered by their adversaries, had recourse to Hannibal the son of Gisco, who was then in Sicily at the head of an hundred thousand men. The Carthaginian did not let slip so fair an opportunity of punishing the Selinuntians for the insults they had offered his father. For Gisco, being banished Carthage, had taken refuge in Selinus, and perished there for want, the inhabitants refusing to afford him any relief while he was in the utmost distress. Selinus, not being able to hold out against so formidable an army, was taken and razed, and most of the citizens inhumanly massacred, without regard to sex or age. Some time after Hermocrates, the father-in-law of Dionysius the elder, being expelled Syracuse, joined the remains of the Selinuntii, who had escaped the rage of the Carthaginians, and repaired the city, which was subsisting in the second Punic war, but in Strabo's time quite deserted <sup>i</sup>. Diogenes Laertius tells us, that near Selinus was a marsh, which with its pestilentious vapours infected the whole neighbourhood ; to prevent which evil, Empedocles turned the streams of the two rivers Selinus and Hypsæ into the marsh, and by that means carried off the stagnating waters. The same author adds, that the citizens, in gratitude for so great a benefit, ordered divine honours to be paid Empedocles, and sacrifices to be offered to Æsculapius. The city borrowed its name from the river Selinus, and the river from the great quantity of smallage, called in Greek Selinon, which grew on its banks. The river Selinus is supposed to be the present Madiuni, and the city the place now called by the natives Terra delle pulci <sup>k</sup>. These are the most noted cities on the southern coast, which faces Africa. On that which lies over-against Italy, and is called by Ptolemy the western, but ought to be rather called the northern coast, were the following cities.

um.

Lilybæum, which gave name to the cape, was, according to Tully <sup>l</sup>, one of the strongest and most considerable cities of Sicily. There is nothing now remaining of it but the ruins of some aqueducts and temples, though it was still standing in Strabo's time <sup>m</sup>. The city of Marsala or Marsella, whence the cape is now called Capo di Marsella, is supposed to have been built out of its ruins. Lilybæum had a port, which was a safe retreat for ships even in Julius Cæsar's time <sup>n</sup>. The Romans indeed attempted several times to stop it up in their wars with Carthage; but their attempts proved unsuccessful, the heaps of stones which they threw into it being too weak to resist the violence of the seas and the storms. The Carthaginians, as Diodorus informs us <sup>o</sup>, laid the foundations of Lilybæum, after they had been driven from Motya by Dionysius the tyrant; and, according to the same writer <sup>p</sup>, Motya was taken by the tyrant the fourth year of the ninety fifth olympiad. But Diodorus herein contradicts himself, as he has but too often the misfortune to do; for he tells us elsewhere <sup>q</sup>, that it was besieged by the Carthaginians in the eighty first olympiad, that is about fifty two years before. The sepulchre of the sybil of Cumæ was formerly to be seen near this city <sup>r</sup>. Diodorus <sup>s</sup> speaks of a well near Lilybæum, whereof the waters inspired all those who drank them with a prophetic enthusiasm; whence the inhabitants paid a particular worship to Apollo.

num.

Drepanum, now Trapani, antiently a famous mart with a safe harbour, was so called from the Greek word Drepanos, signifying a scythe, such being the shape of the shore on which it stood. It was inclosed with strong walls, and fortified by Hamilcar, Hannibal's father, who kept it a considerable time, and made it the seat of war against the Romans, till by an order from Carthage he concluded a peace with Lutatius.

Near Drepanum was the little island of Columbaria, which the inhabitants now call La Columbara. In Drepanum died Anchises, if Virgil is to be credited<sup>c</sup>. Eryx stood on the top of a hill, bearing the same name, at a small distance from the sea, and the place now called Trepano del Monte. The city borrowed its name from the mountain, and the mountain, as is supposed, from Eryx the son of Venus, who is said to have been killed there by Hercules. Mela tells us<sup>d</sup>, that Æneas built a temple on the top of the mountain in honour of his mother Venus. It is certain, that the votaries of this goddess came in crouds from all parts of Greece, Italy, and Sicily, to make their offerings to her in this place; whence she was stiled Venus Erycina. Eryx was the seat of king Acestes, who so kindly entertained Æneas and his wandering Trojans. Hamilcar in the first year of the first Punic war razed the ancient city of Eryx, and repaired Drepanum with materials brought from thence. It was soon after rebuilt, for we find it to have been the last city which the Carthaginians held in Sicily, and delivered up to the Romans at the end of the same war. In Strabo's time it was almost quite deserted, few people resorting to the temple, after the Romans had built a magnificent one to Venus Erycina at a small distance from the gate Collina<sup>e</sup>.

Segesta, called by the Greek writers Egesta, and sometimes Segesta. Acesta, stood at a small distance from mount Eryx, and, according to an antient tradition, was built by Æneas, when he was by a storm driven on the coast of Sicily. Some writers add, that Egestus, or, as Virgil calls him, Acestes, was left in possession of the city by the founder, on his setting sail for Italy, and that from him it was called Egesta till it became subject to the Romans, who out of superstition changed the name of Egesta into that of Segesta (F). Others say, that

(F) The Romans, says Pompeius Festus (5) changed the name of Egesta, into that of Segesta, by adding to it the letter S. This change was wholly founded on superstition. For the word Egesta is the same, all but one letter, as Egelas, which signifies in Latin poverty or want; and such names, as imported any thing that was bad, alarmed the superstitious Romans, who thought them omens of the dangers that threatened the person who pronounced them. that it was built by Egestus before Æneas came into Italy, and some are of opinion, that it was founded by one Elymus a Trojan, whence the inhabitants of this district were called Elymi *. Their territory was watered by the Scamander and the Simois, two names given these rivers by the Trojans, in memory of those in their native country; the former is now Il fiume di San Bartolomeo, and the latter a rivulet without name. This city was taken by Agathocles tyrant of Syracuse, by whose cruel command all the inhabitants were put to the sword, and even the antient name of the place changed into that of Dicæpolis, which it did not long retain. Tully tells us, that it was ruined by the Carthaginians before the reign of Agathocles, if therefore Diodorus's account be true, it must have been rebuilt. According to Strabo's description of it, it stood near the place where the town of Barbara was built many ages after, at a small distance from Castle a Mare.

Panormus. Panormus, now Palermo and the capital of Sicily, was built by the Phœnicians some time before the arrival of any Greeks in the island †. Its territory was watered by the Orethus and the Leutherus, the former is now called Amiraglio, and the latter Baiaria. In the neighbourhood of this city stood antiently a strong fortress called Erēta, which name was common to it with the hill, which the natives call Monte Pellegrino. Himera. Himera was built by the inhabitants of Zancle or Messina, and utterly ruined by the Carthaginians ‡. It was afterwards rebuilt, and called by the Romans Thermæ Himerae, from the hot baths in its neighbourhood. Tully speaks of this city as one of the most considerable in Sicily §. Himera was the birth-place of the famous poet Stesichorus. Tully tells us, that among the ruins of the old city two statues were dug up, which were deemed master-peices of art; the one representing the city itself under the figure of a woman, and the other a stooping old man with a hook in his hand, supposed to be Stesichorus. The city borrowed its name from the river Himera, now fiume di Termini, which washed its walls (G).

on these groundless prejudices they changed the name of the city, which was first called Maleventum, into that of Bene-ventum, as they did that of Egesta into Segesta.

In the reign of Augustus it was made a Roman colony, as appears from some medals <sup>b</sup>. Alæsa, or Halæsa, was a very antient city of Sicily, and stood, as Fazellus conjectures, near the place where the city of Caronia stands at present, on the river Alæsus or fiume di Casonia. Near Alæsa was a fountain, which, as Solinus would make us believe, used at the sound of a flute to bubble up so that it could not be kept within the basin <sup>c</sup>. Agathyrna, which Strabo <sup>d</sup> calls Agathyrsum, and Antoninus's <sup>e</sup> Agathyrna, itinerary Agatinum, was according to Diodorus founded in the time of the Trojan war. Some think, that it stood near the place now called Son Marco, at a small distance from the promontory, which the Sicilians call Capo d'Orlando. These are the chief cities we find mentioned by the antient geographers on the coasts of Sicily. Among the inland cities, the following are the most remarkable.

Adranum, now Aderno, at the foot of mount Ætna, near a river formerly bearing the same name, as it does at present, being called Fiume d'Aderno. This city was built, according to Diodorus <sup>e</sup>, by Dionysius the elder, and was famous for the temple of Adranus, the tutelary god of the Siculi. Thither the inhabitants of the island and foreigners flocked at stated times of the year, to make their offerings and implore the protection of the deity of the place. Ælian tells us, that a thousand large mastiffs were constantly kept here, and that they were endowed with a particular instinct, which led them to fawn upon such as brought presents to the temple, to conduct drunken persons home in the night, and fall furiously on thieves, and tear them in pieces <sup>f</sup>. Centuripe, formerly one of the richest cities in Sicily, is now but a small village called by the natives Centorbe. It stood, according to Strabo <sup>g</sup>, at the foot of mount Ætna, not far from the river Symæthus, now La Faresta.

Enna stood on an eminence in the middle of Sicily, as Enna. Strabo <sup>h</sup> informs us; whence it was called, according to Di- running northward, and this is the river which gave the name to the city; the other runs southward, and falls into the African sea. The former is now called Fiume di Termini, and the latter Il Salso or Salso which name agrees with what the antients say of it, viz. that its waters had a salt taste, which they contracted by flowing through salt mines.

adorus <sup>l</sup>, the navel of Sicily. It was one of the strongest places in the island, and remarkable for its beautiful plains, fruitful soil, and the many lakes and springs which watered its territory. A modern writer derives the name of Enna from the word Ennaam, which in the Phœnician language signifies a fountain of pleasure <sup>k</sup>, the waters of this place being highly commended by the antients for their limpidity and wholesomeness. We are told by Diodorus <sup>l</sup>, that Ceres was born in this district, and that she first taught the inhabitants of Enna the art of agriculture. Diodorus adds, that the rape of Proserpine by Pluto happened near Enna, while the young goddess was gathering flowers in a neighbouring meadow. This opinion obtained among the Ennæans, who shewed a large cavern, which opened of itself, as they believed, to make the god a way to his infernal kingdom. Hence the worship which the Sicilians paid these two divinities, the magnificent temple which Gelo erected to Ceres in this city, and the solemn festival which the Syracusians annually celebrated near the fountain Cyane, supposed to have sprung up when the earth opened under Pluto's feet. The temple of Ceres was resorted to from all parts of Italy, Greece, and Asia, and was deemed one of the richest in Sicily. The antient city of Enna is supposed to have stood where Castro Janni now stands.

Engyum.

Engyum or Enguyum stood near mount Maurus, which the inhabitants call Mandonia, near the springs of Alesus. Cicero <sup>m</sup> speaks of Engyum as one of the most considerable cities of Sicily. It was founded by the Cretans, and was famous for a temple dedicated to Ceres, in which it was constantly affirmed that certain goddesses, called the Mothers, appeared from time to time. This temple was, according to Plutarch, built by the Cretans, and dedicated to the goddesses stiled the Mothers (H). That writer adds, that in the temple were lodged javelins and brazen helmets, which had been consecrated to the goddesses of the place by Meriones and Ulysses. These were the chief cities of Sicily in the ages we are to write

In the like manner the god, whose protection they implored, was often invoked by the name of father. Cicero speaks of a famous temple erected in the city of Engyum to Cybele, who was stiled the Great Mother (G).

Ætna, now Mount Gibel, or in one word Mongibello, is Mount the highest in Sicily, and famous for its frequent and dreadful rains. eruptions, which have often destroyed the whole country to a Ætna. great distance. It is said to be eight miles in height and seventeen in circumference. The lower parts are very fruitful, the middle shaded with woods, and the top covered with snow great part of the year, notwithstanding the flames and hot cinders it frequently throws up (1). The fire, which is continually burning in the bowels of this mountain, made the poets place here the forges of the Cyclopes under the direction of Vulcan, and the prison of the giants who rebelled against Jupiter. These fictions the vulgar soon took for truths, and looked on mount Ætna as the residence of Vulcan and the seat of his empire. Upon this supposition they erected a temple to him on the hill, in which was kept, as Ælian informs us <sup>a</sup>, a perpetual fire as in the temple of Vesta, this element being a symbol of Vulcan. Any extraordinary eruption was looked upon by the Romans as ominous, and two very dreadful ones are said to have happened, the one not long before the breaking out of the servile war in Sicily, and the other soon after the death of Julius Cæsar, both portending the bloody wars that ensued. The most remarkable conflagrations we read of since those times were in the years of the Christian æra 1169, 1329, 1408, 1444, 1447, 1536, 1554, by the last of which Catania and the neighbouring countries were very near being utterly destroyed, as they were also in 1699. But we must refer the reader for the causes of those eruptions, and a particular account of them, to Fazellus, Cluverius, and Leontinus in his Pyrologia Typographica. Next to Ætna in height and compass is mount Eryx, which we have spoke of above.

No country has produced men more famed for learning than Sicily ; but we need not enlarge on this subject, it being well known, that Æschylus, Diodorus Siculus, Empedocles, Gorgias, Euclid, Archimedes, Epicharmus, Theocritus, &c. were natives of this island.

The Æolian islands. THE Æolian islands lie off the north coast of Sicily, in the Tyrrhenian or Tuscan sea. They were so called from Æolus, who is supposed to have reigned there. They are also known by the name of the Vulcanian islands, because some of them vomited out flames like mount Ætna, and Vulcan was the tutelary god of all such places ; for the same reason they were called by the Greeks Hephestiades. Strabo, Diodorus, Mela, and Pliny count seven of them, viz. Lipara, Hiera, Strongylæ, Evonymos, Didymæ, Ericusa, Phenicusa. Lipara, now Lipari, is the best peopled and the largest of all the Æolian islands, being eighteen miles in compass. It is said to have borrowed its name from Liparus the son of Auson, who reigned in this island *. The soil is very fruitful, and the country furnished with great plenty of allom, sulphur, and bitumen. It has many medicinal baths, which were formerly much frequented ; whence it had the name of Thermessæ. Strongylæ, now Strombolo, is about ten miles in compass ; and the soil no less fruitful than that of Lipari, but the whole country is frequently laid waste by the flames which a mountain in the island throws out. The other islands are noways considerable, most of them being uninhabited and mere rocks. Ptolemy reckons up fifteen of these islands ; but, it is evident, he includes in that number several other little islands which are too far distant from the Æolian islands to be comprehended under that denomination. They are distant about forty miles from the north coast of Sicily, and fifty from the nearest part of the farther Calabria.

which is also called Maritima. The first is now called Levenzo, the second Favignana, and the third Maretano.

THE Cyclopes and Læstrigones were, according to Justin, The inhabitants. Pliny, Solinus, and Thucydides, the first inhabitants of Sicily. They are said to have settled in the territory of Leontium The Cyclopes and Læstrigones. and the countries in the neighbourhood of mount Ætna; but of their origin we know nothing except what we are told by the poets. That there were formerly Cyclopes, or giants, some moderns have endeavoured to prove from the remains of some dead bodies of a gigantic size, which have been found in several parts of this island. They pretend, that these giants were descended from Japhet, and that they came into Sicily after the confusion of languages<sup>p</sup>. Their inhumanity towards strangers, and the flames which mount Ætna, a part of their territory, was constantly vomiting out, gave occasion to the many fictions of the poets, especially that the Cyclopes fed on human flesh, and that they were employed by Vulcan to make thunderbolts for Jupiter.

country ; and then they abandoned their antient habitations, and retired to the western parts of the island, which they still inhabited in the time of Thucydides <sup>1</sup>. Some Trojans, after the destruction of their city landing in Sicily, settled among the Sicani, built the cities of Eryx and Egesta, and became one people with them, taking the general name of Elymi or Elymæi. They were afterwards joined by some Phocenses, who settled here on their return from the siege of Troy. The people properly called Siculi, or Sicilians, came over into Sicily, after the Sicani had for many ages enjoyed an undisturbed possession of the whole island. They were, according to Hellanicus of Lesbos, the antient inhabitants of Ausonia, properly so called ; but being driven from thence by the Opici, they took refuge in Sicily, and settled in that part of the island, which the Sicani had forsaken. As they were not contented with the narrow bounds which the Sicani allowed them, they began to encroach upon their neighbours ; whereupon a bloody battle ensued, in which the Sicani were utterly defeated, and confined to a corner of the island. The Siculi, now masters of the greater part of the country, changed the antient name of Sicania into that of Sicily <sup>2</sup>. Philistus, as quoted by Dionysius Halicarnassæus, tells us, that the Siculi were originally Ligures, and that they opposed Hercules, when, on his return from Spain, he attempted to cross the Alps out of Gaul into Italy. Notwithstanding their opposition, that great conqueror got safe into Italy, subdued the Ligures, and, having incorporated them into his army, carried them over into Sicily, it being his custom, as the same author acquaints us, to recruit his army with the people he had conquered, and, after they had assisted him in making new conquests, to reward them with new seats <sup>3</sup>. The Phœnicians likewise settled on the coast, and in the adjacent islands, for the conveniency of trade ; but upon the arrival of the Greeks retired into the country of the Elymi, in order to be nearer Carthage <sup>4</sup>.

Greeks.

ABOUT three hundred years after the arrival of the Siculi, the island began to be known to the Greeks. Of these the first that went thither were the Chalcidians of Eubœa, under the conduct of Phaëax, who built Naxos, and a famous altar of Apollo, which, as Strabo tells us, was still standing in his time without the city. The year after, which was, according to Dionysius Halicarnassæus, the third of the seventeenth olympiad, Archias the Corinthian, one of the Heracidae, laid the foundations of Syracuse. Seven years after a new colony of Chalcidians founded Leontini and Catana, after having driven out the Siculi who inhabited that tract. About the same time Lamis with a colony from Megara, a city of Achaia, settled on the river Pantagius at a place called Trotilum, where his adventurers lived some time in common with the Chalcidians of Leontini; but being driven from thence by the Leontines, he built the city of Thapsus, where he died. Upon his death, the colony left Thapsus, and, under the conduct of Hyblon king of the Siculi, founded Megara Hyblæa, where they resided two hundred and forty five years, till they were driven out by Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse. During their abode at Megara, they sent one Pamphilus, who was come from Megara in Achaia their original city, to build Selinus. This city was founded about a hundred years after the foundation of Megara. Antiphemus and Entimus, the former a Rhodian, the other a Cretan, led each a colony of their countrymen, and jointly built the city of Gela on a river of the same name, establishing in their new settlement the Doric customs, about forty five years after the founding of Syracuse. The inhabitants of Gela founded Agrigentum, an hundred and eight years after their arrival in Sicily, and introduced the same customs there. A few years after, Zancle was built by the pirates of Cumæ in Italy, but chiefly peopled by the Chalcidians, Samians, and Ionians, who chose rather to seek new settlements than live under the Persian yoke. Some time after, Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, drove out the antient proprietors, and, dividing their lands among his followers, called the city Messana or Messene, which was the name of his native city in Peloponnesus. The city of Himera was founded by the Zancleans under the direction of Eucleides, Simus, and Sacon; but peopled by the Chalcidians, and some Syracusan exiles, who had been driven out by the contrary faction. The Syracusians built Acræ, Chasmenæ, and Camarina; the first seventy years, the second ninety, and the third one hundred and thirty five after the foundation of their own city. This is the account which Thucydides, a most judicious and exact writer, gives us of the various nations, whether Greeks or Barbarians, who settled in Sicily<sup>c</sup>. He takes no notice of a colony from Crete, which, if Diodorus is to be credited, settled in Sicily long before the Greeks got any footing in that island. According to this writer, Minos, king of Crete, having invaded Sicily in pursuit of Dædalus, was there treacherously put to death by Cocalus king of the Sicani. The Cretans, who had attended him in this expedition, having lost their leader, and likewise their ships which were all burnt by Cocalus, resolved to settle in the island, and build a city; which they did accordingly, calling it from the name of their king Minoa. Some time after the inhabitants of Minoa, possessing themselves of a place strong by nature, in the heart of the country, built there the city of Engyum. After the destruction of Troy, Merion with other Cretans being cast away on the coasts of Sicily, were kindly entertained by their countrymen there, and admitted to share all the privileges of their city. Their power being thus increased with their numbers, they began to make frequent inroads into the neighbouring territories, and considerably extended their confines. In process of time they became one of the most wealthy colonies of Sicily, and built a most magnificent temple in honour of the Curetes or Corybantes; called in Crete the Mother Goddesses†. Strabo counts among the antient inhabitants of Sicily the Morgetes, who being driven out of Italy by the OEnotrians, settled in that part of the island, where the antient city of Morgantium stood‡. The Campani, who assumed the name of Mamertini, that is, invincible warriors, and the Carthaginians, who settled very early in Sicily, ought likewise to be counted among the antient inhabitants of the island; but of these we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the sequel of this history.

The History of the Sicani and Siculi.

As the authors, who have wrote the history of Sicily from the earliest times, and to whom both Diodorus and Thucydides refer us for a more full account of what they only hint at, have not, to the irreparable loss of the learned world, reached our times, we cannot pretend to give any satisfactory or connected history of those nations, that inhabited the island, before the arrival of the Greeks (K). Of the Læstrigones

(K) The authors who wrote the history of Sicily from the earliest ages are Timæus, Philistus, Antiochus of Syracuse, Hipys, and Theopompus. Timæus was contemporary with Plato, wrote the history of Sicily, and is often quoted and followed by Diodorus Siculus. Philistus flourished under the two Dionysuses, and wrote a complete history of Sicily from the earliest ages to his time. He was a native of Naucratis, but passed great part of his life at Syracuse, where he assisted Dionysius in the establishing of his authority. He married

Lastrigones and Cyclopes we know nothing but what we read in the poets, and is beneath the dignity of history to take notice of. We shall only say, that some writers have, not without good grounds, imagined, that the Lastrigones and Sicani were one and the same people <sup>a</sup>. As to the Sicani, they had at first as many kings as cities, but were in process of time brought under subjection to one common prince. Of all their kings we find two only mentioned in history, viz. Cocalus and Teutus; all we know of the latter is, that in his time the Sicani, being at variance among themselves, were subdued by Phalaris tyrant of Agrigentum, and Teutus himself taken by married the niece of Dionysius, unknown to him, and was on that account banished Sicily. He is often quoted by Josephus, and seems to have been an accurate writer (18). Antiochus of Syracuse is quoted by Dionysius Halicarnassensis as an author of great credit; he flourished about the 90th olympiad, and wrote the history of Sicily in nine books, which began with the reign of Cocalus, and ended with the state of Sicily in the reign of Darius Notus king of Persia. Pausanias mentions this author in these words; Antiochus son of Xenophanes, a Syracusan, says in his history of Sicily, &c. He is also quoted by Dionysius Halicarnassensis, who tells us, that he extracted his history from ancient and authentic monuments. Strabo, Hesychius, and Festus seem to pay a great deference to the authority of this writer. Hippias flourished either in the reign of Darius, or that of Xerxes, and was the first who wrote the history of Sicily, which history was afterwards abridged by one Myes. He is frequently quoted by Plutarch, Suidas, the scholiast on Aratus, and others. Theopompus, a native of the isle of Cbios, flourished in the reigns of Artaxerxes Ochus of Persia, and Philip the father of Alexander of Macedon. He was the disciple of Isocrates, and in the opinion of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, far excelled his master. Athenæus cites and commends him as a lover of truth, and one who spared no pains in the search of it. Besides many other excellent performances, he wrote the history of Philip, the father of Alexander, in three books; in one of which he gave an account of the affairs of Sicily from the beginning of the reign of Dionysius the elder, to the expulsion of Dionysius the younger (19). As the works of these authors have not reached us, we are left quite in the dark as to some of the most material points in the history of Sicily.

treachery in Vessa his capital<sup>1</sup>. Cocalus reigned long before him, and was, according to Diodorus, contemporary with Minos king of Crete, who, being highly incensed against Dædalus for helping his queen Pasiphaë to satisfy her unnatural lust, equipt a powerful fleet, and pursued him into Sicily, where Cocalus then reigned. Upon his arrival he sent messengers to Cocalus, requiring him to deliver up Dædalus. The Sicanian shewed himself disposed to comply with his request, entertained him very splendidly, and invited him to his palace, where he caused him to be privately stifled in a hot bath. The Cretans, who had attended him into Sicily, raised a stately monument to their deceased king, whose bones were many ages after dug up in laying the foundations of Agrigentum, and sent into Crete by Thero sovereign of that district<sup>2</sup>. In the time of the Peloponnesian war, the Sicani sided with the Lacedemonians; and afterwards with Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, against the Carthaginians; but were at last entirely subdued by the latter, and held in subjection till the Romans in the first Punic war rescued them from that bondage<sup>3</sup>.

THE Siculi were in like manner first subject to many, and afterwards to one common prince. Æolus, according to Diodorus<sup>4</sup> and Justin<sup>5</sup>, was their first king, and succeeded by Butes; as Butes was by Eryx. But the most renowned among their princes was Ducetius, who governed the Siculi with great wisdom, built the city of Palicon (L), and re-

(L) The city was so called from a neighbouring temple dedicated to the gods Palici, who were supposed to be two twin-brothers, and sons of Jupiter by the nymph Thalia. The temple was very famous for the wonders that were related of it; but far more for the sacredness of the oaths that were taken there, the violation of which was said to be always attended with sudden and exemplary punishment. This sacred place was a secure asylum for all persons, who were oppressed by a superior power; and especially for slaves, who were unjustly abused, or too cruelly treated by their masters. They continued safe in the temple till such time as they had made their peace by the interposition of mediators chosen by both parties; and there was not a single instance of a master's having forfeited the promise he had made to pardon his slaves; so greatly revered were the gods who presided in the temple for the severe vengeance they were believed to take on those who violated their oaths (20).

moved that of Neas, the place of his birth, from the hills to the champain country °. He engaged in a war with the Syracusians, by whom he was routed, and surrendering himself to them, was set at liberty, upon condition that he should leave Sicily, and lead a private life at Corinth (M). The Syracusians, having thus got rid of a powerful rival, reduced the whole country of the Siculi except the city of Trinacria alone, which refused to admit the Syracusians within the walls. This city was at that time the metropolis of the Siculi, and its inhabitants were accounted the best warriors of the whole na-

(M) Ducetius, according to Diodorus Siculus, united all the Siculi, the inhabitants of Hybla excepted, into one body ; by which means he became very powerful, and gained several considerable victories over the Syracusians, who began to give no small umbrage to the inhabitants of Sicily. But after many glorious successes, Ducetius was defeated in a pitched battle, and abandoned by the greatest part of his forces. The consternation, into which so sudden & general a desertion threw him, prompted him to take a resolution, which nothing but the utmost despair could suggest. He withdrew in the night to Syracuse, advanced as far as the great square in the middle of the city, and there falling prostrate at the foot of the altar, abandoned his life and dominions to the mercy of the Syracusians his professed enemies. Such a sight drew the whole city into the square, and the orators endeavoured to inflame the people thus assembled against the suppliant, whom providence had put into their hands, that they might revenge and punish by his death all the injuries he had done the republic. Such speeches incensed the multitude, who were ready to fall upon him even at the foot of the altar ; but, an assembly being convened, the wisest of the senators represented, that they were not to consider what punishment Ducetius might deserve, but how it behoved the Syracusians to behave on that occasion ; that they ought not to look upon him any longer as an enemy, but as a suppliant, by which character his person was become sacred and inviolable ; that it was worthy the goodness natural to the Syracusians to exert their clemency even towards those who least deserved it, &c. The people was greatly affected with this speech, and all to a man voted for sparing Ducetius's life. However, he was banished Sicily, and ordered to reside at Corinth, the original city of the Syracusians, who took upon them to furnish the exile with all things necessary to support himself suitably to his dignity. Ducetius, however, returned some years after into Sicily, under pretence of founding a new colony, and endeavoured to deliver his countrymen from the oppression they groaned under, but was prevented by death from accomplishing his design (21).

tion. The Syracusians therefore, having drawn together all their troops, marched out against the Trinacrians, who met them at some distance from their city, and offered them battle. Both armies engaged with the utmost fury, and the victory was long doubtful. But at last the Trinacrians were overpowered with numbers, and thinking it beneath them either to beg quarter or to fly, were all to a man killed on the spot. Such of them as were wounded, preferring death to captivity, dispatched themselves. The Syracusians, having gained so compleat a victory over a people never before subdued, levelled the city with the ground, sold all the women and children for slaves, and sent the spoils by way of thanksgiving to the temple of Apollo at Delphos<sup>p</sup>. Thus were the Siculi reduced by the Syracusians; but they did not long continue subject to them; for in the war which not long after broke out between the Syracusians and Athenians, under the conduct of Nicias, we find the former soliciting the Siculi to join them against a foreign enemy, and espouse the cause of Syracuse as their own. But the Siculi were so far from complying with their request, that they sent powerful succours to the Athenians, and cut in pieces a body of Spartans that was marching to the relief of Syracuse<sup>q</sup>. In the war which was soon after kindled between Carthage and Syracuse, they assisted the Carthaginians with an army of twenty thousand men<sup>r</sup>. But in the war which Dionysius the elder made upon the Carthaginians with a design to drive them out of the island, they assisted the Syracusians to the utmost of their power. The Carthaginians prevailed in this war, and the Siculi, notwithstanding the assistance they had lent Dionysius, were by him abandoned, and given up to the Carthaginians, whose yoke they bore till the time of Timoleon the Corinthian, who restored most of the cities belonging to the Siculi to the full enjoyment of their antient liberties<sup>s</sup>, as we shall have occasion to relate at length in the sequel of this history. This is what we have been able to gather relating to the first inhabitants of Sicily, from the few fragments that are still remaining of the authors, who have wrote at length on that subject. We shall now proceed to the history of the Greek colonies in Sicily, beginning with that of Syracuse, the most powerful state and eminent city in the whole island.

The History of SYRACUSE.

WHAT kind of government first prevailed in the city of Syracuse is not well known. We find one Polis, mentioned by Athenæus : and Ælian *, as reigning there in the earliest times ; whence some have concluded, that the city was first governed by kings. It is certain, that monarchical government, if first introduced, was not of long continuance, being soon changed into a democracy, as is manifest from Aristotle †, Diodorus Siculus ‡, and Justin §. But as the history of that republic is for the space of two hundred years overcast with an impenetrable mist for want of records, we shall begin with the reign of Gelon, in whose time Syracuse began to make a very considerable figure, and thenceforward furnishes many great and memorable events for the space of above two hundred years. During all that time it exhibits a perpetual alternative of slavery under tyrants, and liberty under a popular government, till it was at length reduced by the Romans, and made part of their empire.

Gelon was born in the city of Gela, whence he probably took his name (N). He signalized himself in the wars, which Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, carried on against the neigh-

(N) The first of Gelon's ancestors we find mentioned in his history was one Oecetor, who was born in the island of Telus, but went to settle at Gela, whence he was driven with the other inhabitants by Antiophanes and the Lyndians of Rhodes, when they possessed themselves of that city. In process of time, one of his descendants, by name Telines, was created by the inhabitants of Gela high-priest of the infernal gods. At what time the family returned to Gela is not known. Herodotus (22) informs us, that Telines was the first of the descendants of Oecetor, who made any figure, and that some of the inhabitants of Gela being expelled in a sedition, he by the authority of his function brought them back to their native country, for which good office the priesthood was continued in his family.

bouring states, most of which he reduced, and was very near making himself master of Syracuse, after having defeated the Syracusians in a battle fought on the banks of the Florus; however, he obliged them to deliver up to Hippocrates the city of Camarina, which they had ever possessed to that time. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon, under pretence of defending the rights of the tyrant's children, his wards, took up arms against his own citizens, and, having overcome them in a battle, seized on the sovereignty for himself. After this success, he undertook to restore some Syracusians, who had been expelled the city by the contrary faction. With these exiles he marched from Casmene to Syracuse, where he was received by the populace with loud acclamations, and put in possession of the city. Being now master of so wealthy a place, he gave the government of Gela to his brother Hiero, and bent all his thoughts on the embellishing of Syracuse, and extending the limits of that state. His first care was to people it well, and therefore, having destroyed the city of Camarina, he transferred the inhabitants to Syracuse. He had soon after some disputes with the Megarians, who were supported by all the Eubæans that inhabited Sicily. But their joint forces were not able to cope with Gelon, who drove them out of the field, took and razed their cities, and transplanted the most wealthy among the inhabitants to his favourite city, allowing them to enjoy the same rights and privileges as the natives. The common people, though they had no part in promoting the war against him, he sold for slaves, obliging those who purchased them to transport them out of Sicily, saying, that it was more easy to govern a thousand men of substance, than one who had nothing to lose*. By this means the power of Syracuse rose in a short time to a very great height, and the friendship of Gelon was courted, not only by the neighbouring states, but by those of Greece, namely of Athens and Lacedemon, who jointly sent ambassadors into Sicily, inviting him to enter into an alliance with them against Xerxes king of Persia, who was ready to invade Greece with a formidable army. Gelon, it seems, had been before this time engaged in a war with the Carthaginians, and on that occasion had implored in vain the assistance of the Athenians and Lacedemonians, for he upbraided the ambassadors with the contempt Athens and Lacedemon had shewn him, when he solicited succours from them against the Carthaginians. However, he declared at the same time, that he was so far from retaliating such an ungenerous treatment, that, on the contrary, he was ready to supply them with two hundred galleys, twenty thousand men compleatly armed, two thousand horse, two thousand bow-men, two thousand slingers, two thousand light horse, and besides to furnish the whole Greek army with corn during all the time of the war, upon condition they would appoint him commander in chief of all their forces. This proposal was rejected by the ambassadors with indignation, who told him, that if he was willing to succour Greece under the conduct of the Athenians and Lacedemonians, they would willingly enter into a confederacy with him against the common enemy, but, if he disdained to obey their orders, they did not care for his assistance. Gelon replied with a great deal of temper, that he could not help thinking he had a better claim to the supreme command, than either the Lacedemonians or Athenians, since he had a far greater number both of sea and land forces; but, however, he would abate something of his first pretensions, and be satisfied with the command either of the fleet or the army, and allow them to chuse which of the two they liked best. The ambassadors, notwithstanding the straits their respective countries were in, would hearken to no such proposals; whereupon they were commanded by Gelon to depart forthwith his dominions <sup>b</sup>.

IN the mean time Gelon being informed that Xerxes had already crossed the Hellepont, and apprehending that the Greeks would not be able to resist so formidable a power, dispatched to Delphos one Cadmus, a person whom he could confide in (O), with rich presents, enjoining him to wait the event of a battle, and in case Xerxes should conquer to present him with the treasure, and pay him homage in his name; but if the Greeks should get the better of the Barbarian, to bring back the presents to Sicily <sup>c</sup> (P). Gelon, it seems, was at this time quite ignorant of the alliance which Xerxes had concluded with the Carthaginians before he undertook his expedition into Greece. By that treaty it was agreed, that while the Persians invaded Greece, the Carthaginians should fall on those who were of the Greek name in Sicily and Italy, that they might be diverted from assisting one another. Pursuant to this agreement, the Carthaginians made vast preparations with a view to recover the places which they had formerly possessed in Sicily. It is not exactly known, at what time the Carthaginians first carried their arms into Sicily; all we are certain of is, that they were possessed of some part of it as early as the first year after the expulsion of king Tarquin at Rome; for in the time of the first consuls Brutus and Valerius the Romans and Carthaginians entered into a treaty, chiefly in relation to navigation and commerce, whereby it was expressly stipulated among other things, that the Romans, who should touch at Sardinia, or that part of Sicily which belonged to the Carthaginians, should be received there in the same manner as the Carthaginians themselves <sup>d</sup>. Hence it is manifest, that the Carthaginians were already masters of Sardinia and part of Sicily. This treaty was concluded about twenty eight years before Xerxes invaded Greece; but at the time of that expedition the Carthaginians had not a foot of ground in Sicily, having been driven out by Gelon, as appears from that prince's speech to the Athenian and Spartan

(O) Cadmus had been formerly lord of Cos, the dominion of which island he had received by inheritance from his ancestors; but because they had usurped that sovereignty, and unjustly deprived the inhabitants of their liberty, Cadmus voluntarily resigned his authority, restored the Coans to their antient rights and privileges, and retired to the city of Zancle in Sicily, where he lived a private life. Gelon, who was well acquainted with his character, sent him to Delphos on this occasion, entrusting him with presents of an immense value. Neither was he deceived in the opinion which he had conceived of his integrity; for Cadmus no sooner heard that the Persians had been defeated, and that Xerxes was retiring with his forces, than he returned to Sicily, and delivered up to Gelon the treasures he had entrusted him with, though he might with impunity have appropriated them to himself (23).

(P) The Sicilian writers, as Herodotus informs us, vary in some particulars of this account, and say, that Gelon, having at last prevailed with himself to serve under the Lacedemonians, would have assisted Greece in her distress, if his own dominions had not been invaded by the Carthaginians. These authors make no mention of any alliance concluded between the Persians and Carthaginians; but tell us, that the Carthaginians were invited into Sicily by Terillus, who had been tyrant of Himera, but dispossessed of his government by Theron tyrant of Agrigentum, to revenge which injury, at the instigation of Anaxilas tyrant of Rhegium, who had married his daughter, he had recourse to the Carthaginians, not doubting but they would gladly embrace so favourable an opportunity of invading Sicily (24).

ambassadors related at length by Herodotus *. No wonder then, that the Carthaginians readily embraced so favourable an opportunity of recovering their dominions in Sicily, and joined in alliance with Xerxes, who was an irreconcilable enemy to the whole Greek nation. The preparations for this war are said to have been continued for three years, during which time Hamilcar the son of Hanno, who was charged with the management of it, not only railed what forces he could in Africa, but also with the money sent him by Xerxes hired a great number of mercenaries in Spain, Gaul, and Italy; so that his army amounted to three hundred thousand men, and his fleet to two thousand ships of war and three thousand transports. With this formidable army Hamilcar sailed from Carthage, and landing without opposition at Panormus, laid siege to Himera a maritime city in that neighbourhood. Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum, whose daughter Gelon had married, was then in possession of Himera, having driven from thence Terillus to whom that city of right belonged. The tyrant seeing his city all on a sudden invested with so numerous an army, dispatched messenger after messenger to his son-in-law, imploring a speedy succour. Gelon, upon the first notice he had of the straits Theron was in, drew together an army of fifty thousand foot and five thousand horse, and marched with all possible expedition to his relief. Hamilcar, on his sitting down before Himera, which was a town of great strength, had caused two large camps to be well fortified; in one of which he lodged his land-army; and his ships, which he had caused to be drawn ashore, in the other, placing there all his marines for their defence. Gelon, on his arrival at Himera, intercepted a courier, carrying letters from the inhabitants of Selinus, confederates of the Carthaginians, to Hamilcar, whereby he understood, that Hamilcar was to offer the next morning in the camp of the marines a solemn sacrifice to Neptune, and that he had appointed the Selinuntine cavalry to join him the same day in the said camp. Gelon, taking advantage of this intelligence, drew out an equal number of his own horse, ordering them to advance to the enemy's camp about the time agreed on, as if they were the Selinuntines. His orders were put in execution, and the body of cavalry admitted without the least suspicion into the camp. Hamilcar was then busy in sacrificing, and the greater part of the soldiery attending him without arms. The Syracusians therefore, without the least opposition, making up to Ha*milcar*, killed him, pursuant to their general's orders, cut in pieces most of his marines, and set fire to the ships. In this critical conjuncture, Gelon, who had notice of the success by a signal given him from the top of a neighbouring hill, drew out his army and attacked the other camp. The Carthaginians at first made a gallant resistance; but when news was brought them of their general's death, and at the same time seeing all their fleet in a blaze, they had no longer courage to stand their ground, but betook themselves to a precipitous flight; and then the slaughter was dreadful. We are told, that no fewer than an hundred and fifty thousand were killed in the pursuit; the rest retired to an eminence, where they made head against the enemy; but being surrounded on all sides without any hopes of relief, they were obliged, for want of provisions, to surrender at discretion; so that of this mighty army, the greatest that had ever been raised in those western parts, not one single man made his escape <sup>t</sup>. Herodotus tells us, that this battle was fought the same day as that of Salamis, but Diodorus Siculus will have the Carthaginians to have been defeated the same day that Leonidas was killed at Thermopylae. After the battle Gelon amply rewarded all those who had signalized themselves in the action, especially the body of horse, to whom he was chiefly indebted for the victory. The greatest part of the spoils, which were of an immense value, he offered to the gods, adorning with them the temples of Syracuse and Himera. The captives he shared with his allies, who employed them in public works for the common good; and so many were taken, that all Africa, as our author says, seemed to have been transplanted into Sicily. Some of the private citizens of Agrigentum, who had distinguished themselves above the rest, had five hundred a-piece. They were all put in irons, and set apart for the public service; and on this occasion it was, that the Agrigentines built their famous temple, and made those conduits, which were so much admired by the antients, and called Pheaces from one Pheax, who was the overseer of the work <sup>g</sup>.

Of the two thousand ships of war and three thousand transports, of which the Carthaginian fleet consisted, eight ships only, which happened to be out at sea when the camp of the marines was taken, made their escape, and sailed for Carthage; but before they reached that place they were all cast away, a few men only being saved in a small boat. These arriving at Carthage brought the dismal news of the entire defeat of their army and the loss of their fleet. The grief, consternation, and despair, which such an unexpected disaster occasioned in the city, is not to be expressed. As the Carthaginians in all great reverses of fortune ever lost their courage, and sunk into despair, they looked upon themselves as utterly ruined, expecting every moment to see the victorious army land at Carthage. In this fright they immediately dispatched ambassadors into Sicily, enjoining them to strike up a peace with Gelon upon any terms. The ambassadors without delay put to sea, and landing at Syracuse threw themselves at the conqueror's feet, and with many tears begged him to receive their city into favour, and grant them a peace upon what conditions he should think fit to prescribe. Gelon heard them with great humanity, and, being touched with compassion, granted them a peace upon the following conditions; viz. that they should pay two thousand talents of silver to defray the expences they had put him to, build two temples, where the articles of the treaty should be lodged and kept as sacred, and for the future abstain from offering human sacrifices. This last article shews the humanity of Gelon's temper; and indeed no prince ever gave more instances of good nature than he, after his authority was once established. Some acts of severity, which he is said to have practised before he was firmly seated on the throne, are generally ascribed to his counsellors, who prompted him to them against the natural bent of his humane temper. The Carthaginians did not think this a dear purchase of a peace, which was absolutely necessary for their affairs, and which they hardly durst hope for. They shewed their gratitude to Damarata, Gelon's wife, who had been chiefly instrumental in procuring them so favourable a peace, by sending her a crown of gold, which was valued at an hundred talents of gold. This crown Gelon turned into money, and coined pieces called from his wife's name Damaretia, each of them being worth ten Attic drachmas <sup>h</sup>.

Gelon, after the conclusion of the peace, having nothing to fear from Africa, resolved to embark his troops, and passing over into Greece, join his countrymen there against the Persians. Upon second thoughts he had changed his mind, and resolved rather to serve under the Lacedemonians and Athenians, than suffer the barbarians to insult over those of the Greek name. But while all things were in a readiness for this expedition, a messenger from Corinth brought him the joyful news of the victory, which the Greeks had gained at Salamis, and at the same time acquainted him, that Xerxes with a great part of his army had left Europe. Hereupon he disbanded his army, after having commended his soldiers and officers for the forwardness they had shewn to assist their countrymen in Greece, and given each of them some token of his favour. He commanded the allies to return to their respective homes, and the mercenaries he quartered in places at a great distance from Syracuse his metropolis. And now having no troops within, or near, the city, he summoned a general assembly of all the inhabitants of Syracuse, commanding them to come armed, as if they were to encounter an enemy. When they were met, he himself repaired to the assembly without arms or guards, and there gave them an account of his whole conduct, shewing to what uses he had applyed the several sums with which he had been entrusted, and in what manner he had employed his authority; adding, that he had never any thing else in view but the public welfare; but, however, if he had through ignorance done any thing amiss, they were at full liberty to inflict upon him what punishment they thought fit, since they were all well armed, and he without arms or guards to screen himself from their vengeance. The numerous assembly struck with so unexpected a speech, and still more with the unusual confidence he reposed in them, answered with loud acclamations, calling him their great benefactor, their deliverer, their king. This last title Gelon had ever declined, stiling himself only prætor of Syracuse; but the Syracusians obliged him, before he left the assembly, to accept of it, and with one consent invested him with the supreme authority<sup>1</sup>. Their gratitude did not stop here; a decree was passed, without opposition, settling the crown, after his death, on his two brothers, Hiero and Thrasybulus. And because he had, by coming without arms or guards into the assembly, put his life into their hands, the assembly commanded a statue to be erected representing him simply in the habit of a citizen, hoping thereby to transmit the memory of so remarkable an action to the latest posterity<sup>2</sup> (Q).

(Q) This statue met afterwards with a very singular fate. About a hundred and thirty years after it had been set up, Timoleon, having restored the Syracusians to their antient liberty, thought it advisable to sell all the statues of the princes, who had governed till that time, in order to erase the least footsteps of tyranny, and

THE Syracusians had no cause to repent their having entrusted him with the sovereign power ; for he employed the short time he reigned in the truly royal care of making his people happy. He was the first man, as our author observes <sup>1</sup>, who became more virtuous by being raised to the throne. Before his power was established, he was, contrary to his natural disposition, obliged to use some severity ; but when the supreme authority was by the common consent of the citizens put into his hands, he made it his only study to oblige all, and serve the public to the utmost of his power, without any regard to his private ease or advantage. The first thing he did, after his accession to the throne, was, to bestow on ten thousand foreigners, who had served under him, all the rights and privileges of the Syracusan citizens. This he did with a view to people his capital, to encrease the power of the state, and reward the services of so many brave men, who had exposed their lives for the defence of the city <sup>m</sup>. He was, as Plutarch informs us <sup>n</sup>, particularly famous for his honesty, truth, and sincerity ; for he is said never to have wilfully wronged the meanest of his subjects, and never to have promised a thing which he did not perform. Happening once to be in great want of money for the carrying on of an expedition, and, on the other side, not caring to load his subjects with extraordinary taxes, he convened the people, laid before them the state of his finances, and desired them to contribute voluntarily what every one could afford, and should think proper. The Syracusians, who were not yet well acquainted with Gelon's character, for this happened before his victory over the Carthaginians, seemed unwilling to be at any expence on account of the expedition, for which the money was designed. He therefore entreated them to lend him the necessary sum, assuring them, that though it was to be employed for the public good, they should be reimbursed as soon as the war was ended. He was then furnished with the money he wanted, which he not only repaid at the time agreed at the same time to relieve the wants of the people. But first he brought them to a trial as so many criminals, hearing the depositions and witnesses against them. They were all condemned with one voice, the statue of Gelon excepted, which found an eloquent advocate in the sincere gratitude the citizens still retained for so beneficent a prince (25).

on, but divided great part of the booty, which he got in that expedition, among those who had lent him it °.

ONE of the chief objects of his attention was the encouraging of agriculture, which he took great pains to make his subjects look upon as an honourable employment. He animated the husbandmen by his presence, and took delight in employing his spare hours in working with them in the fields. His design in so doing was not, says Plutarch <sup>p</sup>, merely to render the country rich and fruitful, but to inure his subjects to toils, and by that means preserve them from a thousand disorders, which inevitably accompany a soft and indolent life. He was a professed enemy to all luxury, pomp, and ostentation ; and ever used his utmost endeavours to banish from his dominions all such callings as had a natural tendency to debauch the manners, and enervate the courage of his subjects. From his infancy he shewed a great disinclination to music, which was at that time in great request among the Greeks ; whence while he was one day at an entertainment, a lyre being presented, according to a custom that then prevailed, to each of the guests, when it was Gelon's turn to play, he, instead of sounding the instrument as the rest had done, caused his horse to be brought, and mounting him with wonderful agility and grace, shewed that he had learned a more noble and manly exercise, than that of playing on the lyre <sup>q</sup>.

EVER since the defeat of the Carthaginians the several cities of Sicily enjoyed a profound peace ; such as had sided with the enemy were, upon their first application, generously pardoned by the conqueror, and suffered quietly to enjoy their antient liberties. The Syracusians, above all others, were happy under the auspicious government of so good and beneficent a prince. Their republic, indeed, was changed into a monarchy ; but the laws, and not the monarch, bore the whole sway. Their properties were as safe, their liberties as extensive, as when they were their own masters, and their city in a far more flourishing condition than ever. Their king assumed no part of the kingly office, but the toils and cares of it, and the satisfaction of procuring happiness to others, which of all satisfactions is the greatest. He was often heard to say, that the Syracusians in placing the crown upon his head could have no other view than to engage him, by so signal a favour, to defend the state, to preserve order in all things, to protect innocence and justice, and to exhibit, by his simple, modest, frugal, and regular life, a pattern of all civil virtues to his subjects. And this design he answered above any prince that ever had swayed a sceptre before him; his whole life being taken up in promoting the worship of the gods, the observance of the laws, and the welfare of his subjects. But his reign was short, heaven having only shewn, we may say, to the world, that those, who in after-ages were to be set over others, might in him have a perfect pattern of all the virtues that are becoming so eminent a station. He died of a dropsy, in the seventh year of his reign, and the grief of his subjects for the loss of their common father, and best friend, as they not undeservedly stiled him, was equal to the love and esteem they had always bore him. Even on his death-bed he gave an instance of his respect for the laws; the Syracusians had enacted one against the extravagant pomp of funerals, and Gelon, always willing to confirm with his example what the people agreed on, begged his brother Hiero, who was to succeed him, to take care that this law was strictly observed in his funeral. The whole city accompanied the body of their beloved king to the place where it was to be interred, though it was above 20 miles distant from Syracuse. The people, in token of their gratitude and affection for so loving a prince, erected in the place where he was buried, a magnificent mausoleum, surrounded with nine towers, of a surprizing height and exquisite structure, and decreed him those honours, which were then paid to the demi-gods or heroes. The Carthaginians afterwards demolished the mausoleum, and Agathocles the towers; but says our historian, neither violence, envy, nor time, which destroys all other things, could efface the glory of his name, or abolish the memory of his exalted virtues and noble actions, which love and gratitude had engraved in the hearts of his subjects (R).

AFTER Gelon's death, the sceptre continued near twelve years in his family. He was succeeded by Hiero his eldest brother, who is commended by some of the antients as an excellent prince, and by others represented as a covetous, headstrong, and cruel tyrant. To reconcile these writers we must distinguish the periods. In the beginning of his reign he behaved more like an unjust tyrant, than a lawful prince; he thought himself above the laws, despised his subjects, and, led by his covetous temper, impoverished the people to enrich himself. His conduct, so unlike that of his predecessor, soon made him the object of the public hatred; but the Syracusians bore with his vices, out of the great veneration they had for his brother's memory, which was the only thing that restrained them from rising in open rebellion. He was extremely jealous of his brother Polyzelus, whose great interest and credit among the citizens made him suspect, that he designed to drive him from the throne. He therefore employed only foreigners and mercenaries about him, suffering no Syracusan to set foot in his palace. In order to get rid of Polyzelus, he resolved to put him at the head of a great army, which he was going to send to the assistance of the Sybarites against the Crotoniates, hoping he might lose his life in that expedition. But Polyzelus, being well apprized of his design, refused the command, which so exasperated the tyrant, that he would have caused him to be put to death, had he not by a timely flight saved himself in the territories of Theron, king of Agrigentum, who had married his daughter. Hiero demanded him, but Theron could not by any threats be prevailed upon to deliver up his father-in-law, who had taken sanctuary in his dominions. This gave rise to a war, which lasted many years, between the kings of Syracuse and Agrigentum, and was at last ended in the following manner. The inhabitants of Himera, being grievously oppressed by their governor Thrasyldeus the son of Theron, and not daring to complain to his father, sent ambassadors to Hiero, offering to deliver up to him their city, and join him against his rival Theron. But Hiero, detesting their treachery, discovered the whole plot to Theron, who out of gratitude offered to conclude a peace upon terms that were highly advantageous to Hiero. The conditions were accordingly agreed to by the contending parties, and the two kings reconciled. On this occasion Theron, interposing his good offices in behalf of Polyzelus, prevailed upon Hiero to receive him again into favour. To make the reconciliation between the two kings more lasting, they cemented it with a new alliance, Hiero marrying Theron's sister, after which there was, during Theron's reign, a perfect harmony between the states of Syracuse and Agrigentum.

Hiero, having thus concluded a peace with the king of Agrigentum, turned his arms against the inhabitants of Catana and Naxos, whom he drove from their country, and in their room settled a colony of Syracusians and Peloponnesians. This he did with a view to be honoured after his death as the founder of those cities, for all cities paid their founders such honours as were bestowed on heroes. The Cataneans and Naxians he transplanted to the city of Leontini, incorporating them with the antient inhabitants. The same year he obtained a signal victory over the Hetruscans of Tyrrhenia, who infested the neighbouring coasts, sunk most of their ships, burnt others, and cleared the seas of those pirates<sup>u</sup>. He found himself soon after engaged in a war with the Agrigentines under the conduct of Thrasyldeus, who had succeeded his father Theron, but was very unlike that good and generous prince; for, going astray from the path which Theron had pointed out to him, he no sooner ascended the throne, but, throwing aside all restraint of the laws, he began to oppress his subjects in a most tyrannical manner. Hiero, out of the respect he bore to his father's memory, advised him to use his subjects with more humanity, lest they should conspire against him, and drive him from the throne, as one not fit to be entrusted with their lives and fortunes. This wholesome advice so provoked Thrasyldeus, who was of a violent temper, that he entered the Syracusan territories in an hostile manner, laid waste the country, and even threatened the metropolis with a siege, having under his standards above twenty thousand men. Hiero, seeing himself insulted at the very gates of his metropolis, raised an equal number of forces, and marched out against the unjust aggressor. Thrasyldeus did not decline the engagement, which was very bloody, most of the troops on both sides being killed on the spot. But the Syracusians carried the day, and Thrasyldeus, out of despair abdicating the government, fled to the city of Megara, where he laid violent hands on himself. Upon his abdication the Agrigentines recovered their liberty, and entered into an alliance with Hiero<sup>w</sup>.

Hiero, a little before his death, invited into Sicily the sons of Anaxilas formerly tyrant of Rhegium, and a great friend of his brother Gelon, and advised them, as they were come to years of maturity, to take the sovereign power into their own hands, and call to an account Mieythus, who had been left their guardian. Hiero, who had contracted a bad state of health, was mighty desirous to see the children of his brother's friend in possession of their dominions before he left the world. The two young men, loaded with rich presents, set out from the court of Syracuse, and arriving at Rhegium, commanded Micythus to give an account of his administration, which he did in the presence of their friends and relations, no one finding any thing to object to him, but, on the contrary, all admiring and extolling his prudence, his integrity, and justice; for it appeared, says our author, that no man had ever discharged a trust with more honesty and disinterestedness. The young princes, repenting the steps they had taken, earnestly pressed him to resume the government, promising to respect him as if he were their father, and pay him a filial obedience till the hour of his death. But Micythus could not by any means be prevailed upon to accept their offer, and was equally pressing with them to take the reins of the government into their own hands; which they no sooner consented to do, but Micythus took his leave of them, and embarked for Greece, his native country, being attended to the shore by the whole city in the utmost grief for so great a loss. He afterwards led a private life at Tegæa in Arcadia, where he was no less esteemed and loved, than he had been at Rhegium *. Soon after Hiero died at Catana, which city he had repeopled, and was there buried with great pomp and magnificence. Diodorus tells us in one place, that he reigned only eleven years, and in another, that he reigned twelve years and eight months †. But Aristotle will have him to have swayed the sceptre only ten years ‡.

THERE is a strange disagreement among authors with relation to Hiero's character. Diodorus tells us, that he was of a covetous, cruel, and tyrannical temper, and an utter stranger to the candour and sincerity of his brother Gelon; that out of jealousy he attempted to make away with his brother Polyzelus, and that he oppressed his subjects to such a degree, that they would have deposed him, had they not been restrained by the remembrance of Gelon's generosity and general kindness to all his subjects §. On the other hand, Ælian ¶ commends him as a just, generous, and good-natured prince, and adds, that the most needy were not more ready to crave, than he was to give, that his generosity knew no bounds, that he was a great admirer of learning, and a bountiful encourager of the learned, that he was a prince of great candour and sincerity, and that he lived in perfect harmony with his brothers, without ever entertaining any sort of jealousy against them. This account is, seemingly, in each particular a direct contradiction to the former. However, some writers have endeavoured to reconcile both testimonies, as we have hinted above. For Hiero, as the same Ælian informs us elsewhere<sup>c</sup>, in the beginning of his reign betrayed a fierce, savage, and untractable temper; but falling afterwards into a lingering distemper, which confined him to his palace, and thereby gave him an opportunity of reflecting seriously on the conduct of his life, he seemed, as it were, to have changed his nature. During his illness, his only delight was to converse with men of learning, whom he invited to his court from all parts, amply rewarding them for the relief their entertaining conversation afforded him. Among these were Simonides, Pindar, Æschylus, Bacchylides, and Epecharmus. The conversation of these great men did not a little contribute to the softening of Hiero's inhuman temper; for they were not only excellent poets, but also possessed of a great fund of learning, and consulted as the sages of their age. Simonides in particular had a great ascendant over the king's mind, and the only use he made of it was to inspire him with sentiments worthy of a prince. He frequently conversed with him on philosophical subjects, and in one of these conversations it was, that Hiero, as we read in Tully<sup>d</sup>, asked him his opinion of the nature and attributes of the deity; to which question Simonides answered, that he must have one day to consider on it; the next day he asked two, and went on increasing in the same proportion; when Hiero pressed him to give the reason of these delays, he confessed, that the subject was above his comprehension, and that the more he dived into it, the more obscure it appeared to him. Several of the sayings of Hiero, related by Plutarch<sup>e</sup> and Athenæus<sup>f</sup>, shew, that he profited greatly by the instructions of Simonides. Among others they tell us, that he used often to say, that a king's palace and ears ought to be always open to every man, who would speak truth without disguise. It is well known, that Pindar in his odes bestows the highest encomiums on Hiero, not only for the victory he won in the Olympic games, but also for his eminent virtues, calling him a prince, in whom centered all the great and truly princely qualities. We will not take upon us to say, how far we may depend on the praises which Pindar gives

Hiero, since poets are not always sincere in the elogiums they bestow upon princes. However, it is certain that Hiero's court was a place of resort for all men of wit and learning, and that he invited them to it by his affability, courteous treatment, and much more by his liberality. He was passionately fond of the Olympic games, and did not disdain to enter the lists with persons of the lowest rank ; on which account he is censured by Xenophon in the inimitable treatise he has left us on the art of governing well, which is intitled Hiero, and writ by way of dialogue between this prince and Simonides. It is said, that Themistocles, seeing Hiero arrive at Olympia with a splendid equipage, in order to assist at the games, was for excluding him from that diversion, for not having succoured the Greeks against the common enemy<sup>a</sup>. This motion was commended by all, but seconded by none. Hiero was a powerful and resolute prince, and would not have easily put up such an affront.

Thra-

Hiero was succeeded by his brother Thrasylbulus, a most cruel and bloody tyrant. He practised all sorts of cruelty on his subjects, fancying, says our author, that he was of a different nature from them, and that he had been set over them, only that he might with safety trample them under his feet. All those who gave him the least umbrage were barbarously murdered ; the most wealthy, upon frivolous pretences, either put to death or condemned to perpetual banishment ; and, in short, the city turned into a shambles. Such inhuman proceedings grew soon insupportable to the Syracusians, who entering into an association took up arms, and declared Thrasylbulus an enemy to his country. The tyrant, seeing the whole city in arms, though he kept always in his pay above fifteen thousand mercenaries, attempted at first to appease the tumult with fair words, but finding that the incensed citizens were not to be imposed upon, he possessed himself of that part of the city which was called Acradina, and of the island, and thence made frequent sallies on the enemy, who were masters of the quarter called Tyche. The Syracusians sent ambassadors to Gela, Agrigentum, Selinus, Himera, and other cities, desiring them to join in the common cause, and send speedy succours to the relief of Syracuse, since on the fate of the metropolis depended that of the other cities. Upon this embassy they all ran to arms, and joining the Syracusians, put them in a condition to venture a general engagement, which was attended with the desired success ; for the tyrant was entirely defeated, and closely besieged in Acradina, whence he sent deputies to capitulate with the people. The Thraſy- only terms he could obtain were, that his life ſhould be ſpared, on condition he reſigned his authority, and retired out of Sicily. Theſe he was obliged to comply with, and accordingly, after having diveſted himſelf of all power, he withdrew to the city of Locros in Italy, where he led a private life after a ſhort reign of ten months <sup>b</sup>. Upon his reſignation, Syracuſe, and the other cities that had been ſubject to him, were declared free, and the popular government every where re-eſta bliſhed, and maintained till the reign of Dionyſius the tyrant, that is, for the ſpace of threeſcore years.

THE Syracuſians, being thus reſtored to their former liberty, called a general aſſembly, where it was unanimouſly decreed, that a ſtatue ſhould be erected to Jupiter the deliverer, of the ſize of a coloffus, and that on the anniversary of the happy day they had regained their liberty ſolemn games ſhould be exhibited, and four hundred and fifty bulls ſacrificed, by way of thankſgiving, to the gods, and all the people therewith entertained and feaſted, as on a day of general rejoicing <sup>c</sup>. It was at the ſame time decreed, that all the magiſtrates, according to antient cuſtom, ſhould be choſen from among the chief citizens, and that none of the ſtrangers, who had been made denizens by Gelon, ſhould be admitted to any employment of truſt. This decree incenſed the foreigners, who could not brook ſuch an odious diſtinction, after they had been by Gelon put upon the ſame foot with the beſt of the citizens. Having therefore complained in vain of ſuch a hardſhip, they at laſt joined together to the number of ſeven thouſand, and ſeizing on Acradina and the iſland, annoyed from thence the other quarters of the town, reſolved to obtain by force of arms what they could not get by any other means. They fortified themſelves ſo ſtrongly in their poſts, that the Syracuſians, though far ſuperior to them in number, could not diſlodge them. Wherefore they determined to ſhut them up ſo cloſe on all ſides that no provisions could be carried in, and thus force them by famine either to ſurrender, or venture an engagement; the beſieged choſe the latter, and were moſt of them cut in pieces after having made a great ſlaughter of the Syracuſians. After the example of Syracuſe all the other Greek cities in Sicily entered into an alliance againſt the mercenaries and foreigners, who had been enriched with lands and houſes by Gelon and Hiero, drove them from their poſſeſſions, and restored the antient proprietors to their estates and forme<sup>t</sup> habitations. Thus were all the cities of the island freed from foreigners, and restored to that form of popular government which had prevailed before the reign of Gelon<sup>k</sup>.

THOUGH the tyrants, and those who were suspected to be their abettors, were thus every-where driven out, yet there lay concealed in the minds of many a secret leaven, as we may call it, of tyranny, which frequently disturbed the harmony of the public peace and tranquility, and occasioned several tumults and commotions. In Syracuse one Tyndarides, having gained by his largesses a considerable party among the populace, attempted to assume the sovereign power; but both he and his accomplices were seized and put to death. Their punishment did not deter others from the like attempt; for no sooner had any citizen acquired a considerable fortune, but he began to entertain thoughts of wearing a diadem, and, with that view, to court the favour of the people. To prevent therefore the many evils daily arising from thence, and to bring down the aspiring minds of the wealthy citizens, the Syracusians were at length forced to make a law not unlike that of the Athenian ostracism; for as at Athens every citizen was to write on a shell the name of the person, whom they conceived to be the most capable, on account of his wealth and adherents, of aspiring to the crown; so at Syracuse they were to write on a leaf the names of such as they apprehended powerful enough to usurp the sovereignty. When the leaves were counted, he, who had most suffrages against him, was without any further enquiry, banished for five years. This new-contrived method of impairing the estates, and weakening the interest of the overgrown citizens, was called Petalism from the Greek word Petalon, which signifies a leaf. This law was attended with many evil consequences; for those, who were most capable of governing the commonwealth, were driven out, and the administration of public affairs committed to the meanest of the people; nay, many of the chief citizens, who were able to do their country great service, fearing to fall under the lash of this law, withdrew from the city, and lived private in the country, not concerning themselves with public affairs. Whence all the employments being filled with men of no merit or experience, the republic was on the brink of ruin, and ready to fall into a state of anarchy and confusion. The law therefore of petalism, upon more mature deliberation, was repealed, soon after it had been first enacted, and the reins of the government again put into the hands of men, who knew how to manage them<sup>1</sup>.

IN the mean time Ducetius, prince of the Siculi, who inhabited the inland parts of the island, having raised a powerful army, laid siege to Enna, which he took by storm, and advanced to Agrigentum with a design to drive the Greeks from all the cities, which had been formerly possessed by his countrymen. The Agrigentines went out to meet him, but their army was overthrown, and the city threatened with a siege. Hereupon they had recourse to the Syracusians, who sent them a strong reinforcement under the command of one Bilco Ducetius, who was then besieging Motyum, a strong-hold belonging to the Agrigentines, leaving part of his forces before the place, led the rest against the united troops of the Syracusians and Agrigentines, put them to flight, and returning before Motyum, made himself master of that city. The Syracusan general upon his return was tried for the loss of his army, for most of the Syracusians were cut to pieces in the engagement, and being convicted of holding a secret correspondence with the enemy was put to death, and a worthy citizen, whom the historians do not name, invested with the command. This new general was attended with all the success they could wish, for he entirely defeated the Siculi, reduced all their cities, and brought Ducetius to such straits, that he was obliged to submit to the Syracusians, and throw himself upon their mercy, as we have related above<sup>m</sup>.

AFTER the reduction of the Siculi, the Syracusians became so powerful, that they gave, in some degree, law to the whole island. The Greek cities indeed enjoyed a perfect liberty, but at the same time acknowledged Syracuse as their metropolis. If that wealthy city had been contented with the respect, which all the Greek colonies in Sicily willingly paid her, as the most able to protect them against any foreign invasion, the island would have enjoyed a lasting tranquility; but she began by degrees to assume the authority of a sovereign over cities that were no less free than herself, which gave rise to the wars which we are now to relate. She began with the Leontines, and invading, on what pretence we know not, their territory, laid waste that fruitful country, and reduced the city of Leontini to great straits. The inhabitants, not being able to make head against the superior forces of the Syracusians, had recourse to the Athenians, from whom they were originally descended; for the Leontines came from Chalcis, which was an Athenian colony. On this occasion they employed one Gorgias, the most famous orator of his time, and who is said to have been the first that taught the rules of rhetoric. Gorgias arriving at Athens made an oration to the people on the grievances their countrymen suffered from the Syracusians, and the advantages that would accrue to them from sending a powerful army into Sicily, in which he displayed so much eloquence, and such an elegant diction, that the Athenians, though themselves men of great learning, were struck with admiration, and greatly affected with the beauties and charms of his speech. But there needed no great eloquence to persuade the Athenians to concern themselves with the affairs of Sicily. Ever since the time of Pericles they had meditated the conquest of that island. Pericles indeed had always endeavoured to check this ambitious and wild project, remonstrating that by living in peace, and contenting themselves with the conquests they had already made, without engaging in hazardous enterprizes, they would raise their city to a flourishing condition. The authority he had at that time over the people, though it kept them from invading Sicily, yet could not suppress the desire they had to conquer it. At the time we are now speaking of they were masters at sea, and every-where successful, they had many confederates, a numerous army, experienced commanders, and in ready money above ten thousand talents. With these advantages they did not doubt but they should be able to overcome the Lacedemonians, with whom they were then at war, and at the same time reduce the island of Sicily. This, and not the gingling oratory of Gorgias, was what induced them to espouse the cause of the oppressed Leontines. Accordingly they sent without delay an hundred sail of ships well manned, under the command of Lachetes and Chabrias, enjoining them to make a descent on the territories of Syracuse. These arriving at Rhegium were there joined by a hundred more from the Athenian colonies. With this reinforcement they ravaged the Æolian islands, at that time in confederacy with Syracuse, defeated the Myleans as they were marching to join the Syracusians, took their city, and committed great devastations in the enemy's country. However, the Athenians, not satisfied with the progress their arms made in Sicily, sent forty ships more to reinforce their squadron, which now consisted of two hundred and fifty sail. But in the mean time the Leontines, being sensible that the Athenians aimed at nothing less than the sovereignty of the whole island, concluded a separate peace with the Syracusians, and were all made free of Syracuse. The Athenians, being by this agreement disappointed in their hopes of conquering Sicily, vented their rage, according to the custom custom of popular governments, upon those who had commanded in that unsuccessful expedition. Pythodorus and Sophocles were banished, and Eurymedon sentenced to pay a heavy fine. The Athenians were at that time, which was the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war, so blinded by their prosperity, that they believed no power was able to resist them <sup>a</sup>.

ABOUT ten years after broke out the most memorable war War between the that had ever to that time been waged in Sicily. It was occasioned by a dispute arising between the inhabitants of Egesta Syracusi- and Selinus concerning their borders. The territories of ans and the two cities were divided by a river, which the Selinuntines Atheni- crossed, and possessed themselves of the lands lying ans next to it, pretending, that they had formerly belonged to them. This provoked the Egestines, who, after having endeavoured in vain to recover their property by fair means, took up arms, and drove out the intruders by force. The Selinuntines, on the other hand, unwilling to part with those lands, though they could not make good their claim to them, raised an army, entered the territories of the Egestines in a hostile manner, and laid waste the whole country. The Egestines took up arms in their own defence, but were entirely defeated, and forced to shelter themselves within their walls. In this condition they sent ambassadors to solicit succours from Agrigentum, Syracuse, and even from Carthage; but none of these states would concern themselves with their disputes. It was therefore at last resolved in their general assembly, that ambassadors should be sent to Athens to implore the assistance of that republic, and withal to promise, that they in their turn would help the Athenians to the utmost of their power, whenever they should stand in need of their assistance. Their ambassadors, arriving at Athens, represented among other things, that should they be abandoned, the Syracusians, who under-hand supported the Selinuntines, would not fail to possess themselves of their city, and by degrees become masters of the whole island; in which case they would be able to send powerful succours to the Lacedemonians, who were their founders. The Athenians were overjoyed to have a new opportunity of meddling with the affairs of Sicily. However, they thought it adviseable first to send deputies into Sicily to inquire into the state of the island, and particularly of the Egestines; for they had promised to pay all the troops that should be sent to their assistance. Upon the arrival of the ambassadors, the Egestines, having borrowed from the neighbouring nations a great many

gold and silver vessels, made a vain shew of them to the Athenians, telling them, that they had gold and silver enough to defray the whole charges of the war. When the ambassadors were returned to Athens, and the great wealth of the Egestines noised abroad, an assembly of the people was called to deliberate on the war which was to be waged in Sicily. Nicias, a man of no small authority among the people, argued with great prudence against the war, shewing, that it was impossible to contend with the Lacedemonians, and at the same time send so great a force, as they must needs do, into Sicily; that it was a kind of madness to entertain thoughts of subduing so powerful an island, when they had not yet been able to reduce Greece; that they ought first to humble the enemies they had at their doors, before they went in search of others at a distance, &c. Many other things he said, which were well suited to the occasion, and are related at length by Thucydides <sup>o</sup> and Diodorus <sup>p</sup>; but the contrary opinion, which was supported by Alcibiades, the most eloquent speaker at that time in Athens, prevailed by a great majority. It being now determined to pursue this wild enterprize at all events, Alcibiades, Nicias, and Lamachus were appointed to command the fleet, with full power not only to succour Egesta, but to regulate the affairs in Sicily in such manner as they judged best for the interest of the republic. This commission Nicias accepted much against his will, being firmly persuaded, that it could not be attended with success, and dreading to have Alcibiades for his colleague. But the Athenians could not be prevailed upon to commit the whole management of the war to Alcibiades, judging wisely, that his ardor and intrepidity wanted to be tempered with the wariness and prudence of Nicias <sup>q</sup>. Nicias, not daring to oppose any longer openly an expedition on which all Athens was so violently bent, endeavoured to do it indirectly by starting a great many difficulties, drawn from the vast charges the republic must be at in carrying it on. But all he could alledge, instead of cooling the ardor of the people, served only to inflame it the more. Nay, an Athenian standing up in the assembly and addressing Nicias, desired him not to shift off or delay the business any longer, but declare there before them all what forces he would have the Athenians decree him. Nicias answered, that he could not exactly tell before he advised with his fellow-commanders, but as far as he could judge, an hundred galleys and five thousand land-forces, at least, would be requisite. Hereupon full power was unanimously granted him to raise what forces and fit out what ships he thought necessary ; and accordingly the levies were carried on in Athens and the confederate cities, with such success and expedition, that in a few days the number of troops he had required was raised, and the galleys manned and equipt. When all things were ready for their departure, the officers, before they went on board, had a private conference with the senate concerning the administration of affairs in Sicily, for they did not at all doubt but they should reduce the island. In this conference it was determined, that the Syracusians, and the Selinuntines their allies, should be carried away and sold for slaves, and the rest obliged to pay an annual tribute, and live according to the laws of Athens<sup>r</sup>. The next day the army, consisting of seven thousand chosen men, marched from the city to the Pyræus, where the fleet lay, and there taking leave of their friends and relations went on board the transports, amidst the shouts and acclamations of an immense multitude that attended them from the city. When the troops were embarked, and the fleet ready to put off, the trumpet sounded, and solemn prayers were offered up for the success of the expedition, gold and silver cups filled with wine were carried about to the whole army, both soldiers and officers drinking, according to custom, success to the undertaking (S). The usual libations being poured out, and the ceremonies appointed by law for such occasions duly performed, the ships began to sail out of the harbour one after another, the people, who lined the shore, shouting at the same time, and lifting up their hands to heaven to wish their fellow-citizens a good voyage and a safe return. They first sailed to the island of Ægina, and from thence to Corcyra, which they had appointed the place of rendezvous for their allies and the transports. Upon the arrival of their confederates at Corcyra they put to sea again, and made for Tarentum; but meeting there with a very indifferent reception, they sailed along the coast of Italy till they came to Rhegium, where they made some stay, with a view to prevail upon the inhabitants to succour the Leontines, who were originally Chalcidians, as well as themselves. But the Rhegians answered, that they were determined to stand neuter, and to undertake nothing but in concert with the other Greek states in Italy. During their stay here they sent some ships to cruise off the coast of Sicily in order to find out some proper and convenient place for landing the troops, and at the same time to know what treasure the Egestines could contribute towards carrying on the war, which had been undertaken for their sake. These on their return acquainted the generals, that the Egestines had imposed upon them, and abused their credulity, since they were a poor indigent people, and had only thirty talents in the public treasury. Hereupon a council of war being called, Nicias was of opinion that they should sail to Selinus, which had been the first occasion of this expedition, and then, if the Egestines performed their promise, and supplied the army with a month's pay, to oblige the Selinuntines and Egestines to come to an agreement, and so return to Athens without engaging their country in so expensive a war. By this means Athens, said he, will shew her readiness to assist her friends, and at the same time save her men and treasure for some more promising enterprize. Alcibiades, on the other hand, thinking it highly dishonourable to return home without making any conquests, after they had set out with such a parade, was of opinion, that they should solicit the cities of Sicily to a confederacy against the Syracusians and Selinuntines; and in case they found them disposed to come into their measures, to attack either Syracuse or Selinus, the former, if they refused to restore the inhabitants of Leontini to their city, and the latter, if they did not conclude a peace with the Egestines. Lamachus offered a third opinion, which perhaps was the most prudent; he was for sailing directly to Syracuse, and laying siege to the city before the inhabitants had time to prepare for their defence. But the opinion of Alcibiades prevailing, they set sail for Sicily <sup>c</sup>.

ADVICE of this expedition coming to Syracuse from all quarters, it was thought so improbable there, that no one would give credit to it. But as it was daily more and more confirmed, the Syracusians began seriously to think in what manner they should oppose so great a power. They sent deputies to every part of the island asking succours against an enemy, who, as was evident from so great preparations, could have nothing less in view than the subjecting of the whole island; they garisoned all the forts and castles in the country, reviewed their troops, made ready their arms and engines, and in short prepared all things, as though the enemy had been already in the heart of their country <sup>c</sup>.

IN the mean time, the Athenian fleet arriving in Sicily, the land-forces were put ashore near Catana, which city they took by surprize, Naxos opened its gates to them, Hyccara, a small town belonging to the Sicanians, was taken by storm, and all the inhabitants sold for slaves. These were the only exploits of this campaign, which being ended and the winter now drawing on, the Athenian generals thought it adviseable to take up their quarters in some place near Syracuse, that they might be in readiness to undertake the siege of that place early in the spring. But in the mean time Alcibiades, as we have already related <sup>u</sup>, being called home to take his trial, the command of the army was left to Nicias and Lamachus. These advancing towards Syracuse possessed themselves of an advantageous post by the following stratagem. They sent a person, on whose fidelity they could depend, to Syracuse, enjoining him to acquaint the Syracusians, as if he had been dispatched from their friends in Catana, that the Cataneans had conspired to fall upon the Athenians, who were quartered within the city, in the night; and that if the Syracusians would advance to the Athenian camp with all their forces, they might easily possess themselves of it in that confusion. The Syracusians, not suspecting any deceit, appointed a night, and at the time agreed on marched out with the flower of their troops to join the Cataneans. But the Athenians, in the mean time, having embarked their forces and ammunition, set sail for Syracuse, and without any opposition landed near Olympicum, where they fortified their camp with strong intrenchments, before the Syracusan forces returned from Catana. The Syracusians, finding themselves thus shamefully imposed upon, marched back to Syracuse with great expedition, and the very next day drew up their army in battle-array before the enemy's camp. Nicias marched out of his trenches to give them battle, which was fought with incredible bravery on both sides. Victory was a long time doubtful; but a very heavy shower of rain, accompanied with thunder and lightning, falling unexpectedly, so terrified the Syracusians, the greatest part of whom had never before carried arms, that they began to retire. The Athenians durst not pursue them, because their horse, who were still in a body, and had not been defeated, covered their retreat. They therefore withdrew in good order, after having besieged.

AFTER this battle, the Athenians, who were not yet in a condition to attack Syracuse, retired with their fleet to Naxos and Catana to winter there, and in the mean time procured new supplies both from Athens and their confederates in Sicily. The messengers they sent to Athens soon returned with three hundred talents and some troops of horse; the Egestines likewise and the Siculi sent them a reinforcement of cavalry, and furnished their army with all sorts of provisions. On the other hand, the Syracusians dispatched ambassadors to Corinth, whence they originally came, and also to Lacedemon, to implore their assistance against an enemy, who aimed not only at the sovereignty of Sicily, but of all Greece. The ambassadors were kindly received in both places, especially at Lacedemon, where Alicibiades, who had taken sanctuary in that city, enforced their demand with all his credit and eloquence. At his persuasion Gylippus, an officer of great experience, was appointed to command the reinforcement which was designed for Sicily, and troops raised with a design to invade the territories of Athens, and thereby make a powerful diversion. But before any supplies arrived in Sicily, Nicias leaving his winter quarters set sail for Syracuse, and arriving there in the night before the Syracusians had any notice of his departure from Catana, possessed himself of the important post of Epipolæ (T). The Syracusians attempted to dislodge him, but after a sharp engagement were driven back into the city, with the loss of three hundred men. Nicias, encouraged with this success, began to build a wall round the city, in order to cut off from the besieged all communication with the neighbouring country. This work was carried on with such vigour and expedition as quite terrified the Syracusians, who indeed made frequent sallies, but were always repulsed with great loss. The wall was at last finished, and the city blocked up on all sides. However, the besieged were not so far disheartened as not to annoy the enemy with vigor-

(T) Epipolæ was a hill which stood without the city, and commanded it. It was exceeding steep, and of very difficult access. At the time of the siege we are speaking of, it was not surrounded with walls, as in after-ages. The pass leading to it was called Euryelus. On the top of the hill was a fort called Labdalon (27).

(27) Thucyd l. vi.

rous sallies, in one of which they put the Athenians to flight, demolished great part of their works, and made a great slaughter of those who defended them; among the rest Lamachus, one of their chief and best commanders, was slain, and several other officers of distinction. Notwithstanding this advantage gained by the Syracusians, Nicias who was now the sole general, pursued the siege, and after repairing his works, began a wall of circumvallation, in order to prevent any succours from being thrown into the place. He caused also the canals to be cut by which water was conveyed into the place, which soon brought the Syracusians to the utmost distress. Seeing themselves therefore on the brink of ruin, and without any hopes of relief, they began to think of capitulating; and accordingly an assembly was held to settle the articles, in order to send them to Nicias. But before they came to any determination, an officer, by name Gongyles, arriving from Corinth on board a galley, brought them the joyful news of the approach of Gylippus, with a force sufficient to dispel all their fears, and oblige the enemy to raise the siege. The joy, which this news so unexpected occasioned in the city, is not to be expressed. They passed from one extreme to the other, and, instead of capitulating, began to prepare themselves for new sallies, in order to facilitate Gylippus's entrance into the city. While they were making these preparations, Gylippus appeared at the head of three thousand foot and two hundred horse, and making directly for Epipolæ, where Nicias had fortified himself in a castle called Labdalon, drew up his small army under the walls, and then sent a herald to Nicias to let him know, that he would allow him only five days to leave Sicily. Nicias not condescend to return any answer to this proposal; whereupon Gylippus attacking the fort, carried it by storm, and put all the Athenians, who were in it, to the sword. This opened him a way into the city, where he was received with loud acclamations, and honoured as the deliverer of the city. Having allowed his troops a few days rest, he marched out with his own and the Syracusan forces to demolish the enemy's works; whereupon a sharp engagement ensued, in which many were killed on both sides: But at length the Athenians carried the day. Their victory was chiefly owing to the narrowness of the place, which made the Syracusan cavalry and bow-men quite unserviceable. Gylippus, to encourage his soldiers, reproached himself with the ill success they had met with, and publicly declared, that he, not they, had occasioned the late defeat. However, he promised to give them very soon an opportunity of retrieving both their honour and his, and accordingly the very next day he led them against the enemy, and gained a very considerable victory *.

AFTER this success thirteen gallees arrived from Corinth, with considerable supplies both of men and money for the Syracusians; and Gylippus, not content to send ambassadors to the cities of Sicily, went himself from town to town, soliciting them to join him. By this means he raised above three thousand men, and with these fresh supplies returned to Syracuse. Nicias, on the other hand, finding his troops lessen daily in proportion as those of the enemy's increased, began to be disheartened, and wrote to the Athenians in the strongest terms, shewing that, without powerful supplies both by sea and land, the enterprize would prove abortive, and the small army remaining be lost. His letter made a great impression on the minds of the Athenians, who immediately nominated two officers, who served under him, Menander and Euthydemus, to assist him till other generals should be sent; for he had desired, on account of his bad state of health, a colleague to bear part of the burden and care of the war. Eurymedon and Demosthenes were chosen to succeed Lamachus and Alcibiades. The former set out immediately, with ten gallees and a considerable sum of money, to assure Nicias, that a speedy succour should be sent him; the latter was employed in raising troops, and equipping ships, in order to set sail the following spring.

ON the other side, the Lacedemonians having, at the instigation of Alcibiades, broke the truce they had made with the Athenians, invaded Attica under the conduct of Agis and Alcibiades, in order to divert them from sending any supplies into Sicily. But they were so infatuated with the Sicilian expedition, that, notwithstanding the straits they were in at home, they decreed fourscore gallees and five thousand land-forces to be sent into that island. The Syracusians, hearing that the enemy was soon to be reinforced with such powerful supplies, fitted out a fleet with all possible expedition, in order to venture a sea-engagement, and destroy the Athenian ships that blocked up the city by sea, before they were joined by the squadron, which Demosthenes was bringing over into Sicily. With this view they sailed out with a fleet of fourscore sail well manned, and being met by the Athenian fleet, consisting of sixty sail, a sharp engagement ensued, which drew the Athenians from their posts to the sea-side. But while they were standing on the shore idle spectators of the combat, Gylippus, who foresaw this, attacked the forts unexpectedly, and as great part of the garisons had flocked to the shore, he possessed himself of them without great opposition, and made a dreadful slaughter of those who hastened from the shore to the assistance of their companions. Here-upon a great noise and tumult arising in the camp, the Athenians engaged at sea were struck with terror, and made what haste they could to gain the shore, and there assist their land-forces in the defence of the forts. But finding, as they drew near, that Gylippus was already in possession of the posts they were coming to defend, they tacked about, and with their whole fleet in line of battle fell upon the Syracusians, who were pursuing them in disorder, sunk eleven of their vessels, killed great numbers of their marines, and made ample amends for the battle they had lost by land, with a compleat victory by sea. After the fight both parties set up trophies; the Athenians for their victory by sea, and the Syracusians for their Success by land. The Athenians lost in the forts, that were taken, all their treasure, and great part of their provisions and military stores.

THE Syracusians, notwithstanding the loss they had sustained by sea, were determined to attempt a second engagement both by sea and land, before the succours, which Demosthenes was bringing, should arrive. In order therefore to provoke them to a fight, they daily drew up their fleet in line of battle before the great harbour, where the Athenian fleet was anchored, and, with biting jokes and rallery, put their patience to the utmost trial. Nicias was averse from venturing a second battle; saying, that as he expected a fresh fleet every moment and a great reinforcement, it would betray the greatest want of judgment, should he hazard a battle without being forced to it, when his troops were inferior in number to those of the enemy, and already fatigued. On the other hand, Menander and Euthydemus, who had been appointed to share the command with him till the arrival of Demosthenes, wanting to perform some mighty exploit before they resigned their commission, represented to Nicias, that, should they shun a battle, the reputation of the Athenian arms would be forfeited, and they forsaken by all their allies in Sicily. They were so pressing with Nicias, that they forced him at last to a compliance, and accordingly the fleet, consisting of seventy five gallies, sailed out of the harbour. The first day the two fleets continued in sight of each other without engaging; the second some vessels engaged, but neither side gained any considerable advantage; the third day the Syracusians drew up their navy earlier than usual, and having continued so till the day was far spent, they withdrew as they had done the day before. The Athenians supposed they were not to return that day, and therefore began to retire without observing any order, when all on a sudden the enemy's fleet, sailing out of the little harbour, fell upon the Athenians before they had time to draw up in line of battle. Victory did not long continue in suspense; the Athenians were put to flight, after having lost seven galleys and a great many men, some being killed, and others taken prisoners<sup>1</sup>.

THIS loss threw Nicias into the utmost consternation, and renewed the memory of all the misfortunes he had met with since his first coming into Sicily. But while he was revolving in his mind these gloomy ideas, Demosthenes's fleet appeared advancing to the great haven with such pomp and assurance of victory as filled the enemy with dread. This fleet consisted of seventy three galleys, having on board eight thousand men, besides mariners, and great store of provisions and warlike engines to be employed in the siege. All the galleys were richly trimmed, and their prows adorned with costly streamers: They were manned with chosen rowers, commanded by experienced officers, and furnished at a vast expence with all sorts of warlike machines used then in sea-engagements. As they approached the shore the sound of the trumpets mixed with repeated shouts and loud acclamations, both from the fleet and the camp, made all the city resound. This air of pomp and triumph Demosthenes affected purposely to strike terror into the enemy. And truly the besieged, notwithstanding their late advantages, began now to be quite disheartened, finding they had to do with an enemy, who could send such powerful succours abroad, while they had so troublesome a war on their hands at home. The common people were for putting an end to their calamities by capitulating, before the city was reduced to the last extremity, and while they could hope for tolerable terms. But Demosthenes did not give them time to come to any resolution; thinking it adviseable to take advantage of the general consternation, which his arrival had occasioned, he prepared to attack the city the same day he arrived, being determined either to put a speedy end to the war, or raise the siege, and return to the relief of Athens, which was in a manner blocked up by the Lacedemonians. Nicias, terrified at this bold and precipitate resolution, conjured him not to be over-hasty, but to take time to weigh things maturely, that he might have no cause to repent when it would be too late. He observed to him, that the enemy would be ruined by delays, that they were in great want both of money and provisions, that their allies were ready to abandon them, and that they would be soon forced to surrender, as they had before resolved to do. This Nicias said, because he had certain advice sent him daily of whatever was transacted in the city. But his remonstrances were construed an effect of the dilatoriness, with which he had always been reproached. And indeed it was peculiar to him to start difficulties on all occasions, and deaden the vivacity of the troops by delays, distrusts, and timorous precautions. All the officers therefore came over to the opinion of Demosthenes, and Nicias himself was forced to acquiesce in it <sup>a</sup>.

A GENERAL assault being resolved on, Demosthenes marched in the dead of the night to attack the important post of Epipolæ; and was at first attended with success, having made himself master of the castle, and cut the garison in pieces. Gylippus at the first alarm hastened to the relief of the place; but his troops, being seized with a panic, which was increased by the darkness of the night, were easily repulsed and put to flight. But as the Athenians advanced in disorder to prevent their rallying, they met with a body of Bæotians under the command of Hermocrates, an officer of great courage and experience, and were by them stopt till the Syracusians, who had fled, had time to recover from their surprize. Then Gylippus encouraging his men, brought them back to the charge, and the fight was renewed. The Athenians, though in disorder, stood their ground for some time, but at last, fresh troops continually arriving from the city, they were forced to give way, and not knowing the roads many of them either fell from the tops of the rocks, and were dashed in pieces, or were slain the next day as they were straggling from one another up and down the fields and woods. Two thousand Athenians were killed on this occasion, and a great many arms and warlike engines taken.

AFTER this overthrow Demosthenes was for returning to Athens, especially as the season was not too far advanced for crossing the sea, and they had ships enow to force their passage, in case the enemy should dispute it. He declared, that in his opinion it would be of far greater advantage to oblige the Lacedæmonians to raise the blockade of Athens, than to continue that of Syracuse, in which they spent their strength to no purpose. But Nicias had still hopes of becoming master of the city, which he knew to be in great want of all things, and besides was under great apprehensions of the people of Athens, who had banished two generals in former times for returning from Sicily, though they had acted a very prudent part in so doing. He said, that as those who were to judge him had not been eye-witnesses of the state of affairs, they would be of a different opinion, and that those very men, who then exclaimed against the difficulties they laboured under, would perhaps change their note, and accuse them of having been bribed to raise the siege. He concluded by declaring, that as for himself he chose rather to fall gloriously by the enemy's sword, than be ignominiously condemned by the suffrages of the populace. These reasons were not able to convince Demosthenes, who was still of opinion that the only way left to save themselves was to quit the country. However, as he had been unsuccessful in his former advice, he was afraid of insisting upon this, and yielded to Nicias <sup>a</sup>.

IN the mean time, the Syracusians were reinforced with powerful supplies from the Siculi, Selinuntines, Geleans, and Camarineans; which encouraged them as much as it disheartened the Athenians, in whose army a violent plague broke out, occasioned by the unwholesome air of the fens and marshes, near which they were encamped. This calamity, added to many others, made Nicias alter his opinion, and orders were privately issued enjoining the officers of the fleet to be in a readiness to set sail at a minute's warning. The soldiers were commanded to ship all their baggage, and be ready to go on board upon a signal that should be given. But when all things were ready, and most part of the soldiers embarked, without the Syracusians having the least suspicion of their design, the moon was suddenly eclipsed, which so terrified Nicias, who was naturally superstitious, that he would needs consult the soothsayers before he suffered the rest of the soldiers to go on board. It was customary on such occasions to suspend the enterprize, that was in hand, for three days. But the soothsayers, whom Nicias consulted, pronounced, that he must not set sail, till three times nine days were past; which, without all doubt, was a mysterious number in the opinion of the people <sup>b</sup>.

THE Syracusians, in the mean time, receiving notice of the intended departure of the Athenians, took fresh courage, and resolved to attack them both by sea and land. Pursuant to this resolution, they sailed out with threescore gallees against the Athenian fleet consisting of fourscore and six. Eurymedon, who commanded the right of the Athenian fleet, extended his line, as he had more ships, in order to surround the opposite wing of the enemy. But being in this attempt separated from the rest of the fleet, he was driven by Agatharcus, the Syracusan admiral, into the gulf called Dasion, and there killed with great part of his men. The death of the admiral disheartened both the soldiers and officers, who now every-where gave way, and being chased by the enemy sheltered themselves within the haven; which, as we shall see anon, proved fatal to them. In this engagement the Athenians lost eighteen ships and two thousand men. Gylippus, who commanded the land army, seeing the enemy's galleys forced ashore, advanced with part of his troops to fall upon such as landed, but was repulsed by the Tuscans, who guarded that quarter, and driven into the marsh called Lysimelia, where many of his men were killed by the Tuscans and Athenians, who flew to their assistance. Each party erected trophies, the Syracusians for their victory by sea, and the Athenians for the advantage they had gained by land. But the minds of the two nations were differently disposed. The Syracusians, who had been so terrified at the arrival of Demosthenes, seeing themselves victorious in a naval engagement, took fresh courage. On the contrary, the Athenians, overcome by sea contrary to their expectation, lost all hopes, and only thought of retiring.

THE enemy, to prevent their escaping by sea, blocked up the mouth of the great harbour, which was about five hundred paces wide, with ships and galleys, joined and fastened together with anchors and iron chains. The Athenians, seeing themselves thus penned up on all sides, held a council of war, in which it was unanimously resolved, that they should attempt, at all adventures, to break through the fleet, that shut up the harbour, and retire with all their forces on board to Catana; but if they should not succeed in this bold undertaking, to set fire to their ships, and march by land to the nearest city belonging to their allies. Pursuant to this resolution the flower of the troops, and the most experienced among the officers were put on board an hundred and fifteen galleys, and the rest of the army drawn up in battalia on the shore. On the other side the Syracusians fitted out seventy four galleys, which they placed with many other vessels behind those that stopped up the harbour, to the end, that if any of the latter were sunk, or the chains, which joined them, broken, the Athenians might yet find themselves a second time stopped and entangled. As this engagement was to determine the fate of Syracuse, the walls of the harbour, and every eminence within the city, was filled with crouds of spectators. The commanders on both sides employed all their eloquence to animate their men. Nicias, leaving his post on the shore, went on board a vessel, and, sailing round the Athenian fleet, exhorted the commander of each galley in particular to behave like an Athenian, putting them in mind, that on their valour, in the fight now approaching, depended the safety and preservation of their wives, their children, and their country, as well as their own. Nicias was scarce returned to his post, when the trumpets sounded the charge, and the Athenian fleet advanced with great violence, to break the blockade at the mouth of the harbour. But the Syracusan galleys, which had been left within the vessels chained together, on purpose to stop the course and fury of the enemy, rowed up against them with such impetuosity, that they put both their own and the enemy's fleet in the utmost confusion. In this disorder the lines on both sides being broken, and the vessels dispersed, they engaged here and there in small squadrons. However, the fight was obstinate on both sides. The Athenians, seeing they were utterly lost, unless with an invincible resolution they forced their passage, despised all dangers, and fought like men in a desperate condition. On the other side, the Syracusians, knowing that they were observed by their parents and children, exerted their utmost efforts in defence of their country. The fight was no less dreadful than the confusion, and the slaughter great on both sides. The lamentable outcries of the wounded, and those who were perishing in the water, the noise of the oars, and the loud shouts from the ramparts and the shore, where both armies were drawn up, prevented any orders from being heard or attended to. As the battle was fought under the very walls of the city, parents were eye-witnesses of the death of their children, wives of the miserable end of their husbands, and one friend beheld another wallowing in his blood, without being able to lend him any relief. After the battle had lasted many hours, and both parties were quite tired out, and no more able to manage either their arms or their oars, yet if any of them offered to fly to the shore, they were driven back with bitter reproaches by their countrymen under whose eyes they fought. The Athenians asked those who made to the shore, whether they intended to sail to Athens by land, and obliged them, though covered over with wounds, to return to the charge. The Syracusians met with no better treatment from their countrymen, who prevented even those from landing, whose ships were quite disabled and ready to sink, bidding them save their lives by boarding the enemy's ships, or die an honourable death in defence of their country. Thus the battle was continued the whole day, and it was by far the most bloody and obstinate which had ever been fought in those seas. At length the Athenians were, in spite of their utmost endeavours, driven ashore, and the city immediately acquainted with the victory by an universal shout from the fleet, which was answered by loud acclamations of joy from the army on the shore, and the spectators on the walls. The Athenians, who escaped, leapt out of their broken and shattered ships, and fled to the land army. The Syracusians lost on this occasion eight ships, and had eleven disabled; the Athenians lost three-score, and most of the rest were rendered quite unserviceable.

IN this desperate condition the Athenian officers met to consider what measures they should take in so critical a conjuncture. Demosthenes was for manning with fresh soldiers the few galleys that remained, and while the Syracusians were under no apprehensions on account of their late victory, to fall upon them again, and force their way out of the harbour. This was no ill advice, but Nicias opposed it; others say, that the soldiers refused to obey, alledging that it would be impossible for them to sustain a second engagement. It was thereupon determined to abandon the ships, and retire that very night by land to the cities of their confederates. But Hermocrates, commander in chief of the Syracusan forces, suspecting their design, ordered all his troops to be immediately drawn out with a design to stop all the passes and prevent their retreat. The Syracusians were then in the height of their rejoicings, and thinking of nothing but how to divert themselves after the toils they had sustained. They therefore unanimously declared, that they would not upon any account whatsoever, take up arms again till they had been allowed some days rest. Hereupon Hermocrates, thinking it of the utmost importance not to suffer so great a body of forces to make their escape, since they might fortify themselves in some corner of the island, and there begin a new war, devised the following stratagem to gain time. He sent some horsemen to the Athenian camp, who were to pass for friends, and advise Nicias not to quit his camp, which was well fortified, since the Syracusians lay in ambush for him, and had seized on all the passes leading to the cities of their allies. This false advice stopt Nicias at once, and he did not even set out the next day, that his soldiers might have more time, to refresh themselves, and carry off whatever might be necessary for their subsistence. He might have passed with great safety, had he not been thus deluded. The next day Hermocrates, having prevailed upon his men to march out, possessed himself of the most difficult passes, fortified the avenues leading to the places where the rivers were fordable, broke down the bridges, and spread detachments of horse up and down the plains; so that there was not one outlet through which the Athenians were not obliged to fight their way. However, as they could no longer subsist in their camp, the third day after the battle they set out to the number of forty thousand men, leaving behind them all their galleys, and great part of their baggage. The whole army was in the utmost consternation in seeing such great numbers of men, either dead or dying, abandoned to wild beasts or the cruelty of the enemy. Some who were sick or wounded, hanging on the necks of their friends and companions, conjured them with many tears, to take them along with the army; others dragging themselves after them, followed as far as their strength allowed them, and when this failed, had recourse to tears and sighs, calling upon the gods as well as men to revenge the cruelty they met with; so that every place echoed with groans and mournful lamentations. But the most melancholy part of the spectacle, and which most deserved compassion, was Nicias himself. That great man, dejected and worn out with a tedious illness, destitute of all necessary things when his age and infirmities required them most, tormented not only with his own grief, but with the affliction of others, thought of nothing but how he might best comfort his soldiers, and rouse their courage; he ran from one part of the army to the other, exhorting his men to pluck up their spirits, by representing to them, that matters were not yet desperate, since other armies had escaped far greater dangers; that they ought not to grieve too immoderately for misfortunes which they had not occasioned; that if they had offended any god, his vengeance must be satiated by this time; that fortune, after having so long favoured the enemy, would at last be tired of persecuting them, &c. Above all he insisted upon their marching in good order, since by a prudent and courageous retreat, which was now become their only resource, they might not only save themselves but their country, and enable it to recover its former splendor<sup>d</sup>.

THE hopes of the desponding army being somewhat revived by this speech, they marched out in two bodies, both drawn up in the form of a phalanx; the van was led by Nicias, and the rear by Demosthenes, with the baggage in the centre. They forced their passage over the river Anapis, notwithstanding the vigorous opposition they met with. But being every day harassed by the Syracusan horse and bowmen, who were continually discharging showers of darts upon them, and finding all the outlets guarded, so that they were obliged to dispute every inch of their way, they began again to despond. Nicias offered the enemy battle, but Hermocrates and Gylippus, not caring to engage men whom despair made invincible, retired as soon as they saw them drawn up in battalia, but when they began to proceed in their march, they then fell upon their rear with the utmost fury.

Demosthenes and Nicias, seeing the miserable condition to which the army was reduced for many were daily wounded, and besides, they were in great want of provisions, the enemy having laid waste the whole country through which they were to pass, resolved, to alter their rout, and, instead of pursuing their march to Catana, to turn toward the sea, and make the best of their way for Camarina and Gela. Accordingly, having lighted a great many fires in their camp, they retired in the dead of the night. The van-guard led by Nicias kept together and advanced in good order; but half the rear, commanded by Demosthenes, fell into great confusion and lost their way. However they got early in the morning to the sea-side, but could have no advice of the rest of the army. In the mean time the Syracusians, having intelligence of their march, by break of day made after them with all possible expedition, and came up with Demosthenes about noon. The Athenians were then in some disorder, as not suspecting the enemy could overtake them so soon. The Syracusians did not fail to take advantage of their confusion, and immediately charging them with their cavalry, they forced them into a narrow pass, and there surrounded them on all sides. Demosthenes, seeing there was no hopes of escaping, after having fought from noon to night, thought it adviseable to save the lives of so many brave men by capitulating. Accordingly having stipulated, that neither he nor any of his men should be put to death, or sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, they all, to the number of six thousand, laid down their arms and surrendered.

Nicias arrived the same evening at the river Erineus, which he crossed and encamped on an eminence, where the enemy came up with him the next day, and summoned him to surrender as Demosthenes had done. Nicias, not believing what they told him of his colleague, obtained leave to send a horseman to enquire of the truth. Upon the return of the messenger, being informed that Demosthenes had really surrendered, he sent a herald to the enemy's camp, offering to pay the whole charges of the war, upon condition that he was allowed to leave the country with all his forces. But this proposal being rejected, the enemy attacked him with great vigour, and the Athenians, though quite tired out with their long marches, and faint with hunger, stood their ground till night put an end to the combat. When all things seemed quiet, Nicias commanded his men to file off in silence, for he was there in absolute want of all necessaries. But they no sooner took up their arms, than the advanced guards of the Syracusians gave the alarm. Whereupon the Athenians, seeing themselves discovered, remained there all night. However, three hundred of them broke through the enemies guards, and marched as far as they could that night. At break of day Nicias pursued his march, being galled all the way by showers of darts from all sides. When they arrived at the river Asinarus, they rushed into it without any order, every one striving to get over the first, and in that confusion the Syracusan cavalry advancing full gallop into the river, trod many of them down with their horses, cut others in pieces, and made such a dreadful havock of those unfortunate men, while they were not in a condition to make any resistance, that the Asinarus was for many miles dyed with their blood. Our historian tells us, that the Athenians were so tormented with drought, occasioned by their long and quick march, that, unmindful of their present danger, they seemed to be more intent on quenching their thirst than saving their lives, though what they drank was rather the blood of their companions than the waters of the stream. On this occasion above eighteen thousand Athenians were by the merciless Syracusians inhumanly butchered. Nicias with a small body, which escaped the slaughter and kept together, being hemmed in on all sides, surrendered, not to the Syracusians, but to Gylippus, hoping to meet with better treatment from him than from the Syracusians. The only condition he asked was, that their lives should be spared, which being granted, they threw down their arms and surrendered. After this the Syracusians detached several small bodies of horse to all parts, and these took took the three hundred, who had forced their way through the guards the night before, with many others whom they found straggling in the fields; so that out of so numerous an army very few had the good fortune to escape either death or servitude <sup>f</sup>.

THE Athenians, it seems, were displeased with their general for surrendering in this manner, since his name was omitted on a public monument, where the names were engraved of those commanders who had lost their lives in the service of their country <sup>g</sup>.

THE Syracusians, upon this happy success, having erected two trophies, and fixed to them the arms of the two captive generals, returned to the city, which they entered in triumph among the loud and joyful acclamations of their fellow-citizens, who flocked from all quarters to be spectators of so glorious a sight. The whole city returned thanks to the gods, in the most solemn manner, for having auspiciously ended the greatest war they had ever been engaged in, and put a period to their calamities with a signal and complete victory <sup>h</sup>.

THE next day an assembly was called to determine the fate of the captives, when one Diocles, a man of great esteem and authority among the people, was of opinion, that the two Athenian generals should be first whipt with rods, and then put to death, that the rest should be shut up in the quarries, and there allowed only two small measures of flower and one of water a day, and that the inhabitants of the island, who had joined them, should be sold for slaves. This opinion was strenuously opposed by Hermocrates, to whom the Syracusians were chiefly indebted for their late victory; he was a man highly esteemed for his eminent probity and justice; but nevertheless, so incensed was the multitude against the Athenians, that they would not suffer him to continue his speech. Hermocrates being thus interrupted by the shouts and clamours which echoed from all parts of the assembly, a venerable old man, by name Nicholaus, who had lost in this war two sons, the only heirs to his name and estate, rose up, supported by two of his servants. He no sooner offered to speak, but a profound silence was made, no one doubting but he would make a bitter invective against the prisoners. Nicholaus seeing the eyes of the whole multitude fixed upon him, spoke thus: “Dear countrymen,

“ you see me now appear here supported by the hands of my “ slaves, who formerly made my appearance supported by “ those of my beloved children ; but they are now gone,
“ and I deprived of the only comfort of my old age. How“ ever, though I am every day desiring they were alive, yet “ I cannot help thinking them happy for having sacrificed in “ defence of their country that life which they must have “ one day parted with by the law of nature. They are hap“ py, and I alone miserable, who have lost my children, “ and with them all hopes of posterity. And since I have “ bore so great a part in the calamities of this war, I shall “ ever hate and detest the Athenians, who, without any pro“ vocation, kindled it in the very heart of our country.
“ They indeed deserve the severest treatment ; but have not “ the gods, the just avengers of crimes, already punished “ their injustice, and revenged our sufferings sufficiently ?
“ They invaded us with a fleet of two hundred sail, and an “ army of forty thousand men, and not one ship, not one

“ the captives ? My opinion is, and I hope it will not seem “ strange to any here present, that they be all dismissed, and “ suffered to return unhurt to their country. Let it be said “ in all nations, that we have overcome the Athenians, not “ only in arms, but in mercy and humanity. Thus our “ enemies will not only be censured by others, but will even “ condemn themselves for having attempted to destroy men “ of so merciful a temper. To use that severity, which “ some unthinking men have advised, is intailing the hatred “ of so great and powerful a nation on our posterity, which “ is

“ is no-ways safe, the issues of war being so uncertain, that “ the conquerors are often by a sudden change of fortune “ brought lower than the conquered, as the event of this “ war has shewn. Those who besieged us in our capital are
 “ by an unexpected turn of fortune become our prisoners.
 “ It is therefore great prudence to shew compassion in the “ miseries of others, if we expect to find the same ourselves “ in their condition. As for Nicias, you all know, that he “ pleaded your cause in the assembly of the Athenians, and “ did all that lay in his power to dissuade his countrymen “ from this expedition. How base then and ungenerous “ would it be, to condemn this worthy man to death for “ obeying the commands of his superiors, though contrary “ to his own opinion and inclination? How hard-hearted “ must that man be, whose anger is not assuaged in seeing “ so renowned a general, lately the admiration of Greece, “ loaded with irons, and suffering under the miserable con“ dition of a slave, as if fortune in his life gloried to shew
 “ the greatness of her power? Since therefore under her “ kind auspices we have triumphed over our enemies, let us “ carry it with humanity and moderation, and not insult, “ with the cruelty of barbarians, over those who are of the “ same stock with ourselves.”

THE people seemed moved to compassion by this speech, especially as they expected to hear this venerable old man cry aloud for vengeance, on those who had brought all his calamities upon him; instead of which he earnestly sued for their pardon. But the enemies of the Athenians expatiating on their inveterate hatred to the Syracusians, and the many calamities which they had brought upon them, the people returned to their former resolution, and followed the advice of Diocles. The generals were first whipt, and then put to death, all compassionate men bewailing the hard lot of two such illustrious personages, especially of Nicias, who, as our author tells us, of all men of his time least deserved to be brought to so great a degree of misery. Thucydides says, that Gylippus pleaded their cause with a great deal of eloquence, out of gratitude with regard to Nicias, who after the overthrow which the Lacedemonians received at Pylus, had persuaded the Athenians to restore the captives to their liberty; out of generosity with respect to Demosthenes, who had ever been a professed enemy to the Spartans. On the other

people greatly affected by the speech of Nicholaus, and inclined to pardon the captives, effaced the good impressions he had made in their minds, and by a most bitter invective against the Athenians, which our historian sets down at length, so prejudiced the assembly against the generals, that they were immediately put to death. The other prisoners were thrust down into the quarries, where, crowded upon one another, they suffered inexpressible miseries for the space of eight months. They were there ever exposed to the inclemencies of the air and alterations of the weather; scorched in the day-time by the burning rays of the sun, and frozen in the night by the colds of autumn; poisoned by the stench of their own excrements, and the bodies of those who died of their wounds and of diseases, and lay together in heaps; in fine tormented with hunger and thirst, their allowance being scarce sufficient to keep them alive. Most of them died of the hardships they suffered; others were taken out of the quarries, and being sold for slaves met with a most generous treatment from their masters, who, moved with compassion, and thinking they had already sufficiently atoned for any fault they could be guilty of, restored them to their antient liberty <sup>k</sup>.

SUCH was the issue of this war after it had lasted near three years, and cost the Athenians an immense treasure, without their reaping any thing by it but shame and dishonour. The Syracusians rewarded their allies, especially the Lacedemonians, with great part of the spoils; what remained was divided among their own soldiers, and hung up in their temples, as monuments of the victory they had obtained by the powerful assistance of the deities worshipped there. Gylippus, on his return to Lacedemon, was accompanied by five-and-thirty Syracusan gallies to be employed under the conduct of Hermocrates against the Athenians. But this fleet was intirely destroyed in a sea engagement near Abydus, and the commanders obliged to return to the defence of their own country, which was soon involved in a new war.

THE Egestines, who had called the Athenians into Sicily, and constantly adhered to them during the whole course of the war, dreading the resentment of the Syracusians, and being anew attacked by the Selinuntines, who laid claim to great part of their territories, had recourse to the Carthaginians, offering to put their city into their hands, and declaring that they had rather live subject to Carthage than to Syra- cuse. After their ambassadors had delivered this message to the senate, the Carthaginians were greatly perplexed what to resolve. On one side, they were desirous of getting foot anew in Sicily, and possessing themselves of a city, which lay so convenient for them; on the other, they feared the power of the Syracusians, who had lately obtained so signal a victory over the Athenians, and would not fail to assist their antient allies the Selinuntines. At last the desire of enlarging their dominions prevailed, and the Egestines were promised succours. But before the Carthaginians came to an open rupture, they attempted to sow seeds of division between the Selinuntines and Syracusians. With this view they sent ambassadors to Syracuse, entreating that city to compose the differences of the contending parties in an amicable manner, and oblige the Selinuntines to content themselves with that portion of the lands in question, which they should think fit to allow them. They hoped, that if the Selinuntines should decline the arbitration of the Syracusians, that would breed a misunderstanding between the two cities; whence the Syracusians would not think themselves obliged to lend any assistance to the Selinuntines, who had refused to stand to their arbitration, nor the Selinuntines have the confidence to recur to them after they had thus affronted them by rejecting their mediation. But this trick of Punic policy did not succeed; the Syracusians indeed interposed their good offices, but finding the Selinuntines unwilling to come to an accommodation upon the terms they proposed, and remembering their eminent services during the late war, they would neither compel them to it, nor, for so slight a cause, renounce their alliance. Hereupon the Carthaginians, being resolved at all events to get possession of Egesta, sent to the Egestines five thousand men from Africa, and eight hundred from Campania. The latter had been hired by the Chalcidians to assist the Athenians against the Syracusians; but after their overthrow sailing back into Campania, stayed there, in hopes that some state might soon stand in need of their assistance. Accordingly the Carthaginians took them into their service, bought them horses, and placed them in garison at Egesta. These, in conjunction with the five thousand Africans, falling unexpectedly upon the Selinuntines, put them to flight, killed a thousand of them on the spot, and took all their baggage. Upon this open rupture between the two cities, both dispatched ambassadors to solicit succours from their confederates, the Selinuntines from the Syracusians, and the Egestines from the Carthaginians, which being promised on both sides, a most dreadful war broke out between the Egestines and Carthaginians.

nians on one hand, and the Selinuntines and Syracusians on the other. The Carthaginians, foreseeing the greatness of the undertaking they were to embark in, committed the whole management of the war to Hannibal, empowering him to raise what forces he thought fit. He was grandson to Hamilcar, who had been defeated and killed by Gelon before Himera, as we have related above, and son to Gisco, who being banished his country had retired to Selinus, where he died for want of necessaries. As he bore therefore a natural hatred to all the Greeks, and was desirous to wipe off by his own valour the disgrace of that defeat, which he considered as a stain upon his family, he was indefatigable all that summer, and the ensuing winter, in raising forces, not only in Africa, but in Spain and Italy, and making the other necessary preparations; insomuch that in the beginning of the spring he had no fewer than three hundred thousand men under his standard. These with an immense store of provisions, engines, arms, and all other things necessary for such an undertaking, he put on board threescore long gallies, and fifteen hundred transports, and setting sail, as soon as the season would allow, crossed the sea, and landed safe at a place called the well of Lilybæum, where the city of Lilybæum was afterwards built. After he had landed his forces, he caused all his ships to be drawn ashore for fear of giving umbrage to the Syracusians, and then, being joined by the Egestines, marched strait to Selinus, which city he invested, and began to batter the walls with incredible fury. The Selinuntines, who had been the only people in Sicily that sided with the Carthaginians against Gelon, did not think they would have come to such extremities, and therefore were at first struck with great terror. However, as they were not altogether without hopes, but expected speedy succours from Syracuse, and other confederate cities, they all joined as one man, and made a vigorous defence; even the women and children, regardless of danger, appeared on the ramparts, ready to sacrifice their lives in the defence of their country<sup>1</sup>.

As the walls were incessantly battered day and night by the rams and other warlike engines, a breach was soon opened, and the first who entered it were the Campanians, out of an ambition of distinguishing themselves above the rest; but they were repulsed with great loss, as were the Africans and Spaniards, whom Hannibal sent to support them. The fight lasted from noon to night, when Hannibal sounded the retreat. In the mean time the Selinuntines sent expresses to

Agrigentum, Gela, and Syracuse, acquainting them with the state of affairs. The Agrigentines and Geleans immediately armed their troops, but waited for the Syracusan auxiliaries with a design to fall upon the enemy with united forces. The Syracusians likewise without delay drew together what forces they could, but as they did not think them sufficient to relieve effectually the besieged, whom they apprehended to be in no imminent danger, they put off their march for some days, till they got together a stronger force. But Hannibal, as soon as it was light, renewing the assault, possessed himself of the breach which had been made the day before, and of another which his rams had opened near it, and from thence charging the besieged, obliged them to give ground, but could not put them in disorder, nor enter the city. Many fell on both sides; but the Carthaginians were constantly supplied with fresh men; whereas the Selinuntines had none to relieve them, being all employed at once in defending the breaches. Thus the assault was daily renewed for the space of nine days with incredible slaughter. At length the besieged being quite tired out, the Iberians, after a long contest, lodged on the ramparts; from thence they advanced into the city, but finding all the streets and passages barricadoed, and being at the same time sorely galled by showers of tiles and stones thrown by the women from the tops of the houses, they were obliged to retire to the ramparts. The next day they returned to the charge very early, and by continually pouring fresh men into the city, forced the Selinuntines to abandon the narrow streets, and pursued them into the market-place, where they made a stand, and were all to a man cut in pieces. Two thousand six hundred had, by the favour of the night, made their escape to Agrigentum before the enemy had forced the narrow passes; so that now there was not one single man left alive in the city. The Carthaginians therefore, raging in all parts without restraint, rifled the houses, and then set fire to them, and either threw into the flames the women and children they found in them, or, dragging them into the streets, put them all, without distinction, to the sword. Neither did this satiate their inhuman cruelty, which they carried so far as to mangle, in a barbarous manner, even the dead bodies, some of them carrying about with them numbers of hands tied round their girdles, and others, out of ostentation, bearing the heads of the slain on the points of their swords and spears. The city was razed two hundred and fifty years after it had been built, and the few women and children, who outlived this fatal day, carried away captives. Those who fled to Agrigentum, were received there with great humanity and tenderness, and abundantly supplied with all necessaries out of the public stores " (U).

besieged.

Hannibal, having thus taken and demolished Selinus, marched with all his army to Himera, extremely desirous to revenge on that city the death of his grandfather Hamilcar, who had been slain there by Gelon with an hundred and fifty thousand Carthaginians. On his march he was joined by twenty thousand Siculi and Sicani, whom he sent with the main body of the army to lay siege to the city, while he with a body of forty thousand men encamped on a rising ground at a small distance from it. The Syracusians had sent four thousand men to the assistance of the Himereans, under the conduct of Diocles, before the city was invested, and the other confederates had likewise sent what troops they could well spare. Wherefore the inhabitants, encouraged by these succours, and dreading to undergo the same fate as the Selinuntines, made a most vigorous defence. The Carthaginians made several breaches in the wall, but were constantly repulsed for several days successively, without being able to gain an inch of ground. This did not a little discourage the enemy, notwithstanding their late success at Selinus; which the Himereans observing made a sally with ten thousand men, cut many of the Carthaginians in pieces, and put the whole army to flight, pursuing them with great slaughter to the hill, where Hannibal was encamped. That general seeing his army in confusion,

• Idem, ibid.

(U) A few days after the city was taken, three thousand Syracusians arrived at Agrigentum on their march to the relief of Selinus. But understanding that the city was taken, they sent ambassadors to Hannibal to treat of the redemption of the captives, and to beg of him that he would at least spare the temples. Hannibal returned answer, that since the Selinuntines had not been able to defend their own liberty, they deserved to be treated like slaves; and that the gods, provoked at their wickedness, had forsaken both the city and the temples; whence it would be no sacrilege to strip them of their ornaments. The Syracusians, not satisfied with this answer, sent a second embassy, and on that occasion employed one Empediones of Selinus, who had always been of the Carthaginian party, and advised the citizens to open their gates to them, when they first appeared before the city. Hannibal received him with great demonstrations of kindness, restored him his estate, pardoned all those prisoners who were any ways related to him, and permitted the others, who had fled to Agrigentum, to return and people the city anew, upon paying to the Carthaginians an annual tribute.

hastened to their relief; upon which the battle was begun anew, and continued for some hours, victory inclining to neither side. At length the Himereans, being overpowered with numbers, gave ground; but three thousand of them kept their posts, and covered the retreat of their companions, sustaining the shock of the whole Carthaginian army till they all died upon the spot.

AFTER this engagement five and twenty gallies appeared off of Himera, and a report was spread all over the city and the enemy's camp, that the Syracusians with all their forces were coming to the relief of the city. Hereupon Hannibal, having put the flower of his troops on board his gallies, prepared to sail for Syracuse, hoping to surprize the city now that it wanted, as he supposed, sufficient forces to defend it. But those gallies proved to be the fleet, which the Syracusians had sent some time before to the aid of the Lacedemonians, returning home. As they touched at Himera, Diocles, commander in chief of the Syracusan auxiliaries there, advised them to sail with all speed to Syracuse, lest Hannibal should make any attempt upon that city. He thought it also adviseable to leave Himera for a while, and with one half of his forces to return to Syracuse on board the gallies, leaving the other half behind him, which he thought sufficient to hold out till he, after putting his own city in a state of defence, should return. This the besieged took very ill, but could not prevail upon Diocles to alter his measures. Upon his departure the Carthaginians doubled their attacks, and battered the walls night and day without intermission. On the other hand the besieged believing the ships would return speedily, were indefatigable in defending the walls, repairing the breaches, and repulsing the enemy. Thus they held out against the repeated assaults and utmost efforts of above three hundred thousand men till the very day the fleet appeared, when the Carthaginians, summoning all their courage and resolution, gave a general assault, and, with their numbers bearing all down before them, drove the citizens from the ramparts, and, in spite of their utmost efforts, entered the city sword in hand. There is no sort of cruelty which the barbarous Carthaginians Taken and and Iberians did not practise on this occasion; all they met, razed.
without regard to sex or age, were inhumanly butchered; the slaughter was so merciless, that the very channels in the streets flowed with blood. After they had plundered the temples and houses, and levelled the city with the ground, Hannibal caused three thousand of the captives to be carried to the place, where his grandfather had been defeated and killed ly

by Gelon's cavalry, and there first exposed them to the insults of his barbarians, and then caused them to be cruelly massacred <sup>n</sup>.

THUS ended this campaign, after which Hannibal, dismissing the Siculi and confederates, and disbanding the Campanians, embarked his troops, and set sail for Africa. When he arrived at Carthage, the whole city went out to meet him, and received him with loud and joyful acclamations, as a general that had performed greater things in so short a time than any ever before him.

Hermocrates banished.

ABOUT this time some disturbances arose in Syracuse, occasioned by the return of Hermocrates. This brave officer had signalized himself in the war against the Athenians, and had been afterwards sent with a fleet of thirty five galleys to the aid of the Lacedemonians. During his absence, the contrary faction, headed by Diocles (W), prevailing at home,

(W) Diocles was a man of great authority among the people. By his advice the form of government was altered after the first Carthaginian war, and the magistrates, contrary to the antient custom, chosen by lot. He also instituted laws for the Syracusans, which were observed, not only in the city of Syracuse, but in most of the free states of Sicily, Diocles being highly esteemed by all for his wisdom and probity. Others after his time made laws, namely Cephalus, who flourished under Timoleon, and Polydorus, who was contemporary with Hiero; but these were only called interpreters of the law, which was written in such obsolete language as was hardly understood; the title of law-giver was bestowed upon none but Diocles. He is said to have been a man of an inexorable nature and great severity. Among the many laws he made, one was, that if any man came armed into the court, where the public assemblies were held, he should be put to death, even though he had done it inadvertently. Not long after the publication of this law, some of the neighbouring people having invaded the territories of Syracuse, Diocles put on his armour to march out against them; but in the mean time a tumult arising in the court, he hastened thither to appease it with his sword by his side; which one there present observing, cried out, that he transgressed the laws which he himself had made. Whereupon Diocles, drawing his sword, answered, that he would confirm them with his blood, and ran himself through in the court. After his death divine honours were paid to him, and a temple erected to his memory, which was afterwards pulled down by Dionysius, when he surrounded the city with a new wall (28).

he was tried, and, without so much as being heard, condemned to banishment. As he was a man of great probity, and had on all occasions been very serviceable to his country, many of the citizens sought to have him recalled, knowing that his enemies had prevailed on the ungrateful multitude to banish him merely on account of his virtue, which gave them no small umbrage. But all their endeavours proving unsuccessful, Hermocrates himself returned into Sicily, and having raised an army of six thousand men, by the advice of his friends he advanced to Syracuse, and surprised one of the gates of the city. But the adverse party running to arms, and falling furiously upon his small army, cut most of them in pieces, and slew Hermocrates himself. All those who had declared in his favour, were condemned to perpetual banishment, and among the rest his son-in-law Dionysius, who made the Syracusians pay dear for the excesses they committed on this occasion, as we shall see in the sequel of the history °.

THE late success of the Carthaginians in Sicily revived the design which they had ever entertained of subduing the whole island. With this view they began to make new preparations, and raise another army, committing the whole management of the war to the same Hannibal. But as he pleaded his great age, and shewed himself unwilling to take upon him the command and return to Sicily, they joined in commission with him Imilcar the son of Hanno, one of the same family. These two generals being plentifully supplied with money, and impowered to raise what forces they thought necessary for so great an undertaking, not only made great levies at home, but sent officers with large sums into Spain, Italy, Libya, Sardinia, and the Balearic islands to hire numerous bodies of mercenaries. When all their forces were mustered at Carthage, the army was found to consist of three hundred thousand chosen men, as Ephorus informs us; but Timæus says, that they amounted only to an hundred and twenty thousand, or thereabouts. All things being got ready, the troops were embarked on a thousand transports, which, under the convoy of a numerous squadron of galleys, arriving safe in Sicily, landed on the coast of Agrigentum, and marched straight to that city P.

THE Syracusians and their confederates had sent ambassadors to Carthage to complain of the late hostilities practised upon them by Hannibal, and persuade the senate to forbear sending any troops into Sicily. But the Carthaginians returning a doubtful answer to this embassy, the Syracusians had put themselves in a posture of defence, and were prepared to give the enemy a warm reception. The Agrigentines especially, expecting this great storm would first discharge itself upon them, had carefully provided all things necessary for the sustaining of a long siege, following therein the directions of Dexippus the Lacedemonian, an officer of great courage and experience. Hannibal, on his arrival before the city, sent ambassadors to the Agrigentines, inviting them either to join him, or stand neuter, declaring he would be well satisfied with either, and forbear all hostilities if they only agreed to a treaty of amity and friendship. But both proposals being rejected, Imilcar and Hannibal, after having viewed the walls, and found a place, where they thought it would be no hard matter to make a breach, began to batter them with incredible fury. But the defence was no less vigorous than the attack; the besieged, in the first sally they made, burnt all the enemy's engines, destroyed the towers they had raised against the city, and after having made a great slaughter in the camp, returned in good order into the city. Hereupon Hannibal commanded all the tombs and stately monuments standing round the city, to be demolished, and mounts to be raised with the rubbish as high as the wall. Soon after the plague broke out in the army, and in a short time carried off a great number of the soldiers and the general himself. The Carthaginian soothsayers interpreted this disaster as a punishment inflicted by the gods in revenge of the injuries done to the dead; wherefore Imilcar, in whom the whole power was now vested, ordered supplications to be made according to the practice of Carthage, and a boy to be sacrificed to Saturn, in compliance with a custom which had long obtained among the Carthaginians; by his orders Neptune likewise was appeased, and several priests thrown into the sea, as the most pleasing victims to that deity. Imilcar having, as he imagined, by these cruelties atoned for the sacrileges of Hannibal, and pacified the gods, the assaults were renewed with more vigour than ever, and the city reduced to great straits.

IN the mean time the Syracusians having raised an army of above thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse, sent them to the relief of the besieged under the command of one Daphneus. Imilcar, upon intelligence of their approach, detached all the Iberians and Campanians with forty thousand Carthaginians, enjoining them to engage the enemy in the plains of the river Himera. Pursuant to his orders the Syracusians were attacked a few hours after they had passed the river, as they were advancing in good order through those large plains towards Agrigentum. The dispute was sharp, and the victory

a long time doubtful, the enemies being far superior in number to the Syracusians. But at length the latter carried the day, and pursued the Carthaginians, with great slaughter, to the very walls of Agrigentum. Upon the approach of the Syracusians, that body which was carrying on the siege, abandoning their posts, saved themselves by flight to Imilcar's camp, which was pitched on the neighbouring hills. Daphneus pursued them in good order with a design to attack the camp; but finding it strongly fortified, he thought it more advisable to guard all the avenues leading to it with his cavalry, and by that means oblige the enemy either to perish with famine, or come out of their lines and venture an engagement. Accordingly all the passages being blocked up, and the convoys intercepted, that numerous army was soon brought to such straits, that the Campanians and other mercenaries began to mutiny, and going in a body to Imilcar's tent, threatened to join the enemy if they had not their usual allowance of bread. The general, with much ado, prevailed upon them to bear patiently their present want for a few days, assuring them they should be very soon plentifully supplied with all sorts of provisions. He had been informed, that the Syracusians were then loading many ships with corn to be sent to Agrigentum, and did not the least doubt but he should intercept the convoy, the Syracusians not suspecting that he would attempt any thing by sea. Accordingly he dispatched messengers to Motya and Panormus where his fleet lay, enjoining the commanders to man the galleys with all possible expedition, and lie in wait at an appointed place, for the ships that were to bring the provisions. His orders were put in execution, and forty galleys being speedily equipped, the Syracusan fleet, consisting of threescore transports, laden with corn and all sorts of provisions, was intercepted. As this unexpected relief gave the Carthaginians fresh courage, so it greatly disheartened the Agrigentines, who, having already held out for the space of eight months, were in great want of all things, and without hopes of being relieved so quickly as their present necessity required. Eight hundred Campanians, who had formerly served under Hannibal, but were now in the service of the Agrigentines, observing the desperate condition the city was reduced to, went all over in a body to the Carthaginians; Dexippus, the Lacedemonian, was said to have been bribed with fifteen talents by the Carthaginians, and to have advised the Campanians and other Italian mercenaries to desert, since they were likely to be starved in the city, without the least prospect of rendering any service to those who had hired them. Thus the mercenaries falling off, and the inhabitants desponding for want of necessaries, a council of war was summoned, when it was judged absolutely impossible to hold out any longer, there not being provisions enough in the public stores to support the soldiery and people two days longer. Some were therefore for attacking the Carthaginians in their camp, others for abandoning the city, and conveying the inhabitants to some place of safety; this opinion prevailed, and the following night was fixed for their departure. This resolution, when publickly known, threw the whole city into the utmost consternation; lamentable outcries were heard in every house, and the grief and dread they were all seized with, in seeing themselves obliged to abandon their native country, their goods, and estates, is not to be expressed. They were inconsolable in seeing themselves stript at once of all their riches, but as life was still dearer, and they expected no mercy from so cruel an enemy, they complied with the resolution which had been taken in the council. What above all grieved them was the necessity they were under of leaving behind them the aged and sick, who, they knew, would be treated by the enemy with the utmost cruelty. Many, not finding in their heart to abandon their sick parents and relations, stayed behind to comfort them at their death, and then die by them. The rest, being guarded by the Syracusan troops, marched out and arrived safe at Gela, where they were received with great kindness and humanity, and plentifully supplied with all necessaries at the expence of the public. The Syracusians afterwards granted them the city of Leontini and its rich territory.

THE Syracusan army was no sooner retired, but Imilcar, marching out of his trenches, entered the city, not without some fear and jealousy, and put all those he found in it to the sword, not sparing even such as had fled to the temples. Among these was Gellias (X), a citizen famous for his wealth and integrity,

(X) Gellias was the richest citizen of Agrigentum, and is said to have built several rooms in his house of an extraordinary size for public entertainments, placing his servants at the gates, and charging them to invite all those who went by to be his guests. Five hundred horsemen from Gela happening to pass through Agrigentum in winter time, he not only entertained them with great magnificence, but furnished them all on their departure, as it was rainy weather, with cloaks and coats out of his wardrobe. Polyclitus the historian, as quoted by Diodorus, tells us, that when he served among the troops of Agrigentum, he saw a wine-cellar in his house, which contained three hundred great vessels full of wine, each of which held an hundred amphoræ. This Gellias, as our author in-

integrity, who seeing that the Carthaginians, without respecting the gods, plundered their temples, and murdered those who had taken sanctuary in them, set fire to the temple of Minerva, and consumed in the flames both himself and the immense riches of that stately edifice. However, the booty, which the enemy found in the place, was immensely rich, such as might be expected in one of the most opulent cities of Sicily, which contained two hundred thousand inhabitants, and had never before been plundered, or even besieged. An incredible number of pictures, vases, and statues, done by the greatest masters of those times, fell into the enemy's hands, the Agrigentines having an exquisite taste for the polite arts. Among other curiosities was the famous bull of Phalaris, which was sent to Carthage <sup>a</sup> (Y).

Imilcar having thus gained the city after an eight months siege, a little before the winter solstice, did not presently raze it, but there took up his winter quarters to give his army the necessary refreshment. In the mean time the deplorable fate of Agrigentum being publickly known, the whole island was struck with terror, and many of the inhabitants, forsaking their native cities, fled to Syracuse, or retired with their families and effects to Italy. Those who took sanctuary in Syracuse were treated with extraordinary kindness, and the chief men among them made free of the city. Among them were many Agrigentines, who filled the city with their complaints forms us, was of a very mean presence, but was endowed with extraordinary parts. Being once sent with the character of ambassador to the Centuripines, when he appeared in the assembly, all who were present burst out in a loud laugh; so ridiculous was his aspect. But Gellias told them, that they ought not to be surprized at his mean figure and appearance, since the Agrigentines always sent the most comely and handsome men to the noblest cities, but to those that were insignificant and of no account, such as himself (29).

(Y) Timæus endeavoured to prove in his history, as our author tells us, that there never had been any such bull, and bitterly inveighed against those historians who were so credulous as to believe such a fable. But the truth of their accounts was afterwards made plain; for Scipio Africanus, when he razed Carthage, about two hundred and threescore years after the destruction of Agrigentum, found among other things this very bull, and returned it to the inhabitants of Agrigentum, where it was still to be seen when Diodorus wrote his history, that is, in the reign of Magestus (30).

against the Syracusan commanders, as if they had betrayed Agrigentum into the enemy's hands. This raised such disturbances in Syracuse, as gave Dionysius a fair opportunity of seizing on the sovereign power, and depriving the inhabitants of that liberty which they had long abused, and by degrees turned into an unbridled licentiousness. The power of the populace was so great, that the most worthy citizens had either abandoned their native country, or led at home a private life, through fear of giving them any jealousy, or incurring their displeasure. The eminent services of their best commanders were often rewarded with death or banishment, the capricious multitude being led, by their groundless suspicions, to treat as enemies even those to whom they were indebted for their lives and safety. But Dionysius found means to curb their insolence, and punish both their cruelty towards strangers, and their ingratitude towards their own citizens.

stirs up
the people.*

Dionysius was a native of Syracuse, born, according to some, of a noble and illustrious family; according to others of a mean extraction. He was one of those who accompanied Hermocrates, when he attempted to return to Syracuse by force of arms, after he had been banished through the intrigues of his enemies. Hermocrates was killed in the attempt, and many of his friends afterward publicly executed. Dionysius was dangerously wounded, and the report of his death, purposely spread abroad by his relations, saved his life. When the war, we are now speaking of, broke out, he was by the intercession of his friends recalled, and distinguished himself at the battle fought near Agrigentum in a very particular manner. When the Agrigentines charged the Syracusan officers with treachery, as if they had been gained over by the Carthaginians with bribes to betray their country, Dionysius backed their accusations, and even impeached the magistrates as keeping a secret intelligence with the enemy, and attempting to introduce an oligarchy. His speech, which was entirely levelled against the wealthy and powerful citizens, and therefore agreeable to the humour of the people, set all the assembly in a flame; the people, already incensed against their commanders, being more exasperated by the speech of Dionysius, forthwith deprived them of their commands, and named others in their room, among whom was Dionysius, now as much esteemed and favoured by the populace, as he had been lately persecuted and hated. Having gained this step to preferment, he began to consider with himself how he might have his colleagues turned out, and the whole command of the army lodged in himself. With this view he never joined in any council of war with the other commanders, nor imparted to them them his resolutions, giving out that he durst not trust them, and that they had more at heart their own interest, than the welfare of their country. While he was thus by degrees paving his way to the throne, the most prudent among the citizens, being well apprised of his wicked designs, complained of his proceedings to the senate and magistrates, who fined him as a disturber of the public peace. According to the laws the fine was to be paid before he could speak in public, and Dionysius was not in a condition to discharge it. Hereupon Philistus the historian, a man of great wealth, not only paid the fine for him, but encouraged him to speak his mind freely, as it became a zealous citizen to do, offering to pay all the fines they should lay upon him. Dionysius, being thus supported by the wealth of a rich citizen and the favour of the people, as he was an eloquent speaker, bitterly inveighed against all those, who on account of their power or interest were in a condition to obstruct his designs, and by degrees brought them into disgrace with the people <sup>9</sup>.

ANOTHER scheme, which he formed, was attended with Gets the all the success he could have wished, and greatly strengthened Syracusan his party. There were at that time a great many Syracusan exiles re- exiles dispersed up and down Sicily, whom the faction of the called. nobility had banished, at different times and under various pretences. These Dionysius looked upon as the most proper tools for the execution of his designs; for he did not doubt but their gratitude towards him, and their hatred against those who had occasioned their misfortunes, would unalterably attach them to his party and interest. Wherefore in one of the assemblies, that were then frequently held to deliberate on the state of affairs, he applied with his usual address to the people in behalf of the exiles. A decree had passed for the raising a numerous body of troops to oppose the progress of the Carthaginians, and the people were very uneasy on account of the expence which the new levies would amount to. Dionysius took advantage of this favourable conjuncture and disposition of the people. He represented, that it was absurd and impolitic to bring troops from Italy and Peloponnesus at a vast charge, when they might be supplied with excellent forces, without being at any expence at all; that if they recalled their own countrymen, who were dispersed all over Sicily, they would by that kindness oblige them to sacrifice willingly their lives in defence of those who restored them to their former condition, &c. His speech had such an effect on the people, that a decree was immediately passed in favour of the exiles. Many plainly perceived what he had in view, but none durst contradict him, knowing that he had gained such an ascendant over the people, that their opposition would not only prove ineffectual, but incense the multitude against them, and raise the reputation of Dionysius, to whom alone the exiles would be indebted for their return. The decree was no sooner published, but the exiles flocked from all parts to Syracuse <sup>r</sup>.

IN the mean time the inhabitants of Gela, falling out among themselves, implored the protection of Syracuse, lest the common enemy should take advantage of their disagreement, and by the assistance of one party possess themselves of the city. Dionysius immediately marched thither with two thousand foot and four hundred horse, and finding the city in an uproar occasioned by the unjust pretensions of the nobility over the people, he sided with the latter, and caused those to be put to death, whom the people condemned in their assembly. Their estates he confiscated and sold, and with the money arising from the sale paid the soldiers, who were there in garison under Dexippus, their arrears, distributing the overplus among the troops that came with him from Syracuse. At the same time he assured them all, that their pay should be doubled, which gained him the hearts of the soldiery. The Geleans treated him with the highest marks of distinction, and even sent ambassadors to Syracuse to return their thanks for the important service that city had done them in sending thither Dionysius.

DURING his stay at Gela, he endeavoured to gain over to his views Dexippus; but not being able to persuade the Lacedemonian to come into his measures, he marched back to Syracuse with all his forces, promising to return soon with a more numerous army. He arrived at Syracuse just as the people were coming out of the theatre, who thronging about him enquired what news he brought concerning the Carthaginians. He answered with a sad and dejected air, that the city had not so much cause to be afraid of them, as of her own officers and magistrates, who instead of making the necessary preparations against the approach of so formidable an enemy, lulled the people asleep with trivial amusements and idle shews, and suffered the troops to want necessaries, converting their pay to their private uses; that he had long suspected, but now saw plainly, what they aimed at; that Imilcar had sent an officer to him under pretence of redeeming some captives, but in truth to persuade him not to pry too narrowly into the conduct of his colleagues, and if he would not enter into their measures, at least not to obstruct them; that he was come determined to lay down his commission, that he might leave no room for injurious suspicions of his acting in concert with traitors, who basely sold their country.

THIS speech being divulged about the city and among the troops, the very next day an assembly was convened, when Dionysius renewed his complaints against the generals, and was heard with universal applause. At length some in the assembly cried out, that it was necessary to appoint him generalissimo, and that the thing ought not to be put off till the enemy was battering the walls; that the greatness of the war required such a commander, and that Gelon was chosen generalissimo on the like occasion, and defeated the Carthaginian army consisting of three hundred thousand men. As for the traitors, their cause might be referred to another day, but the present affair would admit of no delay. Nor was it deferred in effect, for the people, who, as the historian observes, are always apt to close with the worst advice, elected that instant Dionysius commander in chief, with an absolute and unbounded power. Made generalissimo.

ALL things succeeding thus according to his wish, he caused a decree to be passed, ordering that for the future the soldiers pay should be doubled, alledging that they would be thereby encouraged to fight more chearfully in defence of their country. When the assembly broke up, the Syracusians upon second thoughts began to repent of what they had done, being sensible, they had acted imprudently in putting the whole power into the hands of one man, which was in effect giving themselves a master, who might, if he pleased, lord it over them without control. Dionysius therefore, to prevent the change of the people's minds, began to contrive how he might procure a guard for his person; if he could but gain this point, he concluded he might easily usurp the sovereignty. With this view he commanded all that were able to bear arms, and under forty years of age, to march with thirty days provisions to the city of Leontini, which belonged to the Syracusians, and was full of foreigners and exiles, persons very fit for the execution of his design. He encamped the first night on the plains of Leontini, where he caused a great noise and clamour to be made in the dead of the night by his servants and attendants, as if his enemies had attempted to assassinate him in his tent. In this alarm he fled to the castle of Leontini, where he passed the rest of the night, after having caused a great many fires to be lighted, and drawn off with him such of the troops as he most confided in. At break of day he acquainted the people Procures a guard.

ple of Leontini with the danger he pretended to have been in, and feigning to be still under great apprehension, he demanded leave to chuse himself a guard of six hundred men for the security of his person. His demand seemed very reasonable, and was accordingly complied with. He chose out a thousand men for his guard upon the spot, armed them completely, and encouraged them with great promises. He also attached the mercenaries to his interest in a peculiar manner, by addressing them with great freedom and affability. He then made several alterations and removals in the troops, giving commissions to such as he could rely upon, and turning out those whom he distrusted. Among the latter was Dexippus the Lacedemonian, whom he sent back into Greece, not doubting but the Syracusians would chuse him for their general, if they should attempt the recovery of their liberty; for he was an officer of great experience, and could not by any offers be prevailed upon to fall in with Dionysius. At the same time he sent orders to the garison of Gela to join him, and assembled from all quarters fugitives, exiles, debtors, and criminals<sup>c</sup>.

WITH this train he returned to Syracuse, which trembled at his approach. But the people were no longer in a condition to oppose his designs, or dispute his authority; the city being full of mercenaries, who were in arms, and the Carthaginians with a mighty army on the frontiers. The first thing he did after his return to Syracuse was to possess himself of the citadel, where the arms and provisions were lodged; which he no sooner saw himself master of, than bidding defiance to his opposers, he publicly declared himself king of Syracuse in the twenty-fifth year of his age. To strengthen himself the more in the tyranny, he married the daughter of Hermocrates, whose family was the most powerful of Syracuse, and gave his own sister in marriage to Polyxenus, brother-in-law to Hermocrates. Afterwards he called an assembly, in which he caused Daphneus and Demarchus, who had been the most active in opposing him, to be condemned. Thus Dionysius, from a simple notary, as Diodorus informs us, raised himself to the sovereignty of the greatest and most opulent city of Sicily<sup>c</sup>.

IN the mean time, the Carthaginians, under the command of Imilcar, having on the return of the spring razed the city of Agrigentum, marched with all their forces against Gela, and sitting down before that place, fortified their camp with a deep ditch and a wall, not doubting but Dionysius would come to the relief of the besieged with a powerful army. The Ge-leans in the beginning of the siege were for sending their wives and children to some place of safety ; but not one of them could be prevailed upon to retire, they all protesting that they would undergo the same fate as their husbands and parents. This resolution encouraged the Geleans to exert themselves in the defence of persons so dear to them, and to whom they were so dear. They made several sallies, and cut great numbers of the enemy in pieces. No sooner was a breach opened in the wall, but the inhabitants repaired it, being indefatigable night and day on the ramparts, where their wives and children cheerfully shared with them the labour and danger. Thus they held out a long time, though their city was but very indifferently fortified, against an army of above three hundred thousand men, without receiving any aid from their allies. At length Dionysius advanced to their relief at the head of fifty thousand foot and a thousand horse ; but after some unsuccessful attempts, not caring to put all to the issue of a battle, he persuaded the inhabitants to abandon their country, as the only means to save their lives, and covered their retreat with the forces he had brought to relieve the place. The Carthaginians immediately entered the city, and either put to the sword or crucified all those they found in it. From Gela they advanced to Camarina, whither the Geleans had retired ; and Dionysius, being informed of their march, obliged the Camarinians likewise to remove from their native city, and withdraw with their wives and children to Syracuse. The moving sight of aged persons, matrons, and tender infants, hurried on beyond their strength from two several cities in one and the same country, and stripped of all their wealth and possessions, raised compassion in the breasts of Dionysius's soldiers, and incensed them against the tyrant. They suspected him to act in concert with the Carthaginians ; the more because they did not offer to pursue him, and none of his mercenaries had been killed in the attacks he made on the enemy's camp before Gela. The Italians therefore left his camp in a body, and marched homewards through the heart of the country. The Syracusan cavalry, after having attempted to kill him on the march, clapt spurs to their horses, and rode full gallop to Syracuse, where they entered the citadel without opposition, the guards being quite ignorant of what had happened at Gela and Camarina. Upon their arrival they forced his palace, ransacked his treasures, carried off all his rich furniture, and abused his wife so cruelly, that through grief and shame she poisoned herself. In the mean time Dionysius, suspecting their design, followed them with all possible expedition, and, having marched fifty miles without ever halting, arrived at midnight with an hundred horse and five hundred foot at the gate of Acradina, which he found shut against him. He immediately caused the gate to be burnt down, and having thus opened himself a way into the city, he cut in pieces a body of the most wealthy and noble citizens, who, without waiting for the people, had hastened to the defence of the gate. Being now master of the city, he scoured the streets, putting all those to the sword that came in his way, and even entering the houses of such as he took to be his enemies, and cutting them off with their whole families. Next morning at break of day the whole body of his troops arrived; but the unhappy fugitives from Gela and Camarina, incensed against the tyrant, retired to Leontini.

tween the Carthaginians and Dionysius.

In the mean time, a plague breaking out in the Carthaginian camp, Imilcar, not finding himself in a condition to carry on the war, sent a herald to Syracuse to offer terms of peace to the conquered. His unexpected arrival was very acceptable to Dionysius, and a peace was immediately struck up on the following terms: That the Carthaginians, besides their antient acquisitions in Sicily, should still possess the countries of the Sicani, and the dismantled cities of Selinus, Agrigentum, and Himera with their territories; that the Geleans and Camarineans should be suffered to return to their respective countries and live there, paying an annual tribute to the Carthaginians; that the Leontines, Messenians, and all the other inhabitants of Sicily should live according to their own laws, and enjoy their liberties, except the Syracusians, who should continue subject to Dionysius. These articles being agreed to by both parties, Imilcar embarked his troops, and set sail for Carthage, after having lost above the half of his army by the plague, which afterwards made a dreadful havock in Africa *.

Dionysius, foreseeing that the Syracusians would not fail to take advantage of the peace with the Carthaginians to attempt the recovery of their liberty, neglected nothing on his side in support of his power. He fortified the island, which was very strong by nature, and divided it from the rest of the city with a high and thick wall, which was at due distances flanked with strong towers. He built likewise at a vast expence a castle, which commanded the city, to serve him for a retreat in case of any sudden commotion. As to the lands, he chose the most fertile for himself and his friends, the rest he equally distributed among the citizens, including in that number the slaves, whom he made free, and called Neopolites, or new citizens. In the same manner he divided the houses, except those in the island, which he bestowed on his mercenaries, and such friends as he could confide in <sup>w</sup>.

HAVING taken these precautions for his own security, and thinking his authority sufficiently established, he began to think of extending his dominions, and subjecting several free states of Sicily, which had sided with the Carthaginians. He marched first against the city of Herbessus; but while he was employ'd in the siege of that place, the Syracusians, who had been lifted for that expedition, seeing their swords restored to them, thought it their duty to employ them in the recovery of their liberty. One of the tyrant's officers, endeavouring to prevent their meeting together in private cabals, was killed on the spot; and his death served as a signal for the rest to take up arms and join in the common cause. They sent immediately to Ætna for the horse, for they had retired thither, and possessed themselves of that castle when Dionysius first usurped the sovereignty. Dionysius alarmed at these commotions broke up the siege, and hastening to Syracuse made himself master of that city, before the news of the revolt in the army had reached it. The revolters, being joined by the cavalry from Ætna, followed him close, and, encamping on Epipolæ, cut off all communication with the country. At the same time they dispatched messengers to Rhegium and Messina, soliciting their aid by sea for the recovery of their liberty. The messengers were kindly received in both places, and fourscore galleys well-manned sent with all possible expedition to support so good a cause. Being thus reinforced, they promised by the common crier, a great reward to any one that should kill the tyrant, and the freedom of the city to all foreigners, who should abandon him and come over to them. A great number of Dionysius's mercenaries allured by these promises forsook him, and were immediately made free of Syracuse, and besides rewarded with large sums, which so encouraged them, that in a few days the tyrant saw himself quite abandoned by those in whom he chiefly confided. And now the Syracusians, having prepared engines for the battering down of the wall, with repeated assaults so harassed those few that still kept with the tyrant, that they were soon reduced to the utmost extremity. In this desperate condition Dionysius assembled his friends, to consult with them rather by what kind of death he should put an end to his career, than by what means he might save his life or maintain the sovereignty. They were divided in their opinions. Heloris advised him to lay violent hands on himself before he was forced to resign the sovereign power, telling him, that the royal title would be the greatest ornament of his sepulchre. Polyxenus would have had him attempt to break through the enemy's camp, on the swiftest horse he had, and retiring to those places, which were subject to the Carthaginians, implore the assistance of the Campanians, whom Imilcar had left to defend his conquests in Sicily. But Philistus the historian opposed this advice, telling Dionysius that he ought not to fly from the crown, but hold it to the last gasp with both his hands. Dionysius closed with this advice, and resolved to part with his life, rather than with the power he had acquired. However, to gain time, he sent deputies to the Syracusians, demanding permission to depart the city with his friends and adherents, which was granted; and five ships were allowed him to transport his men and effects. In the mean time he sent privately dispatches to the Campanians, who garisoned the places in the possession of the Carthaginians, with great offers, if they would hasten to his relief*.

THE Syracusians, believing they had now got the better of the tyrant, and trusting to the treaty, disarmed part of their troops, and suffered the others to rove about in the fields, as if there were nothing further to be feared. In the mean time the Campanians, encouraged by Dionysius's generous promises, arrived unexpectedly at Syracuse, and having killed all who opposed them, broke through into the port, where he was shut up. At the same time three hundred mercenaries more came to his assistance. The face of affairs was then entirely altered; and Dionysius, taking advantage of the consternation and distraction that reigned in the enemy's camp, made a vigorous sally, and drove them as far as that part of the city, which was called Neapolis. The slaughter was not great, Dionysius, to ingratiate himself with the Syracusians, having given orders to spare those that fled. With the same view he caused the dead to be buried, which had so good an effect on the minds of the simple populace, that above seven thousand of them joined him. But the Syracusan cavalry could not by any offers be prevailed upon to side with him; wherefore seeing all lost they retired anew to their strong castle of Ætna, waiting there for another opportunity of pulling down the tyrant. Dionysius sent frequent messages to them, exhorting them to lay aside their animosities, and return to their country; but the only answer they returned was, that they had rather live free in exile, than in their own country subject to a tyrant. All the rest returned home, and again acknowledged Dionysius for their sovereign, who treated them for some time with great kindness and humanity. When all things were again quiet, he discharged the Campanians with great rewards, not daring to trust their fickle and unconstant humour. These arriving at the city of Entella prevailed with the citizens to receive them within their walls; which favour they requited by murdering in the night all the townsmen, and possessing themselves of the city, they married the wives of the deceased, and maintained themselves for many years in possession of the place.

Dionysius being now convinced by experience, that he could not by any means trust the Syracusians, resolved to disarm them all, and because that, if done with open violence, might occasion great commotions, he waited till most part of the inhabitants had left the city, and were employed abroad in gathering in their harvest. He then searched narrowly every house, and seized on all the arms he could find. Afterwards he enclosed the citadel with another wall, fitted out a powerful fleet, hired a great many foreigners, and took all possible measures to secure himself against the attempts of the Syracusians.

*He disarms
cusians.*

Having sufficiently provided for his safety at home, he began to extend his conquests abroad, not only with a view of enlarging his dominions, and encreasing his revenues, but in order to divert his subjects from the sense of the evils attending slavery by employing them in military expeditions, to which the hopes of riches and plunder would stir them up. Having therefore mustered his troops, he took the field, and in the very first campaign possessed himself of Naxos, Catana, Leontini, Ætna, Enna, and other cities. Some of them he treated with great clemency, to gain the esteem and affection of the people, others he plundered, and sold the inhabitants for slaves, to strike terror into the country.

THESE conquests alarmed the neighbouring cities, that saw themselves threatened with the same danger. Rhegium, situate on the opposite coast of the strait which divides Sicily from Italy, taking umbrage at the great naval preparations carried on at Syracuse, entered into an alliance with Messana, on the Sicilian side of the strait, and, having raised a considerable army, sent a messenger to the Syracusians, acquainting them, that if they were desirous of shaking off the yoke they groaned under, they should be assisted with a numerous fleet

and powerful army. The Syracusians readily promised to perform their part; but while the joint forces of Messana and Rhegium were upon the point of marching against the tyrant, disputes arising among the troops and officers of the two armies, the enterprize was dropped, and the mighty preparations for war ended in a treaty of peace and alliance between Dionysius and the two cities.

*Prepares to make war on the Car-

Dionysius had concluded the late peace with the Carthaginians, with no other view, but to gain time to establish his authority: He therefore no sooner saw himself firmly seated on the throne, but he began to make the necessary preparations for renewing the war, designing nothing less than to drive them quite out of Sicily. As he was very sensible how formidable the power of the Carthaginians was at that time, he made preparations suitable to the undertaking he was going upon. His first care was to bring to Syracuse, from all parts of Sicily, Greece, and Italy, great numbers of workmen, whom he employed in forging all sorts of arms. Not only the porches of the temples, but the schools, walks, piazzas about the forum, and every public place, nay even private houses were filled with workmen. The great wages, which Dionysius paid them, induced the best artificers in every profession to quit their own country, and flock to Syracuse. Dionysius himself was continually among them, encouraging them with great rewards to dispatch the work in hand. Such as distinguished themselves by their ingenuity or application, were sure to receive some particular marks of his favour. He even invited them to dine with him, and took pleasure in entertaining them with all the freedom and kindness of a friend. The artificers thus encouraged were indefatigable, striving to outvie one another; insomuch, that in a short time an hundred and forty thousand compleat suits of armour were finished. He then applied himself entirely to the fitting out of a fleet, capable of disputing with the Carthaginians the sovereignty of the sea. The timber for building his gallies he brought at a great expence from Italy, where it was drawn on carriages to the sea-side, and then shipped for Syracuse. Having provided the necessary materials, he employed such a vast number of workmen, that a fleet of two hundred sail was soon ready to put to sea; to these he added an hundred and ten old gallies, which he caused to be made as serviceable as the new ones. The preparations he made both by sea and land were so great and expensive, that one would have taken them, as our author observes, to have been the utmost effort of the whole island. The fleet was manned with an equal number number of citizens and foreigners. Syracuse, and the cities in its dependence, supplied him with great part of his land-forces: many came from Italy and Greece, the great pay he offered inducing them to flock over in crouds and list in his service. Being sensible of what importance it is for a general to gain the affection of his troops, he applied himself in a particular manner to oblige all, especially the Syracusians. With this view he entirely changed his behaviour for some time; kindness, civility, a disposition to do good, and an insinuating condescension, took place of that imperious air and inhuman temper, which had rendered him so odious.

Dionysius, seeing his great preparations now compleat, and the army in a condition to take the field, assembled the Syracusians, and acquainted them with his design, which was, he said, to make war upon the most implacable enemy the Greeks had; he represented to them, in a pathetic speech, the many calamities, which the Carthaginians had brought upon Sicily, adding, that the plague, which had lately wasted Carthage, offered them a fair opportunity of being revenged on them, for the inhuman cruelties they had practised on their countrymen. The assembly readily concurred in his opinion; the antient hatred they bore the Carthaginians, their rage against them for having brought their city under the power of a tyrant, and the hopes they entertained of finding some opportunity of recovering their former liberty, united them in their suffrages, and war was unanimously resolved on. Upon the breaking up of the assembly, Dionysius granted leave to the people to seize on all the goods and estates of the Carthaginians, who, upon the faith of treaties, had settled at Syracuse, and there carried on a considerable trade<sup>y</sup>.

Dionysius, finding the Syracusians no less desirous of the war than himself, dispatched an herald to Carthage, with a letter to the senate and people, notifying to them, that if they did not forthwith withdraw their garisons from all the Greek cities in Sicily, the people of Syracuse would treat them as enemies. This letter, being read first in the senate, and afterwards in the assembly of the people, occasioned a general alarm at Carthage, which the plague had reduced to a miserable condition. However, they were not dismayed, but sent officers into all parts with considerable sums to raise troops with the utmost diligence, and appointed Imilcar commander in chief of all their forces.

answer of the Carthaginians he took the field, and his army was daily increased by the arrival of new troops, which, out of hatred to the Carthaginians, flocked to him from all parts: It amounted to fourscore thousand foot and three thousand horse. The fleet consisted of two hundred long gallies, and five hundred transports, laden with warlike engines and all sorts of provisions. He opened the campaign with the siege of Motya, where the Carthaginians kept all their stores and provisions. This city stood near mount Eryx, in a small island about a mile from the shore, to which it was joined by a small neck of land; this the besieged immediately cut off to prevent the approaches of the enemy on that side. Dionysius after having taken a view of the place with his engineers commanded the canal between the city and the shore to be filled up with rubbish, and his gallies to anchor at the mouth of the harbour. Having given these orders he left his brother Lep- tines, commander in chief of the fleet, to carry on the siege, while he with his land-forces went to reduce the cities in alliance with the Carthaginians, which, terrified at the approach of so great an army, all submitted, except five, viz: Ancyra, Solas, Egesta, Panormus, and Entella. The two last he besieged, but not being able to reduce them in so short a time as he expected, he returned with his whole army to Motya, not doubting, but all other places would surrender as soon as they saw him master of this <sup>2</sup>.

In the mean time Imilcar, who was busy in raising men and making other preparations for the war in Sicily, ordered his admiral to set sail from Carthage with ten gallies, and making strait to Syracuse, to destroy all the vessels he should find in that harbour. What he proposed by this was to divide the enemy's forces, and oblige Dionysius to send part of his fleet to the defence of Syracuse. The admiral, pursuant to his orders, entered the harbour in the night, and having sunk most of the ships he found there, sailed back to Carthage without the loss of a single man.

Dionysius, on his return to Motya, having set more hands at work, speedily filled up the canal with heaps of stone and rubbish, so that he could make his approaches as on the dry land. He then brought forward his engines, battered the place with his rams, advanced to the walls towers six stories high rolled upon wheels, and from thence galled the besieged with continual volleys of arrows and stones discharged from his catapults, an engine at that time of late invention. The place was at-sors had opened several breaches in the walls, and entered the city sword in hand, the besieged still persisted in defending the narrow streets and passages with incredible valour, so that they were drove from street to street, till, being quite tired out and overpowered with numbers, they were all cut in pieces. The soldiers, enraged at so obstinate a defence, put all to the sword without distinction of sex or age, those only excepted, who took sanctuary in the temples. The city was given up to be plundered, Dionysius being glad to have such an opportunity of gaining the affection of the troops by the allurements of gain and booty. He rewarded one Archylus, who first mounted the wall, with an hundred minas, and all the rest in proportion to their merit. Such of the Motyans as were left alive he sold for slaves, but commanded Diarmenes, and all the Greeks who had joined the Carthaginians, to be crucified. Having thus reduced the strongest city in Sicily subject to Carthage, and placed a numerous garison in it under the command of one Bito a Syracusan, and ordered Leptines with an hundred and twenty galleys to watch the Carthaginians at sea, summer now drawing to an end, he returned with his army to Syracuse. And taken.

IN the mean time the Carthaginians, having certain intelligence of the strength of Dionysius, resolved to surpass him in numbers both of men and ships; and accordingly, having made an extraordinary effort, they raised an army of three hundred thousand foot and four thousand horse. Their fleet, under the command of Mago, consisted of four hundred galleys, and upwards of six hundred ships of burden laden with provisions and engines of war. The troops being embarked, and the fleet ready to set sail, Imilcar delivered his orders to the commanders of the fleet sealed up, enjoining them not to open them till they were out at sea, and then to observe them with all strictness. This precaution he took (and it is the first time that we find it used) to prevent spies from informing the enemy of his design. The orders were, that they should make strait to Panormus, which was appointed the place of the general rendezvous, and thither they steered their course with a fair wind. But the transports, having outailed the galleys, were attacked off the coast of Panormus by Leptines, who sunk fifty of them, in which five thousand men and two hundred chariots were lost; the rest tacking about had the good luck to escape. As soon as the galleys appeared Leptines retired, and Imilcar, having landed his troops, marched directly against the enemy, commanding the fleet to sail along the coast near the army. On his march he took Eryx by treachery, and hastening from thence to Motya, reduced that a important place, before Dionysius, who was then besieging Egesta, could send any forces to its relief. The Syracusians and their confederates were for venturing a battle, but Dionysius thought it more adviseable to retire to Syracuse, and abandon all the open country to the mercy of the Carthaginians, who, flushed with their success, marched strait to Messana. Imilcar was desirous to possess himself of that city on account of its situation ; for being once master of it, he could easily intercept all succours sent to the enemy either from Italy or Greece ; and besides, the haven was capable of receiving his whole fleet, which consisted of five hundred sail and upwards. When the inhabitants heard of the approach of the enemy, they could not agree among themselves about the measures to be taken on that occasion. Some, alarmed at the great strength of the Carthaginians, and seeing themselves deserted by their confederates were for submitting to the enemy ; others were resolved to hold out to the last, and cheerfully sacrifice their lives in the defence of their liberties. They were encouraged to this resolution by an antient prophecy, whereby it was foretold, that the Carthaginians should be one day carriers of water in that city. This they interpreted as if the Carthaginians should be slaves in Messana, and therefore, having sent away their wives and children with all their treasures to the neighbouring cities, they began to make the necessary preparations. But in the mean time the Carthaginian fleet having, by the favour of a strong gale, entered the harbour, and with a great number of engines battered down the walls on that side the inhabitants hastened in crouds to defend the breaches, leaving the other parts of the wall quite unguarded. Imilcar took advantage of this confusion, and attacking the city on the land side entered it without opposition. All those, who were on the ramparts, died valiantly on the spot the others either fled to the neighbouring cities, or threw themselves into the sea, and made their escape to the opposite shore of Italy. Imilcar entering Messana with his whole army, and considering that it was too far distant from the cities held by the Carthaginians, ordered his soldiers to raze it to the ground, and his orders were executed with such severity, that there was not one house left standing in the whole city ; nay, our historian tells us, that, after the departure of the Carthaginians, it was hard to tell where Messana had stood, the very rubbish being carried away and thrown into the sea, which discovered the implacable hatred Imilcar bore to the Greeks.

THE fame of these successes being spread all over the island, most of the inhabitants, who hated Dionysius in their hearts, and had only been reconciled to him in appearance and out of fear, took this opportunity to quit his party and join the Carthaginians. He raised new forces, and giving the slaves their liberty, manned with them three-score gallies. His whole army amounted to thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, and his fleet to an hundred and eighty gallies. With these he took the field, and removed about twenty miles from Syracuse. Imilcar upon advice of his march advanced to meet him, his land-army being attended by the fleet, which kept near the coast. When the Carthaginians arrived at Naxos, they could not continue any longer their march by the sea-side, but were obliged to take a long compass round mount Ætna, which by a violent eruption had covered all the neighbouring country with burning ashes. Imilcar therefore ordered Mago to sail to Catana, and there wait, till he, marching through the heart of the country, should rejoin him with the land-forces. Dionysius, apprised of this, hastened with all speed to Catana with a design to attack Mago, before Imilcar's army came up; he hoped that his land-forces drawn up on the shore would greatly encourage his own mariners and discourage the enemy's: besides, if his fleet were worsted, both ships and men had a place of safety to retire to.

HAVING therefore drawn up all his land-forces on the shore, he sent out Leptines with the whole fleet against the enemy, commanding him to engage in close order, and not to break his line upon any account whatsoever. The Carthaginians, seeing the Greek troops drawn up on the shore, and the navy advancing in good order against them, were struck with terror, and began to make to the shore with a design to save themselves over land and join Imilcar; but recollecting that this was equally, if not more, dangerous, they resolved to try their fortune by sea; and accordingly drawing themselves up in a line, they waited for the enemy, Leptines inconsiderately advancing with thirty of his best gallies, contrary to the express command of Dionysius, sunk several of the enemy's ships, but was himself surrounded, and, after having fought for some hours hand to hand with the enemy as if in a battle on land, was obliged to fly. The flight of the admiral disheartened the Syracusians, and gave the enemy fresh courage; the former fled to the shore where their land-forces were drawn up, but were closely pursued by the Carthaginians. Many abandoning their ships threw themselves into the sea, hoping to save their lives by swimming to the shore; but the Carthaginian transports, which lay near the shore, having manned their boats, made a dreadful havock of those unhappy men, when they were not in a condition to make any resistance.

The land-army saw them perish, without being able to give them the least relief. In this engagement above an hundred of the Syracusan gallies were either sunk or taken, and more than twenty thousand of their men killed in the battle or pursuit.

Syracuse.

UPON this misfortune the land-forces, under the command of Dionysius, solicited their generals to lead them against Imilcar, alledging, that their unexpected arrival would strike terror into the enemy, and give them a fair opportunity of retrieving their late loss, while the enemy's troops were fatigued with their long and hasty march. This proposal pleased Dionysius at first; but while he was preparing to march, some of his friends remonstrating to him, that Mago in the mean time with his victorious fleet might possess himself of Syracuse, he altered his resolution, and hastened with his whole army to the defence of that metropolis. Many of the Sicilians, being unwilling to undergo the fatigues and hardships of a siege, deserted, and either joined the enemy, or withdrew to their respective homes<sup>a</sup>.

besieged.

Imilcar in two days march arrived at Catana, where he halted some time to refresh his troops, and then, animated with the good success that attended his arms, marched strait to Syracuse with a design to besiege it; while his fleet, under the command of Mago, sailed along the coast, carrying great plenty of provisions for the subsistence of so numerous an army. The arrival of the enemy threw the city into the utmost consternation. Above two hundred gallies, adorned with the spoils of the enemy, entered in a kind of triumph the great haven of Syracuse, and were followed by a thousand transports; so that the harbour, capacious as it was, could hardly contain so great a navy. The fleet had scarce cast anchor, when the army appeared on the other side, consisting of three hundred thousand foot and four thousand horse. Imilcar took up his quarters in the temple of Jupiter, and the rest of the army encamped round it, about twelve furlongs from the city. The next morning the Carthaginian general, advancing with his army in battalia to the very walls of the city, offered the inhabitants battle. But as they were not so imprudent as to accept the challenge, he returned to his camp, well satisfied at his having extorted from the Syracusians a tacit confession of their own weakness and his superiority. At the same time he ordered an hundred of his best gallies to enter the two other harbours, viz. the Little Port and that of Trogilus, to strike more terror into the Syracusians, and convince them that the Carthaginians were likewise masters at sea. As he met with no opposition, he sent out parties for thirty days together to lay waste the country, cutting down groves, and destroying all before him. He took by assault the quarter of the town called Acradina, where he plundered the rich temples of Ceres and Proserpine. He considered the city as a sure prey, which could not possibly escape him ; but at the same time foreseeing, that the siege would be long and tedious, he surrounded his camp with a trench, and enclosed it with strong walls, after having demolished for that purpose all the tombs which stood round the city, and amongst others that of Gelon and his wife Demarata, which was a monument of great magnificence. He built three forts near the sea at equal distances from each other, one at Plemmyrium, another about the middle of the port, and the third near the temple of Jupiter, laying up in these great stores of provision. He sent likewise transports to Sardinia and Africa to bring from thence corn and other necessaries.

IN the mean time Polyxenus, whom Dionysius had dispatched into Italy and Greece with great sums of money to raise what forces he could, arrived with a fleet of thirty ships under the command of Pharacidas the Lacedemonian. This reinforcement came very seasonably, and somewhat raised the courage of the dispirited Syracusians, who, spying a large vessel laden with provisions for the enemy, ventured out with five gallees and took it. As they were sailing away with their prize, the Carthaginians gave them chase with forty sail, against which they advanced with their whole fleet, and engaging them took the admiral galley, and twenty-four more, damaged others, and pursued the rest to the place where their whole fleet rode, offering them battle a second time. The Carthaginians, discouraged with this unexpected overthrow, kept within the harbour, though their fleet was three times more numerous than the enemy's who challenged them <sup>b</sup>.

THE Syracusians, animated by this success, which could only be ascribed to their own valour, for both Dionysius and Leptines were then absent, began to encourage each other to shake off the shameful yoke of servitude, and resume their antient liberty. What exploits, said they, have we achieved under the conduct of the tyrant? Have we not been always shamefully overcome by the Carthaginians? But now, that we did not fight under the unlucky auspices of Dionysius, we have gained a glorious victory, and are returned conquerors. Why then do we not exert the same courage against a domestic tyrant, which we have shewn against a foreign enemy? We have again got swords in our hands; let us employ them against him who has injured us more than the Carthaginians themselves. While these speeches were whispered about the town, Dionysius, who had been out at sea with a small squadron to procure provisions, landed at the port, and having summoned an assembly he congratulated the Syracusians on their late victory, promising in a short time to put an end to the war, and deliver them from their present calamities. When the assembly was ready to break up, one Theodorus, a Syracusan of great authority among the nobility, and who had done eminent services to his country, stood up and boldly spoke thus: “Although Dionysius has advanced “ many fallhoods in his speech, yet what he said in the close “ of it, viz. that he would put a speedy end to the war, he “ may truly perform, if he himself, who has always been “ overcome, resigns the command, and restores us to our “ liberty. For none of us care to venture our lives in the “ field against a foreign enemy, while we know, that, not“ withstanding our victory, we are to be treated like slaves “ by a domestic tyrant. If the Carthaginians prevail, by “ paying an annual tribute, we shall be allowed to enjoy our “ liberties; but if Dionysius should conquer, he would not “ fail to rob our temples, plunder our houses, seize our es“ tates, take away our lives, and deprive us of all that is “ most dear to us. Let us therefore get rid of the tyrant “ within our walls, before we attempt to drive away a less “ dangerous enemy without. Shall we, who have lately “ engaged thousands, and put them to flight, be now afraid “ of one tyrant? We have arms in our hands, and against “ whom can we better employ them than against one who “ has reduced us to such a deplorable condition, that we are “ pitied even by our enemies? If Dionysius consents to ab“ dicate the tyranny, and retire, let us open our gates to “ him and his followers. But if he refuses to resign his u“ surped authority, let him know by experience how “ powerful is the love of liberty in the breasts of brave and “ valiant men.”

WHEN Theodorus had ended his speech, the Syracusians, much perplexed in their minds, and not knowing what to resolve on, looked earnestly on their allies, especially on the Spartans there present; when Pharacidas, who commanded the Lacedemonian fleet, rose up. Every one expected that a citizen of Sparta would declare in favour of liberty; but they were disappointed in their hopes, for he told them, that he had been sent by his republic to assist the Syracusians and Dionysius against the Carthaginians, and not to make war upon

upon Dionysius, or subvert his authority. This unexpected answer put a stop to any further attempts of the Syracusians; and the tyrant's mercenaries arriving at the same time, the assembly broke up. However, Dionysius was under no small apprehension, and from that time left no stone unturned to ingratiate himself with the people, affecting on all occasions to treat them with great kindness and familiarity<sup>c</sup>.

Polyxenus, who had married Thesta, Dionysius's sister, declared against him on this occasion, and not thinking himself safe in Sicily, privately withdrew into Italy. When Dionysius was informed of his flight, he sent for his sister, and bitterly reproached her for not giving him notice of her husband's retreat, since she could not be ignorant of it: Thesta reply'd, without expressing the least fear or concern, Have I appeared to be so bad a wife to you, and so mean-spirited as to have abandoned my husband in his flight? No, I was quite unacquainted with his design; but if he had imparted it to me, I should not have discovered it to you, but shared with him his dangers and misfortunes, reckoning myself more happy in being called the wife of Polyxenus the exile, than the sister of Dionysius the tyrant. Dionysius, though highly incensed against his sister, yet could not help commending the affection she shewed for her husband; and the Syracusians were so charmed with the love she shewed for her country on this and all other occasions, that, after the tyranny was suppressed, the same honours, equipage, and train, which she had before, were continued to her during her life. After her death the whole city attended her funeral, which was performed at the expence of the public, with extraordinary pomp and splendor<sup>d</sup>.

BUT to return to the Carthaginians; their successes were not lasting. They had committed an irretrievable error in not attacking Syracuse upon their arrival, when the sight of a mighty fleet and a formidable army had occasioned an universal consternation in the city; and now a plague, breaking out in their camp, prevented them from making any attempts towards the reduction of the place. This infection was looked upon as a punishment inflicted upon them by the gods for plundering the temples, and demolishing the tombs round the city, but was in fact occasioned by the unwholesome exhalations of the fens and marshes joining their camp; for the Athenians, who spared both temples and tombs, had been, not long before, afflicted with the same calamity. The plague began among the Africans, and soon spread through the whole army. Care was taken at first to inter the dead, but their numbers increasing daily, they were left unburied, and this, as it was then the midst of summer, and the heat that year excessive, aggravated the evil beyond measure. This infection was attended with very uncommon symptoms, such as violent dysenteries, raging fevers, acute pains in all the parts of the body, &c. some were even seized with madness and fury, falling upon all those that came in their way, and tearing them to pieces. The plague was so violent, that in a short time it swept away above an hundred thousand men, all remedies proving unsuccessful, by reason of the incredible violence of the distemper, and the quick dispatch it made of such as were seized with it.

Dionysius resolved not to let slip so favourable an opportunity of attacking the enemy. Having therefore manned fourscore gallies, he ordered Pharacidas and Leptines to fall upon the enemy's fleet at break of day, while he attacked the land-forces in the camp. With this view having commanded his troops to be ready to march by midnight, he set out at the head of ten thousand chosen men at the time appointed, and, without being discovered, arrived at the enemy's camp. He then detached a strong body of cavalry, and a thousand of the mercenary foot, with orders to fall upon that part of the camp which lay at the greatest distance, pretending that the enemy there kept no guard. But his real design was to get rid of that body of mercenaries, they having in the late disturbances seemed to favour the faction which opposed him. Accordingly he gave private instructions to the officers of the horse to retire as soon as the infantry was engaged; his orders were obeyed, and the mercenaries, being surrounded on all sides, were cut off all to a man. Upon the return of the cavalry, Dionysius at the same time attacked the camp and the forts, which the enemy had built near the shore. Two of the forts were taken at the first onset, which gave the Syracusians an opportunity of entering the great haven with all their fleet, and falling furiously on the enemy's gallies anchored there. The Carthaginians in the camp made at first a vigorous resistance, but seeing the two forts, which defended the harbour, possessed by the enemy, and their navy in imminent danger of being utterly destroyed, many of them abandoning the defence of the camp, hastened to the shore to the relief of their companions on board the vessels. This occasioned a great confusion in the army, which Dionysius taking advantage of, broke into the camp, and made a dreadful havock, putting all to the sword who opposed him. The surprize, terror, and even haste they they were in, to put themselves into a posture of defence, threw them into greater confusion and disorder. They knew not on what side to send relief, all being equally in danger. Many of their vessels were sunk, others quite disabled, and a great many burnt and taken. The inhabitants of Syracuse, crouded on the walls and eminences, were eye-witnesses of that scene of horror, and, lifting up their hands to heaven, thanked the tutelary gods of the city, for revenging, in so signal a manner, the many sacrileges which the Carthaginians had committed since their arrival in Sicily. The slaughter in the camp and on board the vessels was great and dreadful, and ended only when night obliged the conquerors to retire.

But Imilcar, taking the opportunity of this short respite, sent ambassadors privately to Dionysius, offering him three hundred talents, if he would permit the remains of his shattered army to withdraw unmolested. Dionysius was unwilling utterly to destroy the Carthaginians, lest the Syracusians, when free from the apprehension of so formidable an enemy, should seek to regain their antient liberty; but on the other side he knew, that neither the Syracusians nor their confederates would suffer him to grant the enemy such terms. He therefore answered, that it was not in his power to permit them all to retire, but that he would allow Imilcar, with all the citizens of Carthage, to depart in the night, upon his paying three hundred talents.

This being agreed on, Dionysius retired with his forces into the city, whither Imilcar privately sent him the promised sum, and then began to make the necessary preparations for his departure. The Carthaginians were put on board forty galleys, and ready to set sail, when the Corinthians, who served under Dionysius, discovering from the noise and motion of the vessels, that Imilcar was making off, sent to acquaint the tyrant with their flight, who immediately ordered some galleys to be manned, as if he designed to prevent their retreat. But as his orders were but slowly executed, the Corinthians, without his command, pursued them, and sunk several vessels in the rear.

Dionysius then marched out with his troops against those, whom Imilcar had left behind to the mercy of the conqueror; but before his arrival the Sicilians, in the Carthaginian service, had retired to their respective countries; the rest, seeing themselves abandoned by the Sicilians, and betrayed by the Carthaginians, at the approach of Dionysius's army betook themselves to flight; but, being closely pursued, were either cut in pieces, or taken prisoners; only the Iberians

kept together in a body, and sent a herald to capitulate with Dionysius, who took them into his service. Such was the fate of the Carthaginians in Sicily, which shews, says our historian, that those, who are too much elated with power and success, may soon be forced to confess their weakness and vanity. Those haughty conquerors, masters of almost all Sicily, who looked upon Syracuse as their own, and entered at first triumphant into the harbour, insulting the citizens, are now reduced to fly shamefully in the night, dragging away with them the sad ruins and miserable remains of their shattered fleet and army, after having left an hundred and fifty thousand men lying unburied in the enemy's country <sup>c</sup>.

lays violent

Imilcar upon his arrival at Carthage, which he found overwhelmed with grief and despair, went directly to his own house, and, shutting the doors against the citizens and even his own children, laid violent hands on himself, to shew that he did not survive his countrymen, who perished in Sicily, out of a fondness for life, but merely to preserve the troops, which had escaped the plague, from the fury of the enemy, to which his more early death would have exposed them. When it was publicly known in Africa, that Imilcar had saved only the citizens of Carthage, leaving the confederates behind to the mercy of the enemy, the cities and states, which had sent them auxiliaries, were incensed to such a degree, that taking up arms they marched directly to Carthage, being two hundred thousand men and upwards. But as they wanted a leader of experience, and had neither warlike engines nor provisions to support so numerous an army, they soon dispersed, and, retiring to their respective countries, freed Carthage from a dreadful alarm.

The Rhe-

Dionysius.

THE Carthaginians being thus intirely defeated in Sicily, all those who had abandoned their country, through dread of so formidable an enemy, returned to their antient habitations. Dionysius caused the city of Messana to be rebuilt, and peopled it with a thousand Locrians and four thousand Medimneans. This gave no small jealousy to the inhabitants of Rhegium in Italy, who, receiving into their protection all those that were driven out by Dionysius, or hated his government, formed a considerable army, which they sent under the conduct of Hectoris to besiege Messana. But Dionysius unexpectedly falling upon them, cut most of the Rhegian forces in pieces, and obliged the rest to retire to their vessels and abandon the island. He had scarce obtained this victory over the Rhegians, but Mago the Carthaginian, whom Imilcar had left to settle the affairs of Carthage in Sicily, appeared before Messana at the head of a numerous army ; but was attended with no better success, being in a pitched battle driven out of the field with the loss of above eight hundred men. Dionysius, animated by these two victories, resolved to make an attempt upon Rhegium, and accordingly having manned an hundred galleys, arrived unperceived before the city, set fire to the gates, and in the confusion, which his arrival occasioned, was very near carrying the city by assault, the inhabitants being more intent upon extinguishing the fire, than repulsing the enemy. But Heloris, perceiving the danger the city was in, ordered the inhabitants to give over quenching the flames, and hasten to the walls; by which means the place was saved, for some of Dionysius's men had already by the help of their scaling ladders got into the city, but the rest being timely prevented from following them, they were either put to the sword, or made prisoners. Dionysius being thus disappointed in his design, laid waste the territory of Rhegium, and then retired to Syracuse.

And Mago
thaginian.

THE Carthaginians, however disheartened by their late losses, yet could not forbear making new attempts upon Sicily. They sent Mago fourscore thousand men, enjoining him to make war upon Dionysius, and promising to send him soon new supplies both of men, money, and ships. But Mago, being soon reduced to great straits for want of provisions, sent ambassadors to Dionysius to treat of a peace, which was concluded before either side had lost one man. By this treaty Taurominium, a Carthaginian colony, was given up to Dionysius, who driving from thence the antient proprietors, placed the choicest of his mercenaries in their room. As for Mago, as soon as the treaty was signed, he returned to Carthage, leaving his allies in Sicily to shift for themselves.

Mago con-

AND now Dionysius, being under no apprehension of the Carthaginians, bent all his thoughts on the reduction of Rhegium, which was the key of Italy, with a design to bring under his power all the Greek cities there. He had then under his command an army of twenty thousand foot and a thousand horse, besides an hundred and twenty galleys well manned and equipt. With these he passed over into Italy, and having laid waste the country of the Locrians, he advanced to Rhegium. But in the mean time the Italians, being well apprised of his designs, raised forces in all their cities, and having fitted out a fleet of three score galleys, sent them to the relief of Rhegium. They were met by a squadron of Dionysius's fleet consisting of fifty galleys ; whereupon a sharp en-gement ensued, in which Dionysius lost seven galleys, and fifteen hundred men. The fleets were parted by a violent storm, which driving many of the Syracusan vessels upon the Rhegian shore, the mariners were either cut in pieces by the inhabitants, or taken prisoners, Dionysius himself having narrowly escaped in a small vessel, and with much ado landed at midnight at the port of Messana.

THIS disappointment did not make Dionysius lay aside his designs upon the Greek cities in Italy; he reinforced his army with new levies, equipt a greater number of ships, and made vast preparations both by sea and land in order to renew the war. In the mean time he entered into an alliance with the Lucanians, engaging them with great promises to fall upon the Greek cities in Italy, hoping to find them thereby on his return so weakened that he might easily accomplish his design. The Lucanians, agreeable to their engagement, entered the country of the Thurians, put all to fire and sword, and having joined battle with the confederate Greeks, killed above ten thousand of them on the spot. Those who escaped the slaughter fled to a hill near the sea-side, whence they discovered a squadron of ships making to the Italian shore, and hoping that they were sent from Rhegium to their assistance, out of eagerness to save themselves from the Lucanians, who pursued them, leapt into the sea and swam to the ships. But this fleet proved to be a squadron sent by Dionysius to the assistance of the Lucanians, under the command of his brother Leptines. However, that commander not only received them generously into his ships, but prevailed upon the Lucanians to accept for each man, they being a thousand in all, a mina, and suffer them to return unmolested into their own country. This sum which was very considerable, Leptines himself disbursed, being moved thereunto by his own generosity and natural inclination to pity even an enemy in distress. Such a generous behaviour gained him the affection of all the Greeks, but highly displeased Dionysius, who immediately discharged him, and appointed Thearides, his other brother, admiral in his room <sup>f</sup>.

AND now Dionysius, having made the necessary preparations for his expedition into Italy, set sail from Syracuse with an army of above twenty thousand foot and three thousand horse, and a fleet of forty long galleys, and three hundred transports, loaded with provisions and all sorts of warlike engines. The fifth day after his departure from Syracuse he arrived at Mes- sana, whence he sent his brother Thearides to the Lipari islands, upon advice brought him that ten ships of Rhegium were anchored there. Thearides found the ships, and returned with them and their crews to Dionysius, who delivered the prisoners loaded with chains to the care and custody of the magistrates of Messana, and then set sail for Italy. The first place he attacked was Caulonia or Caulum, a strong city in Locris, which, though battered night and day without intermission, held out, till the Italians, having raised an army of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse, drew near the city in order to relieve it. These were commanded by Heloris, a native of Syracuse, whence he had been banished by Dionysius, and therefore bore him an implacable hatred. Heloris, as he drew near the besieged city, advanced with a detachment of five hundred chosen men to observe the ground on which the enemy was encamped. But Dionysius, upon advice of his approach breaking up the siege, marched with all speed against him, and arriving by break of day at the place where Heloris was encamped with his small detachment, fell upon him with his whole army. Heloris kept his ground in spite of the utmost efforts of an army, so much superior in number, till the rest of his forces came up. But as they arrived by parties, every one making what haste he could to relieve their general, they were after a long and obstinate dispute put to flight. Heloris and his party still kept their posts, and were all killed on the spot. Those, who escaped, fled to a neighbouring mountain, and there made a stand. But as they wanted water, and were hemmed in on all sides by the enemy, they sent an herald to Dionysius, offering to surrender, provided he would allow them to retire unmolested; but he insisting upon their delivering themselves up at discretion, they held out till they were ready to perish with hunger and thirst, and then complied with his proposal. They were above ten thousand, and expected no quarter from so cruel an enemy. But Dionysius, contrary to their expectation, treated them with great humanity, discharging them all without ransom, and suffering them to live in their respective countries according to their own laws. This, as our historian observes, was the only commendable action he ever performed in the whole course of his life. The captives on their return to their respective cities greatly extolled his clemency and good nature, and acknowledged his kindness to them by presenting him with crowns of gold *.

mies made them his friends and allies, turned his arms again upon the city of Rhegium. He was highly incensed against the Rhegians, on account of their having refused to give him the daughter of one of their citizens in marriage, and much more for the insolent answer, with which their refusal was attended (Z). The besieged, finding themselves abandoned by their allies, whom Dionysius had gained over by his late kindness, and expecting no quarter if the city should be taken by storm, sent ambassadors to treat of a surrender. Dionysius offered them peace, upon condition that they paid him three hundred talents, delivered up all their vessels, which were seventy in number, and put an hundred hostages into his hands. These terms the inhabitants agreed to, and the siege was raised. It was not out of kindness or good nature he acted in this manner, but with a view to deprive them of their fleet, knowing that it would be impossible for the Rhegians to hold out, if they received no assistance by sea. He therefore put off from day to day his march, waiting for some colourable pretence to break the treaty lately concluded with the Rhegians. With this view having drawn all his forces together, as if he intended to leave Italy, he desired the Rhegians to supply his army with provisions, promising to defray the charges they should be at as soon as he got to Syracuse. His design in this was, that if they refused to supply him he might have a pretence to attack their city anew; and if they complied with his demand, after their provisions were all spent, he might easily possess himself of the place. The Rhegians, not suspecting his design, supplied him for some days very plentifully. But as he put off his departure from (Z.) Dionysius in the beginning of his reign did all that lay in his power to oblige the two powerful cities of Rhegium and Messana, lest they should enter into an alliance with the Syracusians, among whom his authority was not then well established. The inhabitants of Messana he presented with some lands in their neighbourhood, which lay very conveniently for them. To give the people of Rhegium an instance of his esteem and regard for them, he sent ambassadors to desire them to give him the daughter of one of their citizens in marriage. Upon the arrival of the ambassadors the people of Rhegium, having called a council to take his demand into consideration, took a resolution not to contract any alliance with a tyrant, and for their final answer charged the ambassadors to acquaint the tyrant, that they had only the hangman's daughter to give him. This gross abuse Dionysius never put up, but continually studied how to revenge it (13).

(13) Idem, ibid. c. 12.

day to day, sometimes pretending sickness, at other times alledging other frivolous excuses, they at length saw into his real design, and forbore sending him any further provisions.
 Hereupon Dionysius, pretending to be highly affronted, sent them back their hostages, and besieged them again with all his forces. Both parties acted with the utmost vigour. The desire of revenge on one side, and the fear of inhuman cruelties on the other, animated the troops. The Rhegians were under the command of Phyto, an officer of long experience and extraordinary valour. He made frequent sallies, in one of which Dionysius, while he was encouraging his troops to stand their ground, was so dangerously wounded that his life was despaired of. However, he recovered, and renewed the siege with more fury than ever, the walls trembling all round the city at the repeated shocks of almost innumerable warlike engines, no otherwise, as our historian expresses it, than as if they had been shaken by a dreadful earthquake. But, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the aggressors, the siege went on very slowly, their works being often demolished, and their engines burnt by the besieged, who in each sally gained very considerable advantages. Thus they held out for the space of eleven months against the whole force of Dionysius, but were at length for want of provisions reduced to the utmost extremity. A bushel of wheat was sold for five minas, (that is 15 l. 12 s. 6 d.) and the famine was so great, that after they had consumed all their horses and beasts of burden, they supported themselves with boiled skins and leather; which also failing, they daily went out of the town to feed, like beasts, on the grass that grew under the walls.
 But Dionysius, to deprive them even of this poor support, sent his horses under a strong guard to graze where they used to feed. The besieged being thus overcome by famine were at length forced to surrender at discretion. Dionysius himself when he entered the city was struck with terror, finding every-where heaps of dead bodies lying in the streets, and those who survived rather skeletons than men. However, he got together about six thousand prisoners, whom he sent to Syracuse, where such as were not able to redeem themselves with a mina, were sold for slaves. Dionysius vented his rage and revenge chiefly on the brave Phyto, who had made so gallant a defence; he caused his son to be thrown headlong into the sea and drowned. The next day he ordered Phyto to be loaded with chains, and fastened to the top of one of his highest engines, that he might be exposed to the view of the whole army. In that condition he sent one of his guards to tell

tell him that his son had been drowned the day before ; Then the son, replied Phyto, is by one day happier than the father. He afterwards caused him to be whipt through the city, and undergo innumerable other cruelties, whilst a crier walking before him proclaimed, that the perfidious traitor was treated in that manner, for having stirred up the people of Rhegium to war. But Phyto, with an undaunted courage, cried out, that he thus suffered, because he would not betray his country to a tyrant. His heroic behaviour, and the indignities he suffered, raised compassion even in the breasts of the tyrant's soldiers, who began to mutiny, and would have rescued him, had not Dionysius immediately ordered him to be thrown into the sea. Thus suffered a man, whose probity, courage, and disinterested zeal for the good of his country, deserved a more glorious end. His death was lamented by all the Greeks, and became the subject of many elegant and affecting elegies <sup>h</sup>.

Dionysius

poetry.
Year of the Flood, 2612.
Before Christ, 387.

Dionysius, after the taking of Rhegium, allowed both himself and his troops some respite. In the intervals of leisure he loved to unbend his mind with the study of the liberal arts and sciences, especially of poetry, piquing himself upon the excellence of his genius, and the elegance of his performances. As he excelled all others in power, so, in his own conceit, he surpassed them in wit and humour, and was more pleased to hear his poetical composures commended, than his victories and conquests. The flatterers, who abounded in his as in all other courts, greatly contributed to the high opinion he had of himself, crying his poems up to the skies, and preferring them to the works of all who had wrote before him. He often used to invite the learned men and poets of that age to dine at his table, and on that occasion never failed to entertain them with some new composition of his own, which always met with great approbation ; all was great, noble, majestic, and divine. Philoxenus was the only one who attempted to undeceive him in the favourable opinion he had of his own abilities, but narrowly escaped paying dear for his sincerity. As Philoxenus was himself an excellent poet, Dionysius one day, after having read to him some of his verses, pressed him to give his opinion of them, which he doing with great freedom, Dionysius, ascribing the liberty he had taken to envy, commanded his guards to carry the poet forthwith to the quarries or common jail ; however, he was the next day, at the earnest entreaties of all Dionysius's friends, set at liberty, and restored to favour. On this occasion Dionysius, as it were to ratify the pardon, made a noble entertainment, inviting to it all his own and the poet's friends. When the guests began to be merry, the prince did not fail to recite some verses he had lately made, chusing out some lines which he had taken extraordinary pains in composing, and looked upon as master-strokes, as was apparent from the self-satisfaction he expressed in rehearsing them. As he set a great value on Philoxenus's approbation, who was not apt to be lavish of his praises, he desired him again to divest himself of all envy, and speak his real sentiments. What had passed the day before might have served as a lesson for the poet; but he could not dissemble, and therefore, without making any answer to Dionysius, he turned to the guards, who always stood round the table, and with a serious, but humourous, air, desired them to carry him back to the quarries. This pleasantry Dionysius took in good part, saying that the wit of the poet had atoned for his freedom. Antiphon, finding that Dionysius was pleased with witty expressions, told him several truths in a very humourous manner, which he took no offence at; but having one day provoked him with too biting a jest, he paid dear for it. The prince, in a conversation, asked which was the best kind of brass, to which question Antiphon answered, that the best brass was that of which the statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton were made. These were two famous patriots, who had defended the liberty of their country against the tyranny of Pisistratus's sons<sup>1</sup>.

Dionysius, notwithstanding all Philoxenus had said to undeceive him, still fancied himself the best poet of his age, and sent his brother Thearides to the Olympic games, to dispute, in his name, the prizes of poetry and the chariot-races. When Thearides arrived at Olympia, the richness and number of his chariots, the extraordinary magnificence of his pavilion embroidered with gold and silver, and the sumptuous apparel of his numerous attendants, attracted the eyes and admiration of all the spectators. Their ears were no less charmed at first when the poems of Dionysius began to be read. He had chosen for that purpose persons of sweet and harmonious voices, who were heard far and distinctly, and knew how to give a just emphasis to the verses they repeated. But when that numerous assembly began to mind no more the poetry, but the sense and composition, they all burst out in a loud laugh, and hissed them off the stage, and even, to express their indignation, tore the rich pavilion in pieces. Antiphon, the celebrated orator, who was then at Olympia, undertook to prove, that it was inconsistent with the honour of Greece, and sacredness of the sports, to admit such an impious tyrant to share in those diversions. This speech was stiled the Olympic oration. When the races began, Dionysius's chariots were either by an headlong impetuosity driven out of the place, or dashed in pieces against one another. Neither did the vessel, which carried Thearides and his retinue prosper better, being by a violent storm driven on the coast of Tarentum, whence with much ado they got to Syracuse. Upon their return they ascribed all the misfortunes they had met with, both by sea and land, to the badness of Dionysius's verses. But that did not cure him of his folly, or, as the historian stiles it, of his madness for versification; he entertained the same high opinion of his poetical vein, ascribing such injurious treatment to envy, and saying that they would one day admire what they then despised. He sent his poems a second time to Olympia, where they were treated with the same contempt as before; which threw him into a deep melancholy and kind of madness. This grew daily upon him, till at length he fancied, that even his best friends were plotting against his life and reputation, crying out like a Phrenetic, that every one envied him, that both friends and foes conspired to his ruin. In these fits of melancholy and madness he put many of his friends to death, and banished others; among the latter were Leptines his brother, and Philistus, to whom he was chiefly indebted for his power. They retired to Thurium in Italy, whence they were soon recalled, and reinstated in their former places of power and authority <sup>k</sup>.

To remove his melancholy for the ill success of his verses, he had again recourse to arms, and formed a design of driving the Carthaginians quite out of Sicily. But as he wanted money for so expensive an undertaking, he resolved to attack Epirus, and make himself master of the immense treasures which had been for many ages amassing in the temple of Delphos. With this view he settled powerful colonies in that part of Italy which faces Greece, and made an alliance with the Illyrians, sending them two thousand men, and a great quantity of arms, to be employed against the Molossians, with whom they were then at war. But the Illyrians afterwards falling out with Dionysius, on account of his building the city of Lyffus in the island of Pharos, he laid aside for the present all thoughts of plundering the temple of Delphos, and pursued another project of the same kind, which he easily accomplished. For having fitted out threeſcore galleys, under colour of clearing the ſeas of pirates, he made a deſcent in Hetruria, and plundered a rich temple in the ſuburbs of Agylla, carrying away, beſides the rich moveables and furniture, above a thouſand talents in money. Five hundred talents more he raiſed by the ſale of the ſpoils, and with this money ſet on foot a numerous army, and made other preparations, as if he intended to attempt again the reduction of the Greek cities in Italy. But the Carthaginians ſuſpect-ing his real deſign, upon the firſt notice they had of theſe extraordinary preparations, ſent Mago over into Sicily with a powerful army. Dionyſius attacked him ſoon after he was landed, killed him with ten thouſand of his men, took five thouſand priſoners, and forced the reſt to ſave themſelves on a neighbouring hill, where he ſurrounded them on all ſides, and brought them to ſuch ſtraits that they were forced to ſue for a peace. Dionyſius answered the ambaffadors they ſent him with great haughtineſs, that there was only one way left for them to make peace with him, and that was, forthwith to evacuate Sicily, and to defray all the expences of the war. The Carthaginians pretended to accept the peace on the terms it was offered, but repreſenting that it was not in their power to deliver up the cities they poſſeſſed in Sicily, without the expreſs orders of their republic, they obtained a truce, which was to laſt till the return of an expreſs ſent to Carthage. During this interval they buried Mago with great pomp and magnificence, and appointed his ſon to command the troops in his room. This new general, who was very young, but had on all occaſions given proofs of an extraordinary valour and prudence, in the time of the truce raiſed and diſciplined new troops, and improved ſo well the ſhort time which was allowed him, that, at the return of the expreſs from Carthage, he took the field, gave the enemy battle, and killed above fourteen thouſand Syracuſians on the ſpot, and, among the reſt, Leptines, Dionyſius's brother, who was greatly regretted even by thoſe who hated the tyrant. He was a brave and experienced officer, and though ever faithful to Dionyſius, yet an enemy to all manner of oppreſſion. Dionyſius, with the remains of his ſhattered army, fled to Syracuſe, where he expected to be ſoon beſieged by the victorious enemy. But the Carthaginian general uſed his victory with great moderation, and, inſtead of purſuing the routed enemy, retired to Panormus, whence he ſent ambaffadors to Dionyſius, offering him terms of peace, which he readily embraced; and a treaty was concluded on the following conditions, viz. that both parties ſhould keep what they had at

An account of Dionysius's death. A VICTORY of a very different kind made amends, or at least lessened his concern, for the ill success of his arms; he had caused a tragedy wrote by himself to be acted at Athens, for the prize of poetry at the celebrated feast of Bacchus, and was proclaimed victor. As the Athenians were the best judges of this kind of literature, and no ways biassed in favour of Dionysius, who had on all occasions assisted the Lacedemonians, we cannot help thinking, that the contemptuous sentence passed upon his poems in the Olympic games was chiefly owing to the hatred and aversion, which the spectators bore him. But, however that be, Dionysius received the news of his victory with such transports of joy as are not to be expressed; he amply rewarded the person that brought him the agreeable tidings, caused costly sacrifices to be offered to the gods, and, believing himself arrived at the highest pitch of glory, set no bounds to his generosity; he entertained the whole city with extraordinary magnificence, and spent an immense treasure in public feasts and banquets, which lasted several days. On this occasion Dionysius, drinking to excess and overcharging nature, a fault which he had never before been guilty of, was seized with violent pains, which were attended with uneasy and restless nights. Having therefore asked of his physicians a soporative, they gave him so strong a dose as quite stupified his senses, and laid him in a sleep, out of which he never awaked. He had been formerly forewarned by an oracle, that he should die when he had overcome those who were better than himself. This prediction he applied to the Carthaginians, who were more powerful than himself; and therefore would never own that he had gained any victory over them, but used to say, that the advantage, all things well considered, was pretty equal on both sides. However, he could not avoid his destiny, says the historian; for though he was but a bad poet, yet, in the opinion of the Athenians, he gained the victory over those who far excelled him in that art<sup>m</sup>. He died after he had reigned thirty eight years.

Dionysius was, without all doubt, a prince of extraordinary abilities, both in his political and military capacity, having raised himself, in spite of the utmost efforts of a powerful people, from a mean condition to so high a station, and transmitted the sovereignty to a successor of his own issue and election, who, notwithstanding the slenderness of his parts, held it for the space of twelve years. This shews, that Dionysius had established his power and authority upon a solid foundation, which could not be effected, in a city so fond of liberty, without great prudence and forecast. But what abilities could atone for the vices, which rendered him the object of the public hatred? His ambition knew no bounds; his avarice spared not the most sacred persons or places; and his cruelty, when awaked by jealousy or suspicion, made no distinction between friend and foe. He despised not only his fellow creatures, but the gods themselves, glorying in his open and professed impiety, whereof the antients relate the following instances. On his return from Locris, where he had plundered the temple of Proserpine, the wind being favourable, he turned to his friends, and with a contemptuous smile, See, said he, how the immortal gods favour the sacrilegious <sup>a</sup>. Being in great want of money to carry on the war against the Carthaginians, he rifled the temple of Jupiter, and amongst other things stript the god of a robe of gold, which Hiero had presented him with out of the spoils of the Carthaginians, saying, that a robe of gold was too heavy in summer and too cold in winter, and at the same time ordered one of wool to be thrown over the god's shoulders, adding, that such an habit would be far more proper for all seasons. He ordered the golden beard of Æsculapius to be taken off, saying it was very inconsistent for the son to have a beard, when the father had none; for Apollo is always represented as a beardless young man <sup>b</sup>. Several of the statues of the gods held cups and crowns of gold in their hands, which he made no scruple to carry off, saying, that the gods offered them to him, and that it was very simple to be continually importuning the gods for good things, and then refuse them when they themselves presented them to their votaries. These spoils were by his orders carried to the market-place, and there sold by auction. But the very next day pretending to be sorry for having plundered the temples, he caused a proclamation to be issued, commanding all those who had any thing in their custody belonging to the immortal gods, to restore it to the temples within a limited time; but did not himself return the money to the buyers.

quietude to which he was abandoned. He never harangued the people but from the top of a high tower. Not daring to trust his friends and nearest relations, he committed the guard of his person to slaves and foreigners, and, though surrounded by these, scarce ever ventured out of his palace <sup>p</sup>. A jest, that escaped his barber, who boasted in a merry humour that he often held a razor at the king's throat, being related to Dionysius, cost the man his life ; and from that time he employed his daughters, then very young, in that mean office. When they were grown up, he did not care to trust them with razors or scissars, but only allowed them nut-shells, and at last was reduced by his apprehensions to do that office himself. He never went into the apartment of his wives before it was searched with the utmost care, lest any weapons should lie there concealed. His bed was surrounded with a deep and broad trench, and a draw-bridge over it. After having fastened the doors of his apartment with strong bolts, he drew up the bridge, and then took some rest, which was interrupted by the least noise he heard, either in the streets or his palace. Neither his son nor his brother were admitted to his presence, without being searched by the guards and obliged to change their garments <sup>q</sup>. Thus at the height of his grandeur he led a more miserable life than the meanest of his slaves, as he himself ingeniously owned (A).

The courtier was transported with joy, and said, that if he could always live in that manner he should look upon himself as the happiest of mortals. He had scarce spoke, when, unfortunately casting up his eyes, he beheld over his head a naked sword hanging from the ceiling by a single horse-hair. At this sight he was immediately taken with a cold sweat ; every thing disappeared in an instant, except the sword ; he could think of nothing else ; and the danger he was threatened with, throwing him into

Dionysius was, without all doubt, an ambitious and inhuman tyrant ; but at the same time had some good qualities, which ought not to be disguised or misrepresented, the impartiality of an historian requiring that justice should be done to the most wicked. agonies of death, he desired permission to retire, declaring he would be happy no longer. A lively representation of the unhappy life which a tyrant must lead when hated by his subjects (32).

(B) Dionysius married two wives at the same time, viz. Doris and Aristomache ; Doris, was the daughter of one of the most illustrious citizens of Locris in Italy, whence he caused her to be brought in a quinqueremis, adorned in a most magnificent manner. Aristomache was the daughter of Hipparinus, the most wealthy and powerful citizen of Syracuse, and sister of the celebrated Dion. She was brought to the royal palace in a chariot drawn by four white horses, which was at that time a mark of great distinction. The nuptials of both were solemnized the same day, with universal rejoicings throughout the whole city. Dionysius, to remove all causes of discord, shewed an equal affection for both. But the Locrian had the good fortune to bring him the first son, who succeeded him. Aristomache after some years bore him two sons, viz. Hipparinus and Nisæus, and two daughters, Sophrosine and Arete. Sophrosine married Dionysius the eldest son of the Locrian, and Arete first Theorides, the brother of Dionysius, and afterwards Dion.

(C) Dion was in great esteem and favour with Dionysius, to whom he was first introduced by his sister Aristomache, but afterwards recommended by his own merit. Amongst the other marks Dionysius gave him of his confidence, he ordered his treasurers to supply him with whatever money he should demand, provided they informed him the same day they paid it. But Dion, notwithstanding the kindness shewn him by the tyrant, used to speak to him with a great deal of freedom. Dionysius ridiculing one day the government of Gelon, and saying, in allusion to his name, that he had been the laughing stock of Sicily, that being the import of the Greek word Γελως, all the courtiers highly applauded the wit of that conceit, or rather pun, flat and insipid as it was. But Dion took it in a different manner, and had the freedom to tell Dionysius, that he was in the wrong to talk in that manner of a prince, whose wife and equitable conduct had exhibited an excellent form of government, and given the Syracusians a favourable opinion of monarchy. You reign, said he, and have been trusted for Gelon's sake ; but on your account no man will ever be trusted after you. This Dionysius took in good part, without shewing the least resentment (33).

he bestowed on his own sister Thesta, for the bold and generous answer she made him on account of her husband's flight, as we have related above ; his obliging and insinuating behaviour towards the Syracusians on several occasions ; and the familiarity, with which he condescended to converse with the meanest citizens, and even workmen, convince us, that he had more equity, moderation, and generosity than is commonly ascribed to him. In short he was a tyrant, but not so inhuman, as many, who have reigned since his time.

Dionysius had three children by his wife Doris the Locrian, and four by Aristomache the sister of Dion, whom we shall often have occasion to mention in the following reign. When no hopes were left of Dionysius's life, Dion took upon him to speak in favour of his children by Aristomache, insinuating, that it was just to prefer the issue of a Syracusan to that of a stranger. But the physicians, desirous to make their court to young Dionysius, the son of Doris, who had been brought up for the throne, did not give the father time to alter his resolution, dispatching him in the manner we have related above ; so that Dionysius, surnamed the younger, peaceably ascended his father's throne. After he had performed his father's funeral with the utmost magnificence, he assembled the people, and promised to pursue, with regard to his subjects, quite different measures from those which had been practised in the preceding reign. The gentle and humane disposition of the young Dionysius made the Syracusians believe that they should live happy under his government ; whereas they were well apprised, that if they attempted a change, the sad consequences of a civil war would involve the state in endless calamities. On these considerations, notwithstanding their passion for liberty, they suffered him to take quiet possession of the throne, as of a lawful inheritance. He was of a quite different character from his father, being as peaceable and calm in his temper, as the other was active and enterprizing ; which would have been no disadvantage to his subjects, had that mildness and moderation been the effect of a wise and judicious understanding, and not of a certain natural sloth and indolence. He was naturally inclined to virtue, and averse from all violence and cruelty, had a taste for arts and sciences, and took great delight in conversing with men of learning. Whence it is plain, that he would have proved a good prince, had an early and proper care been taken to cultivate the happy disposition which he brought into the world with him. But his father, to whom all merit, even in his own children, gave umbrage, stifled in him every noble and elevated sentiment ment by a mean and obscure education. He no sooner ascended the throne, but Dion, who was well acquainted with his temper and good disposition, undertook to correct the faults of his low education, and inspire him with thoughts suitable to the high station he was placed in. Dion was, as we have hinted already, the son of Hipparinus, the most illustrious citizen of Syracuse, and brother of Aristomache the wife of Dionysius the elder. In his early years he contracted an intimate acquaintance and friendship with Plato (D), and so improved by his lessons, that that great philosopher in one of his letters gives this glorious testimony of him; that he had never met with a young man, on whom his discourses made so great an impression, or who had embraced his principles with so much ardour. Diodorus speaks of him as one of the greatest men Sicily, or any other country, ever produced. And indeed it is not easy to find so many excellent qualities in one and the same person, as were centered in Dion. But to return to Dionysius; in the very beginning of his reign, as he had been kept under great restraint by his father, he abandoned himself to all manner of diversions and shameful pleasures. He was scarce seated on the throne, when he made an entertainment, or rather a debauch, which continued for three months together, during all which time his palace, shut against all persons of any sobriety, was crowded with debauchees, and resounded with nothing but low buffoonery, obscene jests, lewd songs, dances, masquerades, &c. As Dion believed, that this was the effect of his bad education and intire ignorance of his duty, he rightly conceived, that the best remedy would be to introduce to him persons of good sense, virtue, and learning, whose agreeable conversation might at once instruct and divert him, for the young prince was endued with good natural parts, and took delight in conversing with philosophers. With this view Dion often talked to him of Plato, as the most profound of all the philosophers, whose merit he was well acquainted with, and to whom he was indebted for all he knew. He enlarged on the elevation of his genius, the extent of his knowledge, the amiableness of his character, and the charms of his conversation. He represented him as the man most capable of any to form him in the arts of governing, upon which his own happiness, and that of his subjects depended, &c. These discourses well-timed inflamed the young prince with a desire of seeing that celebrated philosopher, and improving by his conversation. He wrote to him in the most obliging manner, inviting him to his court, and dispatched express after express to hasten his journey. But Plato, mindful of the treatment he had met with at his father's court, could not prevail upon himself to comply with his invitation. All the Pythagorean philosophers of Sicily and Italy joined their intreaties with the prince's; and Dion with repeated letters never ceased to importune him, till at length he promised to return into Sicily, and attend the young prince's education.

THIS resolution highly displeased the rest of the courtiers, who dreading the presence of Plato, of which they foresaw the consequences, united against him as their common enemy. They were for the most part young unexperienced debauchees, persons of no merit, and of most abandoned characters. Wherefore they rightly judged, that if all things were to be measured according to the standard of true merit, which was one of Plato's maxims, they could lay no claim to any honours, nor expect any favour. They were not able to prevent Plato's voyage, but raised a strong battery to render it ineffectual, by persuading Dionysius to recal Philistus from banishment, who was an experienced officer, and a zealous assertor of tyranny. They hoped to find a counterpoise in him to Plato and all his philosophy. For Philistus was not only a brave commander, but a man of extraordinary parts and uncommon learning. He wrote the history of Sicily, as we have hinted elsewhere, and is honoured by Tully with the title of Thucydides the Second<sup>r</sup>.

Plato on his arrival was received with the highest marks of honour and respect; at his landing he found one of the prince's chariots, with horses richly caparisoned, ready to attend him; and the prince no sooner heard that he was landed, but he commanded a solemn sacrifice to be offered in thanksgiving to the gods, for having sent him a man of so great merit and wisdom. Plato found Dionysius in the most happy disposition imaginable, and enflamed with an eager desire of profiting by his precepts. The philosopher, by adapting himself with wonderful address to the young prince's humour, and gaining his confidence and affection, in a very short time wrought a surprising change in his mind. He had abandoned himself till then to idleness, pleasure, and luxury, and was ignorant of all the duties of his character, the inevitable consequence of a dissolute life. But now awaked, as it were, from a lethargy, he began to have some relish for virtue, and to taste the refined pleasure of a blameless life. The courtiers, who never fail to ape the prince, seemed to fall in with his inclinations, and, laying aside the frivolous amusements of a court, applied themselves to the study of philosophy, as the only means to preferment.

Philistus and his party were greatly alarmed at the sudden change they observed in Dionysius, and judging from some expressions he let drop, that Plato might at last induce him to resign the tyranny, used all possible means to work him out of favour. They began by turning into ridicule the retired life, which Dionysius led with Plato. Nor was that all; they attempted to render the zeal of Plato and Dion suspected, by giving out, that Dion made use of Plato as a proper tool to draw Dionysius into a voluntary resignation of the crown, that he might place it on the head of his nephew, the son of Aristomache. The Athenians, said they, formerly invaded Sicily with a mighty fleet and a formidable army, without being able to subvert the government of Syracuse; and shall now an idle caviller from Athens, an unintelligible sophist, attain that point, and persuade Dionysius to renounce a real and substantial felicity, consisting in empire, riches, pleasures, &c. for a pretended supreme good to be found in the academy? Such repeated discourses raised in the mind of Dionysius some suspicion of Dion, as if he really designed to establish his nephew in the sovereignty. The fears of Dionysius were carefully fomented by the enemies of Dion, who were perpetually advising the prince to take proper measures for the security of his life and throne. They even feigned a letter, which they shewed to Dionysius, pretending that it had been wrote by Dion to the Carthaginians. As this letter contained several articles of treason, Dionysius flew into a violent passion, and having concerted with Philistus what measures he should take, by his advice dissembling his resentment, he led Dion alone to the sea-side below the citadel, where he shewed him the letter, and accused him of entering into a league with his enemies the Carthaginians. Dion might have easily justified himself, but the king refused to hear him, commanding him immediately to go on board a vessel, which lay there ready with orders to carry him to the coast of Italy and leave him there <sup>c</sup>.

SUCH an unjust treatment raised great clamours in Syracuse, and the whole city declared against it. Dionysius, who apprehended the consequences of the public discontent, in order to appease it in some degree, allowed Dion's relations two vessels to transport to him in Peloponnesus, whither he had retired, his riches and numerous retinue, for he lived with as much grandeur as a king<sup>c</sup>. As soon as Dion was gone, Dionysius made Plato change his habitation and remove into the citadel, in appearance to do him more honour, but in reality to assure himself of his person, and to prevent him from joining Dion. However, he continued to shew him an extraordinary kindness, and, out of a foolish jealousy, offered him all his treasures, provided he would prefer his friendship to that of Dion's. In the mean time a war breaking out, Dionysius restored Plato to his liberty, and even gave him leave to return home. At his departure, he would have loaded him with presents, which Plato refused, only begging that he would recal Dion. Dionysius promised to restore him the following spring; but did not keep his word, and only sent him the revenues of his estate, desiring Plato, in a letter he wrote to him, to excuse his breach of promise, and to impute it to the war. He assured him, that, as soon as he put an end to the war, Dion should be recalled, upon condition that he did not meddle with public affairs, nor in the mean time lessen him in the opinion of the Greeks. For Dion during his banishment visited most of the cities of Greece, and was every where received with extraordinary marks of distinction. The Lacedæmonians made him free of their city, without regard to the resentment of Dionysius, who at that very time assisted them with a powerful supply in their war with the Thebans. Athens, which he chose for the place of his residence, paid him the highest honours, all the inhabitants of that illustrious city striving, as it were, to out-do each other in giving him instances of their esteem and affection. This alarmed the tyrant's jealousy, who put a stop to the remittance of Dion's revenues, ordering them to be paid into his own treasury<sup>u</sup>. Such a resolution obliged Dion, who had hitherto lived quietly at Athens, to take another course, as we shall see anon.

Plato returns to Sicily.

Dionysius having put an end to the war he was engaged in, of which no particulars have been transmitted to us, was again inflamed with a desire of seeing and hearing Plato, and accordingly prevailed upon Archytas and the other Pythagorean philosophers to write to him, and assure him, that he might return with safety, and that upon his return the promises which had been made him should be punctually performed. The philosophers deputed Archidemus to Plato, and Dionysius sent at the same time two Triremes with several of his friends on board to solicit his compliance. He also wrote letters to him with his own hand, wherein he declared, that if he refused to return into Sicily, Dion should receive no favours at his hands, but if he complied with his request, the exile should be immediately restored. Plato was very unwilling to trust himself anew to the tyrant's mercy and fickle temper, but could not resist the warm solicitations of Dion's friends; he therefore set out for Sicily the third time, being then in the seventieth year of his age. Dionysius received him with inexpressible joy, appointed him the best apartment of his palace, and suffered him to have free access to him at all hours without being searched, a favour not granted to his best friends. The philosopher, seeing that Dionysius reposed an entire trust in him, entered upon Dion's affair with him, which was the chief motive of his voyage. But the tyrant put it off, and in the mean time endeavoured, by heaping all manner of honours on Plato, to lessen his esteem and regard for Dion. The philosopher dissembled on his side, and, though extremely offended at so notorious a breach of faith, carefully concealed his dissatisfaction. However, he could not give over soliciting in behalf of his friend, which at length so exasperated the tyrant, that all on a sudden he ordered Plato to remove from his apartment in the palace to another without the castle, where his guards were quartered (E). These had long hated Plato, because he had advised Dionysius to dismiss them, and live without any other guard but the love of his people. But Dionysius restrained their fury, forbidding them on pain of death to molest his guest. When Archytas, who was then prætor or chief magistrate of Tarentum, heard of the danger Plato was in, he immediately dispatched ambassadors to Dionysius to remind him, that Plato came to Syracuse only upon his promise, and on the promise of all the Pythagorean philosophers, who had engaged for his safety, wherefore he could not detain him against his will, nor offer him any insult, without a manifest breach of faith. This remonstrance awaked a sense of shame in the tyrant, who at length gave Plato leave to return into Greece. Upon his departure Dionysius, throwing off all restraint, abandoned himself to the most shameful vices, setting no bounds to his avarice, cruelty, rapines, &c. w.

Dion resolves to deliver Sicily.

NOT long after Plato had left Sicily, Dionysius ordered all Dion's lands and effects to be sold, and applied the money to his own use : neither did he stop here, but gave his half-sister Arete, whom Dion had married after the death of Theorides, in marriage to Timocrates, one of his friends and flatterers. So unworthy a treatment Dion could not brook, and therefore from that moment resolved to attack the tyrant with open force, and revenge all the wrongs done him. Plato, out of a scrupulous regard to the duties of hospitality, did all that lay in his power to divert him from such a resolution ; but on the other hand Speusippus, Plato's nephew, with whom Dion had contracted a particular friendship during his abode at Athens, encouraged him to pursue so noble a design, and restore Sicily to its antient freedom. All the rest of Dion's friends were of the same opinion, and many of the chief citizens of Syracuse continually importuned him to come thither, desiring him not to be in pain for want of ships or forces, but to embark on the first vessel he met with, and only lend his name to the friends of liberty. Dion did not delay any longer, but, withdrawing from his retired life, undertook the delivery of his country, which implored his protection. No enterprize was ever formed with more boldness, or conducted with more prudence. He began to raise foreign troops privately by proper agents for the better concealment of his design. Many persons of distinction, who were at the head of affairs, entered into his measures, and gave him notice of whatever was transacted in Sicily. But of the exiles, who were above a thousand, dispersed up and down Sicily and Greece, only twenty-five joined him ; so much were they awed by the dread of the tyrant. The island of Zacynthus was the place of the rendezvous, where the troops assembled to the number of about eight hundred, all tried on many occasions, well disciplined, and capable of animating with their example the forces, which Dion hoped to find in Sicily. When they were to set sail, Dion acquainted them with his design, which till that time he had concealed from the common soldiers. The boldness of the undertaking occasioned at first no small consternation; but Dion soon removed their fears by telling them that he did not lead them in this expedition as soldiers but as officers, to put them at the head of the Syracusians and all the people of Sicily, who were ready to receive them with open arms. Dion, before he set out from Zacynthus, offered a solemn sacrifice to Apollo, and gave a grand entertainment to his small army, which was now impatient to proceed on their voyage, and begin the great work of delivering Sicily from tyranny and oppression. The next day they embarked on board two trading vessels, and put to sea with loud shouts of joy, as if they had already dethroned the tyrant. Who could imagine, says our historian, that a man with two small vessels, should ever dare to attack a prince, who had under his command four hundred galleys, an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, with magazines of provisions, and treasures sufficient to pay and maintain them? But no force is able to defend a prince, who is not guarded by the affection of his people, as the event of this undertaking will shew *.

Dion, after having been twelve days at sea, arrived with Dion ar. his small body of troops at cape Pachynum, where their pilot river in advised them to land immediately lest they should be overtaken Sicily, by a violent hurricane, which threatened them. But Dion, not thinking it safe to land so near the enemy, ordered him to put to sea again and double the cape, which they had no sooner done, than a furious storm attended with rain, thunder, and lightning, drove them on the eastern coast of Afric, where they were in great danger of being dashed to pieces against the rocks; but luckily for them the wind changing all on a sudden, they stood out to sea for Sicily, and with a favourable wind entered the port of Minoa, not far from Agrigentum. This city was then in the hands of the Carthaginians, and governed by one Synalus, or, as Diodorus calls him, Paralus, Dion's particular friend. They were therefore kindly received, and would have staid there some days to refresh themselves after the fatigues of their voyage, had they not received advice, that Dionysius had some days before embarked for Italy attended with fourscore galleys. Dion, to take advantage of his absence, immediately set out for Syracuse, and on his march prevailed upon the Agrigentines, Geleans, Camarineans, and other cities to join him. He no sooner entered the Syracusan territories, but multitudes flocked to him from all parts, every one looking upon him as the deliverer of their country. When he arrived at the Anapus he ordered his troops to halt, and there offered a sacrifice to the tutelary gods of Syracuse; which being performed, he called an assembly of all the Syracusians in his camp, and after having acquainted them with his design, which was to restore them to their liberty and suppress tyranny, he desired them to name a general, who should be entrusted with the whole conduct of the enterprize. The multitude cried out with one voice, that Dion and his brother Megacles should be generals, and invested them with absolute power and command. The new generals without delay drew up their army in battalia, and marched strait to the city, where they were received at the gates by the most considerable of the inhabitants in white habits. As no body appeared to oppose them, they boldly entered the city, and marched through Acradina to the forum, where they encamped, being in all above fifty thousand men. Here Dion ordered the trumpets to sound to appease the noise and tumult; and silence being made, an herald proclaimed, that Dion and Megacles were come to abolish tyranny, and to free the people of Syracuse and their allies from the yoke of the tyrant. At these words the whole city resounded with joyful shouts and acclamations for so sudden and unexpected an happiness: They had lived fifty years in slavery, and saw themselves, by the valour of one man, restored to their liberty, when they least expected so happy a change. Where-ever Dion passed, the citizens having set out on both sides of the streets tables and bowls, and prepared victims, as he came before their houses, threw all sorts of flowers upon him; addressing vows and prayers to him as to a god. Dion, seeing himself master of the city, fell upon Epipolæ and took it by storm, setting at liberty the citizens, who were prisoners in the fort. He then surrounded the citadel whither all the tyrant's friends and mercenaries had fled, with a strong wall from sea to sea; so that they could receive no succours by land, nor have any communication with the rest of the city †.

In the mean time Dionysius, who was at Caulonia in Italy, receiving intelligence of what passed in Syracuse (F), hastened

ed thither, and entered the citadel by sea seven days after the arrival of Dion. He found his affairs in a desperate condition, and therefore to gain time he sent ambassadors to Dion and the Syracusians, offering to restore the democracy, provided, they would confer certain honours upon him in the republican state; he desired them to send deputies to treat with him, that he might put a speedy end to the war. The Syracusians immediately sent some of their citizens to sign an agreement with him upon the articles which he had proposed; but Dionysius, putting off the conferences from day to day, and observing that the Syracusians in hopes of peace kept negligent guard, suddenly attacked the wall, with which they had inclosed the citadel, and made several breaches in it. So warm and unexpected an assault put the Syracusians in great disorder; however, they maintained their ground, and fought with great resolution. Dion distinguished himself above all the rest; for, finding that his troops were very backward in engaging the tyrant's mercenaries, and believing example more powerful than words, he threw himself violently into the midst of them, and, after having made a great slaughter of the enemy and broken their ranks, made way for his men to follow him. His shield being pierced through in many places, and the enemy discharging showers of darts on him from all sides, he was wounded in his right arm with a javelin, and, fainting away through the extremity of the pain, was very near falling into the enemy's hands: but the Syracusians, highly concerned for the safety of their general, charged the mercenaries in a full body, and rescuing Dion who was almost spent, put the enemy to flight. A great number of the tyrant's troops were slain on the spot, the rest escaped with much ado into the citadel. The Syracusians, having gained so glorious a victory, set up a trophy in defiance of the tyrant, rewarded their foreign troops with a considerable sum of money, and presented Dion with a crown of gold. On the other hand Dionysius, having obtained leave to carry off his dead, caused them to be buried in purple robes, and paid them extraordinary city in his absence, dispatched a courier to him with advice of Dion's arrival. But the courier, being almost at his journey's end, was so fatigued, that he could not help stopping to take some sleep. In the mean time a wolf, smelling some meat he had in his wallet, came to the place, and carried off the bag, in which was the meat with the dispatches. By this misfortune Dionysius was prevented from receiving a timely account of Dion's arrival (35).

Dionysius after this defeat sent ambassadors anew to propose terms of peace ; but Dion returned no other answer than this ; Let Dionysius first abdicate the tyranny, and then we shall hear him. Dionysius was highly provoked at this haughty and peremptory answer, as he called it ; but, however, dissembling his resentment, he sent other ambassadors with a letter to Dion wrote with great art and address, and wonderfully calculated to render him suspected by the Syracusians, as if he intended to seize on the sovereignty himself. The Syracusians were taken with this gross bait, for Dion read the letter in the public assembly, and began to be jealous of his too great power. The arrival of Heracledes did not a little contribute to the shameful steps that ungrateful people took with regard to their deliverer and benefactor. Heracledes was one of the Syracusan exiles, an excellent officer, and well known among the troops, which he had formerly commanded under Dionysius ; but at the same time he was very ambitious, and a secret enemy to Dion, with whom he had had some dispute in Peloponnesus. He arrived at Syracuse with seven triremes and three other vessels, not with a design to join Dion, but to act separately against the tyrant in hopes of having himself the glory of driving him out. His first endeavour was to ingratiate himself with the people, and for that he was wonderfully qualified by an open and insinuating behaviour, whilst Dion's austere gravity was offensive to the multitude, especially as they were become more haughty and untractable by their late victory (G). Heracledes, by courting them and in every thing seconding their capricious humour, so won their affections in a short time, that of their own accord they called an assembly, and appointed him commander in chief of the fleet. Dion, having notice of these irregular proceedings, hastened to the assembly, and highly complained of the affront offered him,

(G) Dion had something rigid and austere in his temper, that made him less accessible and sociable than he should have been, and kept even men of merit and his best friends at a kind of distance Plato and those who had his glory sincerely at heart, often found fault with this his turn of mind, and advised him to correct it. But he, notwithstanding their remonstrances, seemed to pique himself upon the austere gravity and inflexible severity, with which he treated the people. That rough, and, as he called it, manly behaviour, created him many enemies, especially among the populace.

for

for they had conferred upon him the supreme command both of the fleet and army. His remonstrances were of such weight with the assembly, that they deprived Heraclides of the office, which they had just then honoured him with. When the assembly broke up, Dion sent for him, and having gently reprimanded him for his strange conduct in so delicate a conjuncture, when the least division among themselves might be attended with the most fatal consequences, he summoned a new assembly, and in the presence of the multitude appointed him admiral, and allowed him such a guard as he had himself. Dion imagined, that by this obliging behaviour he should get the better of his rival's ill-will. But Heraclides was not so easily to be gained ; he aimed at the supreme command, and nothing less would satisfy his ambition ; he expressed indeed a great many obligations to Dion, seemed to court his favour, and in his outward behaviour shewed a great readiness to obey his orders. But in the mean time he influenced the people under-hand against him, opposed his measures, and found fault with his whole conduct, as if he designed either to save the tyrant or protract the war. While Heraclides was thus disposing the people to confer the supreme command upon himself, one thing happened, which greatly raised his reputation among the Syracusians. Philistus, the tyrant's admiral, having put to sea with sixty gallies, Heraclides gave him chace with his small squadron, obliged him to engage, and gained a complete victory. Philistus behaved with great personal bravery, but at last finding himself surrounded on all sides by the Syracusians, who were desirous of taking him alive, he laid violent hands on himself, after having discharged the trust reposed in him in a distinguished manner. The Syracusians vented their rage upon his dead body, which they barbarously mangled, dragged through all the streets of the city, and then threw it over the walls to rot without burial in the open fields. He was one of the tyrant's most trusty friends, and had on all occasions given him signal proofs of his fidelity. Wherefore Dionysius was so disheartened with the loss of so steady a friend and experienced officer, that he sent ambassadors to Dion, offering to surrender the citadel with all the troops there in garison, and money to pay them for five months, upon condition, that he were allowed to retire to Italy, and there enjoy during his life the revenue of certain lands, which he mentioned, in the neighbourhood of Syracuse. Dion's advice was, Dionysius that the terms should be accepted ; but the Syracusians, ho- flies to

Wherefore Dionysius, seeing all lost, left the citadel in the hands of his eldest son Apollocrates, and, taking the advan-

Factions in Syracuse.

Heraclides was greatly blamed for having suffered him to escape ; and therefore, to regain the favour of the people, he proposed a new division of lands, insinuating, that they could never enjoy perfect liberty so long as there was so great an inequality in wealth and power. This motion was warmly opposed by Dion, which gave Heraclides an opportunity of rendering him suspected to the people, as if he intended to keep them in subjection, and reduce them to the same state of slavery in which they had been held by their tyrants. By thus pretending to espouse the cause of liberty, he prevailed upon the assembly to reduce the pay of the foreign troops, to appoint new generals, himself among the rest, and to make a new division of lands. At the same time they privately solicited the foreign troops to abandon Dion and join them, promising to give them a share in the government, as if they were natives and citizens. But they generously rejected the offer, declaring, that they would stand by Dion to the last, and willingly sacrifice their lives in defence of their general. The populace were so enraged at this answer, that they began to assemble in a tumultuous manner, and throw out threats both against Dion and his troops. Whereupon those brave men, placing Dion in their center, began to march out of the city, protesting, that so long as one of them was alive no body should hurt him. In this manner they withdrew without offering the least violence to any of the citizens, but only reproaching them with ingratitude towards their deliverer and great benefactor. The Syracusians, despising their small number, and ascribing their moderation to fear and want of courage, began to attack them, not doubting but they should put them all to the sword before they got out of the city. Dion being thus reduced to the necessity of either destroying those he was come to save, or being himself destroyed with so many brave men, begged them in the most tender and affectionate manner to hearken to reason, and not suffer themselves to be imposed upon by ambitious and ill designing men, pointing with his hand at the citadel, which was full of enemies, who with great joy beheld all that passed. But finding them deaf to all his remonstrances, he commanded his men to face about and march in close order, as if they designed to fall upon the multitude ; they obeyed his orders, and raising a great shout advanced against them, pretending to attack them with the utmost fury ; the noise they made with their arms, according to Dion's directions, so terrified the populace, that they betook themselves to a disorderly flight. Dion did not offer to pursue them, but hastened his march towards the country of the Leontines. The Syracusians being, on their return, treated by their countrymen as cowards, for having suffered so small a body of men to make their escape, in order to retrieve their honour, marched out again in pursuit of Dion, and coming up with him as he was passing a river, ordered their cavalry to advance to the charge. But when they perceived that he was resolved in earnest to repel force by force, they were again seized with terror, and, flying in a more shameful manner than before made what haste they could to regain the city <sup>b</sup>.

THE Leontines not only received Dion with great marks of distinction, but made rich presents to his soldiers, and declared them all free citizens. They likewise sent ambassadors to the Syracusians, complaining of the ill treatment Dion and his men had met with at their hands, and reminding them of the inestimable favours they had received from so worthy a patriot. The Syracusians replied, that Dion had driven out one tyrant with a design to establish another, and therefore ought to be treated in the same manner as their first tyrant had been, whom they had obliged to quit not only Syracuse, but the island.

IN the mean time the tyrant's troops in the citadel, being reduced by famine to the utmost extremity, resolved at last to surrender both the place and themselves to the Syracusians. Accordingly they sent deputies to obtain for them the best terms they could ; but while they were actually conferring with the townsmen, Nypsius, a general of experienced valour and greatly attached to Dionysius, appeared with a numerous squadron of galleys, and a great many transports laden with corn and all sorts of provisions. Nypsius anchored in the port of Arethusa, and having landed the men he brought along with him, he called a council of war, wherein he made a speech to the garison suitable to the present occasion, and with hopes of ample rewards engaged them to promise, that they would never submit to the enemy upon any terms whatsoever. The Syracusians no sooner heard of this new supply, but they manned as many galleys as they had at hand, and attacking the enemy while they were unloading the corn and other provisions, sunk some of their ships, took others, and purshed the rest to the shore. But this very victory was the occasion of their ruin. For slighting the enemy, whom they looked upon as utterly undone, they gave themselves up to feasting, revelling, and all kind of debauchery ; which general infatuation Nypsius did not fail to improve to his advantage. That brave commander, desirous to repair his late loss by some bold attempt, ordered his men to march out of the citadel, and assault the wall that inclosed it. They met with no opposition, the guards being every where asleep after their last night's debauch ; having therefore in silence applied their scaling ladders, some of the most resolute mounted the wall, killed the centinels, and opened the gates to their companions. Thus all the garison, consisting of ten thousand well disciplined troops, entered the city, cut all those to pieces who opposed them, and made such a dreadful havock as can hardly be expressed. Many of the citizens were murdered in their beds, their houses were plundered, and their wives and children taken out of their beds, and either cruelly butchered before their faces, or carried captives into the citadel, without regard to their tears, cries, and lamentations. The slaughter was so great, that the streets were every where covered with dead bodies, and the private houses swimming in blood.

called.

THE citizens, seeing themselves in this desperate condition, knew not what to resolve on. They were all well apprised, that Dion was the only person who could administer them any relief ; but no one had courage enough to name him ; so much were they ashamed of their ingratitude towards their protector. As the danger increased every moment, and the enemy was preparing to set fire to the city, one boldly cried out, Let us send for Dion. His name was no sooner heard, but the whole multitude, with shouts of joy, approved the motion ; and accordingly deputies were that instant dispatched to Leontini, who, arriving late in the evening, threw themselves at Dion's feet, and with many tears acquainted him with the deplorable condition of Syracuse. Dion no sooner heard them than he assembled a council of war, and having introduced the Syracusan deputies, he desired them to lay before his officers the state of their city, which they did in a very moving speech, entreating Dion to forget the ill treatment he had received, the rather because that unfortunate people had already paid dear for it, and acknowledged the miseries they suffered justly inflicted upon them, for their ingratitude towards so loving a father of his country. As soon as they had done, Dion rose up, but, instead of speaking, burst into tears, and could not for some time utter one single word ; the foreign soldiers, who were mostly Peloponnesians, called out to him to take courage, and expressed a generous compassion in seeing their leader so overwhelmed with grief. At length, having recovered himself, he addressed his troops and the people of Leontini in the following terms : “ Men of Peloponnesus, and “ you, our allies, I have assembled you here that you may “ consider what is proper to be done with regard to your- “ selves ; as for me I am already determined, and must not “ be wavering, when my country is in danger. If I cannot “ preserve it, I will perish with it, and be buried in its “ ruins. But for you, if you will be so generous as to forget the ill treatment you have received at our hands, and “ assist us once more, follow my example ; but if your just “ complaints against the Syracusians prevail with you to abandon them in their present distress, and suffer them to “ perish ; may the gods amply reward you for the affection “ and fidelity you have hitherto expressed for me. I only “ beg that you will remember Dion, who did not abandon “ you, when you were basely treated by his country, nor “ his country when fallen into misfortunes. ” He had no sooner done speaking, than the foreign troops with one voice entreated him to lead them on that moment against the enemy. The deputies, transported with joy, tenderly embraced them, praying the gods to second their generous resolution. As soon as the tumult was appeased, Dion ordered them to refresh themselves and return with their arms to the same place, being resolved to set out that very night on his march to Syracuse.

In the mean time the soldiers of Dionysius, after committing all sorts of outrages in the city, had retired at night into the citadel. This short respite gave Dion's enemies new courage, who flattering themselves, that the garison would not venture again out of the castle, began to exhort the Syracusians to think no more of Dion, but to defend themselves with their own valour. They so far prevailed, that new deputies were dispatched from the chief commanders to stop his march ; but his friends at the same time sent some worthy citizens to entreat him not to hearken to the embassies of such, as were equally enemies to him and their country. Dion therefore pursued his march, but the opposite faction seized the gates, with a design to dispute his entrance. In the mean time Nysius, well apprised of the divisions that reigned in the city, made another sally from the citadel, and made such a dreadful havock in all quarters of the city, that from the heaps of dead bodies with which the streets, the squares, and the the forum, were strewed, one would have believed, that not a single citizen had been left alive. They spared neither age nor sex, but put all without distinction to the sword. Nothing but murder and bloodshed was seen in every corner; and because they were informed that Dion was hastening to the relief of the city, they seemed determined to destroy it entirely before his arrival. For after they had murdered all the inhabitants they could light on, with burning torches, straw, and other combustibles, they set fire to the houses, so that many who had escaped the sword were miserably consumed in the flames <sup>c</sup>.

DURING this confusion Dion unexpectedly arrived, and having detached his light-armed troops against the enemy to re-animate the citizens, who were still alive, with their presence, he drew up his heavy-armed infantry, and divided them into small parties, that they might be able to attack in several places at once, and appear stronger and more formidable to the enemy. Having made these dispositions and invoked the gods, he marched across the city against the enemy, being every-where welcomed with acclamations, shouts of joy, and songs of victory. There was not one in the city so fond of life as not to be more in pain for Dion's safety than his own: They were all under the greatest apprehensions in seeing him march the foremost over blood, fire, and dead bodies, with which the public streets were entirely covered. The enemy, hearing that Dion had entered the city, posted themselves in line of battle behind the ruins of the wall they had thrown down, determined at all events to maintain that post, lest their communication with the city should be cut off. It was with the greatest difficulty that Dion's men kept their ranks, being often obliged to march through the fire and clouds of smoke, while the roofs and beams of the houses, half consumed with the flames, falling down broke their ranks. At length they arrived at the place where the enemy waited for them, and began the attack. The slaughter was great on both sides, and the fight continued for several hours before Dion's men could get over the ruins which covered the enemy; but at length the Peloponnesians, animating each other with mutual shouts, made such a vigorous effort, that the enemy, though far superior in number, was bore down and forced to give ground; the greatest part of them fled into the citadel, and the rest were cut in pieces by the victorious Peloponnesians. The city being thus delivered, Dion's men, instead of refreshing themselves after so great fatigues, spent all that night in extinguishing the fire, which they compassed, not without great danger and difficulty <sup>d</sup>.

THE next day Heraclides and his uncle Theodotus, two of Dion's greatest enemies, put themselves into his hands, confessing their injurious treatment of him, and conjuring him to forget their ungrateful behaviour and restore them to his favour, of which they acknowledged themselves unworthy. Dion's friends advised him not to spare them, since they would not fail to raise new disturbances in the city, and defeat in the end so glorious a victory. But Dion, believing he could get the better of their stubborn and restless temper by force of kind usage and obligations, generously pardoned them. Heraclides seemed to be affected with this kindness, for the same day he proposed in the assembly, that Dion should be elected generalissimo, with supreme power by sea and land. But the ungrateful populace, whose darling Heraclides was, opposed this motion with all their power, and Dion, to avoid new disturbances, gave up that point, suffering Heraclides to command in chief at sea <sup>e</sup>.

ALL things being now quiet, the Syracusians, under the direction of Dion, applied themselves solely to the siege of the citadel, and in a short time reduced the numerous garison to such straits, that Apollocrates, the tyrant's son, was obliged to capitulate. Dion allowed him to retire unmolested to his father in Italy with five gallies and all his friends and relations. It is not easy to conceive the joy of the city upon his departure. The whole city crowded to the shore to gratify their eyes with such an agreeable sight, and to solemnize the happy day, on which, after so many years servitude, the Syracusians could first stile themselves again a free people. The citadel surrenders.

As soon as Apollocrates set sail, Dion entered the citadel at the head of his troops, and was met at the gate by his sister Aristomache, leading his son, and by his wife Arete, whom Dionysius, as we have related above, had given in marriage to Timocrates. Dion embraced his sister first and then his son; whereupon Arete drenched in tears was ready to swoon away, when Aristomache presenting her to Dion; “The tears, said she, you see her shed, at the time your presence restores us to life and joy, her silence and confusion may well convince you, that you alone have always possessed her heart. Shall she embrace you as her husband, or die at your feet abandoned by you for what she has suffered against her will?” At these words Dion, with his face bathed in tears, tenderly embraced her, gave her his son, and sent her home to his house, whither he soon followed her, leaving the Syracusians in possession of the citadel, as a pledge of their liberty. After this Dion rewarded with a magnificence truly royal all those who had contributed to his success, according to their rank and merit, dismissed his guards, and, though at the height of glory, lived like a private citizen.

As the city was now in a profound tranquility, Dion attempted to establish in it a form of government, composed of the Spartan and Cretan, but wherein the Aristocratical was to prevail; the supreme authority, according to his plan, was to be vested in a council, of which the members were to be chosen by the people and nobility. But this design was warmly opposed by Heraclides, who, still turbulent and seditious, did not fail to stir up the people on that occasion against Dion, as if he intended to abridge their power and subject them to the nobility. Hereupon Dion, finding that he opposed all wise counsels, was at last prevailed upon to consent to his death, and he was accordingly by Dion's friends dispatched in his own house. Dion publicly owned, that he had been put to death by his order, and in an harangue to the people convinced them, that it was impossible for the city to be free from commotions and sedition, while Heraclides lived. However, after that murder Dion never enjoyed a happy hour, but lived in continual anguish and sorrow, reproaching himself with having imbrued his hands in the blood of his fellow-citizen (H). Not long after his son, for some unknown disappointment, threw himself from the top of a house, and died of the fall. This increased Dion's affliction; but neither his grief nor life lasted long, Calippus having, by the blackest treachery, deprived Syracuse of the greatest hero it ever produced.

death.

Calippus was an Athenian by birth, and had contracted an intimate friendship with Dion, who lodged in his house at Athens, and ever after ranked him among his particular and intimate friends. Having attended Dion into Sicily, after the tyrant was driven out, he gave himself up to ambitious views, and began to entertain thoughts of making himself master of Syracuse. But as he was well apprised, that he could not accomplish his design so long as Dion was alive, he threw off all regard for the sacred ties of friendship and hospitality, and de-terminated to get rid of him. Notwithstanding the care he used, to conceal his wicked purpose, it came to the ears of Dion's friends and relations (I), who all earnestly exhorted him to prevent Calippus's crime, by inflicting upon him the punishment his base treachery deserved. But he could not be prevailed upon to take any such resolution, saying he had rather die a thousand deaths, than live under the necessity of continual precautions, not only against his enemies, but the best of his friends. He could not even be induced to take a guard for the security of his person; Calippus therefore having one night entered his house with a band of Zacynthian soldiers, who were entirely devoted to his interest, murdered him, without meeting with the least opposition, and apprehending his wife and sister, caused them to be carried to the public prison f.

AFTER the death of Dion, Calippus, with the assistance of the Zacynthian troops, made himself master of Syracuse, and practised there greater cruelties than any of the tyrants before him. Plutarch observes, that the success he met with occasioned great complaints against the gods, for suffering so impious a wretch to raise himself to so exalted a station, by such an execrable piece of treachery. But providence was not long without justifying itself, the traitor having soon undergone the punishment he deserved. Having marched with his forces against Catana, Syracuse revolted, and shook off so shameful a yoke. He then withdrew to Messana; but the inhabitants taking up arms shut their gates against him, and in a sally cut off most of the Zacynthian troops who had murdered Dion. No city in Sicily would admit such an execrable monster ; whereupon he left the island and retired to Rhegium, where, after having led for some time a miserable life, he was slain by Leptines and Polyperchon, with the same dagger with which he had murdered Dion<sup>8</sup>.

(I) Amongst others, Dion's sister and wife, having had notice of his wicked designs, lost no time, but endeavoured to discover the truth by a very strict enquiry. Calippus, finding that they suspected him, went to them with tears in his eyes, and in appearance inconsolable, that any body should suspect him of such a crime, or think him capable of so black a design. They insisted upon his taking the Great Oath, as it was called. The person, who swore, was wrapped up in the purple mantle of the goddess Proserpine, and holding a lighted torch in his hand, pronounced against himself the most dreadful execrations, wishing them to fall upon himself and his family, if he was guilty of the crime laid to his charge. This oath Calippus took, while he was watching every day an opportunity of putting in execution his black design (36).

As for Aristomache and Arete, upon the downfall of Calippus they were set at liberty, and at first kindly entertained by Iceas of Syracuse, one of Dion's friends, who received them into his house. But Iceas, at last complying with the importunities of Dion's enemies, provided a vessel for them, and having put them on board, under pretence of sending them to Peloponnesus, ordered the commander of the ship to put them to death in the passage, and throw them into the sea. His orders were put in execution ; but Iceas, as we shall see hereafter, paid dear for such an inhuman treatment.

New troubles in Syracuse.

Year of the Flood, 2649. Before Christ, 350.

The Syracusians recur to the Corinthians.

UPON Dion's death, the city was involved in greater miseries than ever ; Calippus usurped the supreme power, but after ten months was driven out by Hipparinus, the brother of Dionysius, who, arriving unexpectedly with a numerous fleet, possessed himself of the city, and held it for the space of two years. Syracuse and all Sicily being thus divided into parties and factions, Dionysius, taking advantage of these troubles, assembled some foreign troops, and having defeated Nysæus, who was then governor of Syracuse, reinstated himself in the possession of his dominions, ten years after he had been obliged to quit the throne. His past misfortunes, instead of softening his fierce temper, served only to inflame it, and render him more savage and brutal than ever. The better sort of the citizens, not being able to brook so cruel a servitude, had recourse to Iceas, who was by birth a Syracusan, but at that time tyrant of Leontini ; they created him general of all their forces, abandoning themselves to his conduct, not that they had any great opinion of his virtue, but because they had no other resource. In the mean time the Carthaginians, thinking this a very favourable opportunity to seize upon all Sicily, sent a mighty fleet thither. In this extremity, the Syracusians had recourse to the Corinthians, from whom they were descended, and who, of all the Greek nations, were the most professed enemies of tyranny, and most generous asserters of liberty. Iceas, who had nothing else in view but to make himself master of Syracuse, and had already entered into a treaty with the Carthaginians, seemed to approve these measures, and even sent his deputies along with those of the Syracusians ; but in the mean time was contriving, how he could prevent the Corinthians from sending any forces into the island, which, according to his late treaty with the Carthaginians, was, after the expulsion of Dionysius, to be divided between him and them. The Syracusan ambassadors met with a very kind reception at Corinth, where in a general assembly it was resolved, that succours should be sent into Sicily, and that Timoleon should be forthwith dispatched to Syracuse, and there take upon him the command of the Syracusan forces against Dionysius and the Car-

Timoleon had led a retired life for twenty years, without ever interfering in public affairs, and expected nothing less than to be employed, or even thought of, on such an occasion. He was sprung from one of the most illustrious families of Corinth, and had on all occasions signalized himself in the defence of his country, against the unjust pretensions of foreign as well as domestic tyrants. He had an elder brother by name Timophanes, whom he tenderly loved, and had saved in a battle by covering him with his own body. But his country was still dearer to him. Timophanes was suspected to entertain thoughts of seizing on the sovereignty, which Timoleon being informed of, used all possible means to divert him from so wicked an attempt. But finding all his endeavours ineffectual, and that neither kindness, friendship, affection, nor even menaces, could prevail upon an heart abandoned to ambition, he caused his brother to be put to death in his presence by two of his intimate friends. This action was admired and applauded by the principal citizens of Corinth ; but highly blamed by others, who reproached him as an abominable parricide, who would not fail of drawing the vengeance of the gods upon himself and his country. His mother in the excess of her grief uttered the most dreadful curses and imprecations against him ; and when he came to comfort her, she caused the doors to be shut against him, not being able to bear the sight of one who had murdered her son. This struck him with such horror, that, considering Timophanes no longer as a tyrant, but only as a brother, he resolved to put an end to his unhappy life by abstaining from all nourishment. But his friends having, with the utmost difficulty, dissuaded him from this fatal resolution, he condemned himself to pass the rest of his days in solitude. From that moment he renounced all public affairs, and for several years never came to the city, but wandered about in the most solitary and desert places, abandoned to excessive grief and melancholy. After he had passed near twenty years in this condition, he returned to Corinth; but lived there quite private and retired, without concerning himself with the administration. As he had by the death of his brother given a remarkable instance of his aversion to tyranny and tyrants, the Corinthians chose him as the most proper man to be sent into Sicily, which at that time abounded with tyrants above all other countries, there being scarce a city in the whole island, which was not held in slavery by some unjust usurper. It was not without great difficulty that Timoleon was prevailed upon to accept the command offered him; but at last, his duty getting the better of his inclination, he complied with the request of his friends, and began to raise forces for the intended expedition <sup>1</sup> (K).

IN the mean time Icetas, who intended to possess himself of Syracuse, under colour of assisting the inhabitants against Dionysius, foreseeing, that Timoleon would defeat his measures, dispatched ambassadors to the Corinthians, acquainting them, that the Carthaginians, apprised of their design, were waiting to intercept their squadron with a great fleet; and that their slowness in sending him succours had obliged him to call in even the Carthaginians to his aid, and employ them against the tyrant; wherefore they might forbear making any farther levies, or exhausting their treasures in great but useless expences, since he could, with the assistance of his al-

(K) Diodorus varies in the circumstances of this fact from Plutarch, whom we have followed. He tells us, that Timoleon having killed his brother in the public market-place with his own hand, a great tumult arose among the citizens, some being of opinion, that he should suffer according to law for having imbrued his hands in the blood of a citizen, and others crying him up as the deliverer of his country, and worthy of the greatest rewards. To appease this tumult an assembly was convened, and the case of Timoleon taken into consideration. In the height of the debates the Syracusan ambassadors arrived, demanding a general to command their forces. Whereupon they unanimously agreed to send Timoleon into Sicily; but let him first know, that if he discharged with fidelity the trust reposed in him, he should be treated as one who had killed a tyrant; but if he did not answer their expectation, he should, on his return, be condemned as the murderer of his brother (37.)

lies the Carthaginians, drive out Dionysius, and restore Syracuse to its antient liberty. The speech of the ambassadors, and the letters which they delivered from Iceas, only served to hasten the departure of Timoleon, who was now fully convinced, that Iceas acted treacherously and aspired at the sovereignty. He therefore immediately embarked his men, who were in all but a thousand, on board ten galleys, and putting to sea arrived safe on the coast of Italy (L); where news was brought him, that Iceas had defeated Dionysius, and, having made himself master of the greatest part of the city, had obliged the tyrant to shut himself up in the citadel. At the same time Timoleon was informed, that Iceas had given orders to the Carthaginians to prevent his approach, and destroy his squadron as soon as it appeared on the coasts of Sicily. This gave him great uneasiness; however, he advanced with his small fleet to Rhegium, where he found ambassadors from Iceas, who were charged to acquaint him, that he should be kindly received at Syracuse, provided he dismissed his troops; but otherwise the Syracusians, who were jealous of foreign forces, would not admit him into their city. At the same time twenty Carthaginian galleys arrived in the port of Rhegium, sent by Iceas to prevent the Corinthians from approaching Syracuse. In this nice conjuncture Timoleon demanded a conference with the ambassadors and the chief commanders of the Carthaginian squadron, in the presence of the people of Rhegium. He pretended to be willing to return home, but said, that he would first hear the Rhegians, and do it by their advice, that he might on his return to Corinth have wherewithal to justify his conduct. The magistrates of Rhegium were of intelligence with him, and desired nothing more than to see the Corinthians in possession of Sicily. They summoned therefore an assembly, and shut the gates of the city, under pretence of preventing the citizens from going abroad, that they might apply themselves only to the affair in hand.

(L) Diodorus tells us, that, during the whole time Timoleon was at sea, a light, like a burning torch, went before him in the night, till the fleet arrived safe on the coasts of Italy; and adds, that before he set sail, he had been told by the priests of Ceres and Proserpine, that the goddesses had appeared to them, and promised to sail along with him to the island that was consecrated in a peculiar manner to them. This greatly encouraged Timoleon, who consecrated the best galley of his squadron to the goddesses, calling it the sacred ship of Ceres and Proserpine (38).

Timoleon deludes the Carthaginians and arrives in Sicily. THE assembly being met, long speeches were made, and debates carried on, in appearance with great warmth, on purpose to gain time. While the Carthaginians were busy in the council, nine Corinthian galleys, according to the orders they had received from Timoleon, set sail, and were suffered to pass, the Carthaginians believing their departure had been agreed on between the officers of both parties, who were in the city. When Timoleon was privately informed that his galleys were at sea, he slipped out of the assembly, and making to the galley that was left, embarked and rejoined the rest of his squadron. The Carthaginians thus deluded, pursued him; but as he had got far before them, the assembly not having broke up till it was dark, he arrived safe at Taurominium.

Icetas defeated by Timoleon. UPON the unexpected news of Timoleon's arrival in Sicily, Icetas put the Carthaginians, who had a fleet of an hundred and fifty galleys, in possession of the harbour of Syracuse, and dispatched an express to Mago, the Carthaginian general, desiring him to advance with his whole army to the gates of the city. In the mean time Timoleon, leaving Taurominium, marched to Adranum, where he attacked a Carthaginian detachment commanded by Icetas in person, and put them to flight, though they were above four times his number. As victory naturally begets friends, not only Adranum, but several other cities opened their gates to Timoleon, and joined him with all their forces. So that he now boldly advanced to the relief of Syracuse. On his arrival he found the Syracusians in a most deplorable condition, Icetas being master of the city, the Carthaginians of the port, and Dionysius of the citadel. The latter, seeing himself besieged on all sides without any hopes of relief, sent privately ambassadors to Timoleon, offering to put the citadel, which he could no longer defend, into his hands, upon condition he would suffer him to retire unmolested. Timoleon, taking the advantage of such an offer, willingly agreed to the terms, and detached Euclid and Telemachus, with four hundred men, to take possession of that important place. Dionysius received them within the walls, and delivered up to them not only all his warlike stores and provisions, but even the rich moveables of his palace, with seventy thousand compleat suits of armour, and two thousand regular troops, which Timoleon incorporated among his Corinthians. After this Dionysius, taking with him some of his friends and part of his treasures, embarked on a small vessel, and repaired, unperceived by the troops of Icetas, to the camp of Timoleon. There he appeared for the first time as a private man and a suppliant, after he had been, near twelve years, lord of one of the most wealthy kingdoms then known known. Timoleon sent him to Corinth with one galley only and without a convoy ; however, he escaped the Carthaginian vessels, which lay in wait for him, and arrived safe. He was at first greatly pitied by the Corinthians, but his manner of life soon changed their compassion into contempt. He passed whole days in perfumers shops, or with actresses and singers, disputing with them on the rules of music and the harmony of airs. Some believed, that he behaved thus out of policy, not to give umbrage to the Corinthians, or betray any thought of recovering his dominions. Some writers tell us, that the extreme poverty, to which he was reduced, obliged him to open a school at Corinth, where, says Tully <sup>k</sup>, he exercised that tyranny over children, which he could no longer practice over men. Dionysius thus reduced to beggary, and of a powerful king become a contemptible school-master, ought to warn all persons in exalted stations not to rely too much on prosperity, or think the gifts of fortune, as Valerius Maximus expresses it, entailed upon any of the human race <sup>l</sup>. Philip king of Macedon, meeting one day Dionysius in the streets at Corinth, asked him how he came to lose so powerful a kingdom as had been left him by his father ; Dionysius answered, that his father indeed had left him a rich kingdom, but not the fortune, which had preserved both him and his kingdom <sup>m</sup>.

When they were reduced to the last extremity, Timoleon found means to relieve them by conveying into the place, in spite of all opposition, a great quantity of corn. Whereupon Ictas and Mago, being well apprised, that they could not become masters of the citadel so long as Timoleon was in that neighbourhood, resolved to leave part of the army in Syracuse, and with the rest either drive Timoleon from Catana, or block him up in that city. They were scarce gone, when Leon, who commanded in the citadel, observing that those, who were left to continue the siege, were very remiss in their duty, made a sudden sally, killed a great many of them, put the rest to flight, and having possessed himself of the quarter of the city called Acradina, fortified it, and by works of communication joined it to the citadel. This bad news soon brought back Mago and Ictas, but they could not drive the enemy from Acradina. In the mean time a supply of two thousand foot and two hundred horse sent from Corinth landed safe in Sicily, having deceived the vigilance of the Carthaginian squadron posted to intercept them. Timoleon, encouraged with this new reinforcement, marched against Messana, and having made himself master of that city, advanced to Syracuse. As he approached the city, his first care was to send emissaries into the enemy's camp, and artfully spread among the Syracusians and other Greeks, who served under Ictas and Mago, that Timoleon's only design was to restore them to their antient liberty, that it was shameful for Greeks to fight under the standards of a tyrant, and that if they joined Timoleon, the war would be soon at an end, and not only peace but liberty restored to the whole island. Such discourses being spread through the whole camp, and even reaching Mago's ears, whose army was mostly composed of mercenary Greeks, that general began to be very uneasy, and as he wanted only a pretence to retire, he gave out that his forces were going to betray him, and, without hearkening to the entreaties and warm remonstrances of Ictas, he weighed anchor and set sail for Africa, shamefully abandoning the conquest of Sicily. On his arrival at Carthage he laid violent hands on himself, to prevent the punishment which his cowardice deserved <sup>n</sup>.

THE next day Timoleon appeared before the city with his army in line of battle, and assaulted it in three different quarters with such vigour, that the troops of Ictas were every where driven from the walls, and that part of the city which they held taken by storm. Timoleon no sooner saw himself master of Syracuse, and all the forts which had been built by the tyrants, but he caused a proclamation to be made by sound of trumpet, inviting all the citizens to come the next day with necessary tools, and demolish with their own hands the citadel and other castles, which he called the nests of tyrants. The Syracusians, looking upon that day as the first of their true liberty, crowded in multitudes to the citadel, which they soon demolished together with the forts and the tyrants palaces, breaking open at the same time their tombs, and overturning every monument of tyranny. The citadel being quite razed, Timoleon caused public edifices to be erected, in the spot where it stood, for the administration of justice. He found the city in a most miserable condition, for many having perished in the wars and seditions, and others fled to avoid the evils attending tyranny, that once so wealthy and populous place was become almost a desert; insomuch, that the horses grazed on the grass that grew in the very market-place. The other cities of Sicily were in the same manner abandoned and desolate. Timoleon therefore wrote to Corinth, desiring the magistrates to send a new colony to repeople Syracuse, which could no otherwise recover its former splendor. The Corinthians, pitying the sad condition of a city, which they themselves had founded, sent to all the sacred games of Greece and public assemblies, and caused proclamations to be made by heralds, declaring, that the Corinthians, having abolished the tyranny of Syracuse, and expelled the tyrants, restored Syracuse to its former liberty, and invited all those, who had withdrawn from their native country, to repair thither again and take possession anew of their lands and estates. At the same time they dispatched couriers into Asia and the neighbouring islands, whither great numbers of fugitives had retired, exhorting them to hasten to Corinth, where they should be supplied with vessels, and at the expence of the public conveyed to their own country.

WHEN it was publicly known, that Syracuse was delivered from the oppression of tyrants, and that Corinth received all the fugitives in order to transport them to their native city, great numbers flocked thither from all parts; but as they were not sufficient to repeople that great city, they intreated the Corinthians and other cities of Greece to spare them some of their inhabitants, and their request being granted, they embarked for Syracuse, being in all above ten thousand. At the same time great multitudes of people from Italy and other parts of Sicily joined Timoleon, who distributed the lands among them gratis, but sold the houses, and with the money arising from the sale established a fund for the support of the poor and needy.

Timoleon, having thus raised Syracuse in a manner from the grave, undertook the delivery of all Sicily, and the extirpating of tyrants and tyranny from the other cities. He began with Ietas tyrant of Leontini, whom he compelled to renounce his alliance with the Carthaginians, demolish his forts, and resign the sovereignty. Leptines tyrant of Egea and Apollonia, being closely besieged, surrendered himself to the conqueror, who spared his life, and sent him with several other tyrants to Corinth, where he led a private life. Afterwards he possessed himself of Entella, and put to death all those who adhered to the Carthaginians. The fame of his victories being now spread all over the island, the Greek cities everywhere submitted to him, and were by him restored to the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges. Many cities likewise of the Sicani and Siculi, subject to the Carthaginians, sent ambassadors to him, desiring to be admitted among his confederates.

Timoleon, having thus cleared Sicily of the many tyrants who held the people in subjection, and set the whole island at liberty, returned to Syracuse, where in conjunction with Cephalus and Dionysius, two legislators sent from Corinth, he instituted such laws as were most proper for the democracy. Among other wise institutions, he appointed a chief magistrate to be chosen yearly, whom the Syracusians called the Amphipolus of Jupiter Olympius; and the first Amphipolus was Calimenes. Hence arose the custom among the Syracusians to compute their years by the respective governments of these magistrates, which custom continued in the time of Diodorus Siculus, that is, in the reign of Augustus, above three hundred years after the office of Amphipolus was first introduced <sup>P</sup>.

makes war upon the
nians,*

Timoleon, having thus reformed the government of Syracuse, and by many wise laws settled the city in peace and tranquility, began to entertain thoughts of driving the Carthaginians quite out of the island. With this view he sent a strong detachment, under the command of Dinarchus and Demaratus, into the neighbouring countries subject to the Carthaginians, enjoining them to plunder all those cities, which refused to renounce their alliance with Carthage and join them. By this means he got a vast sum of money, which served to pay his soldiers their arrears, and make the necessary preparations for the war he designed. The Carthaginians, suspecting his design, sent over into Sicily Asdrubal and Hamilcar, two experienced commanders, with an army of seventy thousand men, two hundred ships of war, and a thousand transports laden with warlike engines, armed chariots, horses, and all sorts of provisions. They no sooner landed at Lilybæum, but Timoleon advanced against them, though his army consisted only of seven thousand men. On his march one of his mercenaries, by name Thracius, cried out, that Timoleon was not in his right senses, else with such an handful of men he would never attempt to oppose so numerous an army, that he was leading them to certain and unavoidable destruction, and that, if he was not distracted, he could propose nothing else than the sacrificing of their lives, perhaps because he was not able to pay them their arrears. By this speech he prevailed upon a thousand of the mercenaries to return to Syracuse, and not follow Timoleon in so desperate an expedition. This did not dishearten Timoleon, who having by fair words and large promises brought back the other mercenaries to their duty, continued his march to the banks of the river Cremissus, where the enemy was encamped. His unexpected arrival occasioned no small confusion in the Carthaginian army, which he improving to his advantage attacked them with great vigour and resolution. Ten thousand of the enemies forces, who had already passed the river, were defeated and put to flight, before the rest could come up to their assistance. But in the mean time the whole army having gained the opposite bank, the battle was renewed, and the victory a long time doubtful; but while the Carthaginians were fighting with great resolution, and endeavouring to hem in and surround on all sides Timoleon's small army, there arose on a sudden a violent storm of hail, thunder, and lightning, which, beating on the faces of the Carthaginians, put them into such confusion, that they were not able to stand their ground any longer. As soon as they began to retire, the Greeks, encouraging one another with shouts of joy, pressed them so vigorously, that the whole army was driven into the river, where great numbers of them were drowned in that throng and confusion. The sacred cohort or brigade, as the Carthaginians called it, which consisted of two thousand five hundred citizens of Carthage, all men of experienced courage and valour, fought with great resolution, and stood their ground till they were all cut off to a man. Of the rest ten thousand were slain, and above fifteen thousand taken prisoners; all their baggage and provision, with two hundred chariots, a thousand coats of mail, and ten thousand shields, fell into the enemy's hands, and were either sent to Corinth and there dedicated to Neptune, or hung up in the temples of Syracuse. The spoil, which was exceeding rich, and consisted of gold and silver plate, and other furniture of great value, he divided among the soldiers, retaining nothing for himself but the glory of so famous a victory.

The Carthaginians defeated.

Timoleon after this victory returned to Syracuse, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy, and attended to his house by the magistrates and chief citizens, the people, as he passed through the streets, throwing flowers upon on him, and paying him such honours as were due to heroes or demi-gods. Soon after his arrival he banished the thousand mercenaries, who had deserted him, ordering them to leave Syracuse before sun-set. This was all the punishment he inflicted upon them<sup>9</sup>.

Peace concluded with the Carthaginians.

As soon as the news of this overthrow reached Carthage, the people there were seized with such terror, that they immediately dispatched ambassadors into Sicily, with orders to strike up a peace upon any terms whatsoever. As several new tyrants had already started up and formed a powerful alliance against Timoleon, he thought it advisable to conclude a peace with the Carthaginians, and turn his arms against those unjust usurpers. A peace was accordingly settled on the following terms: that all the Greek cities should be set free; that the river Halycus, or, as Diodorus calls it, the Lycus, should be the boundary between the territories of both parties; that the natives of the cities subject to the Carthaginians should be allowed to withdraw, if they pleased, to Syracuse, with their families and effects; and lastly, that Carthage should not for the future give any assistance to the tyrants against the Syracusians.

Timoleon, having now nothing to fear from the Carthaginians, marched against the tyrants, determined to root them quite out of the island. Ictas had already taken the field, but was easily routed by Timoleon, who, following his victory, made him, his son Eupolemus, and the general of his horse prisoners, and put them all to death. His wife and daughter fell likewise into his hands, and were sent to Syracuse, where they were sentenced to die, and executed accordingly, the people of Syracuse thus revenging the death of Dion's wife and sister, whom Ictas had caused to be thrown into the sea, as we have related above. Mamercus tyrant of Catana, Hippon tyrant of Messana, and all the other tyrants of Sicily, met with the like fate, being first overcome by Timoleon, and then put to death by those whom they had tyrannically oppressed. Thus Timoleon, having intirely purged Sicily of the tyrants who had long infested it, given Syracuse wise laws, every where re-established peace and tranquillity, repopled the cities, and supplied them with means to recover their antient splendor, resigned his authority to live in retirement. The Syracusians had out of gratitude bestowed upon him the best house in the city, and another very magnificent and pleasant one in the country, whither he retired with his wife and children, whom he had sent for from Corinth. In this retirement he passed the remainder of his life, enjoying the satisfaction of seeing so many cities, and such numbers of people, indebted to him for their happiness. He was tried in his old age with a very sensible affliction, which was the loss of his sight. In this condition the Syracusians gave him great instances of their gratitude, paying him frequent visits, and carrying all strangers of distinction to visit their benefactor and deliverer. When they had any important affair to be examined in the assembly of the people, they never failed to invite him thither, and religiously to follow his advice. He generally came in a chariot, and was attended from the gates of the city to the place of the assembly by the whole city, and reconducted in the same manner beyond the gates with loud shouts and acclamations. He lived in this retirement eight years, and was after his death honoured as a god. He was buried with great Timoleon pomp and magnificence, the people of Syracuse having decreed, dies. that two hundred minas should be laid out on that occasion; but the tears that were shed, and the blessings uttered, by every body in honour of his memory, were the chief ornament of his funeral. It was also enacted by a special decree, that annually, on the day of his death, public sports should be celebrated with horse-races and gymnastic games; and that whenever the people of Syracuse should be engaged in a war with the Barbarians, they should send to Corinth for a general<sup>r</sup>.

THE Syracusians enjoyed for the space of twenty years the fruits of Timoleon's victories. But it was impossible that a nation, which neither knew how to govern, nor how to obey, should be long free from tumults and sedition. Great disturbances daily arising, the citizens were again involved in the same calamities, from The pa- which Timoleon had with so much trouble delivered them. A new rents of tyrant started up among them, who exceeded all those who Agatho- had gone before him in cruelty and all other vices. This was cles. Agathocles, of whose birth and parentage Diodorus gives us the following account. He was the son of one Carfinus, who, being banished from Rhegium his native city, settled at Thermae in Sicily, at that time subject to the Carthaginians. There he married a woman of the place, who being troubled with strange dreams, while she was with child of Agathocles, imparted them to some Carthaginians who were going to Delphos, desiring them to consult the oracle in her name about the child she was big with. The Carthaginians complied with her request and the oracle returned this answer, that the child would bring dreadful calamities upon the Carthaginians and all Sicily. The father, terrified with this prediction, exposed the child, as soon as it was born, in the open fields, charging one of his friends to watch it till it died. As the infant continued several days alive, the person placed there to guard it grew weary and retired home ; which the mother having notice of, immediately repaired to the place, and carrying the child to the house of her brother Heraclides, entrusted it with him, calling it after her father's name Agathocles. When he was seven years old, Carfinus was invited by Heraclides to a solemn feast and sacrifice, and on that occasion seeing Agathocles, he was greatly taken with his beauty, for he is said to have been one of the handsomest men of his age. His wife, laying hold of that opportunity to put him in mind of his son, told him, that the child he had exposed would have proved as fine a child as that he so much admired, had he not been so barbarously murdered. At these words the father burst out in tears, and said that he heartily repented what he had done. Hereupon the mother ventured to discover to him the truth of the whole matter ; whereat he was greatly overjoyed ; but soon after, out of fear of the Carthaginians, removed with all his family to Syracuse, where, as he was by trade a potter, he brought up his son to the same business. After Timoleon had routed the Carthaginians on the banks of the Cremissius, he promised to make all those who should join him free of Syracuse ; and on this occasion it was Carfinus and his son Agathocles were inrolled among the Syracusan citizens. Carfinus died soon after ; but Agathocles being recommended by his beauty to one Demas, a rich, but voluptuous and lewd, nobleman of Syracuse, he was plentifully supplied by him with money and whatever else he had occasion for. Demas was soon after created general of the Agrigentines, when he did not forget his favourite, but advanced him to the dignity of a chiliarch, that is, gave him the command of a thousand men. He had some time before served as a common soldier, and was even then very remarkable for his dexterity in performing the military evolutions, and the great strength of his body, wearing in the military exercises such heavy armour as no other man in the whole army could bear. After he was raised to the post of a chiliarch, he distinguished himself on all occasions above the other commanders, being quite void of fear, and as ready to expose his own life to the greatest dangers, as the lives of those he commanded. In the meantime Demas dying, and leaving his whole estate to his wife, Agathocles married her, and by that means became at once the most wealthy citizen in Syracuse.

HE was not suffered long to enjoy his good fortune in Syracuse, being driven from thence by Sosistratus, who, having usurped the supreme power and made himself absolute master of Syracuse, banished all those who gave him any umbrage. Agathocles retired to Italy, where he had acquired great reputation in the war which the Crotonians had waged with the Brutians. He settled at Crotona, where he was kindly entertained; but forgetting the favours shewn him by the Crotonians, he attempted to make himself lord of their city, and was on that account obliged to save himself by flight from the fury of the incensed multitude. From Crotona he withdrew to Tarentum, but was soon driven from that city too, being there convicted of the like practices. After this no city would receive him; whereupon, having got together a band of exiles and robbers, he plundered the country and lived upon rapine. In the mean time Sosistratus having crossed over into Italy and laid siege to Rhegium, Agathocles attacked him unexpectedly, forced his camp, and obliged him to embark his men and drop that enterprize. Sosistratus soon after this unsuccessful expedition was forced to abdicate the sovereignty and quit Syracuse. With him were driven out above six hundred of the chief citizens, who were suspected by the populace to have formed a design of abolishing the democracy, and introducing in its room oligarchy. Sosistratus and the exiles had recourse to the Carthaginians, who readily espoused their cause. Hereupon the Syracusians recalling Agathocles, appointed him commander in chief of their forces, which trust he discharged with more valour than integrity; for having defeated the united forces of Sosistratus and the Carthaginians, on which occasion he received seven wounds, he began to exercise a sovereign power over his fellow citizens, and take such measures as plainly shewed that he aspired to the monarchy. Wherefore the Syracusians, not daring to trust any of their own citizens, had recourse anew to the Corinthians, who sent them one Acestorides to take upon him the command of their forces. Acestorides was no sooner vested with this power, but he formed a design of dispatching Agathocles, being sensible that Syracuse could never enjoy a perfect tranquillity so long as Agathocles was alive. But, as he was afraid his death might occasion some disturbance in the city, he commanded him to retire from Syracuse in the close of the evening, and placed on all the roads soldiers with private orders to put him to death in the night and bury his body. But Agathocles, suspecting some treachery, chose a young man who resembled him both in stature and features, and, having privately delivered to him his horse, arms, and garment, sent him before, enjoining enjoining him to keep the public road. He was scarce out of the gates, when the guards, mistaking him for Agathocles, killed him, and buried the body; nor were they undeceived till news was brought some time after, that Agathocles, who had escaped by private ways, was raising troops in the heart of Sicily. The Syracusians were not a little alarmed, when they heard, that he was not only alive, but had already got together a considerable army, and was preparing to come against the city. They therefore sent ambassadors to him, and to avoid the evils of a civil war offered to recall him home, provided he disbanded his forces. Agathocles agreed to the proposal, and on his return being conducted by the citizens to the temple of Ceres, he swore there, according to custom, in the most solemn manner, that he would do nothing to the prejudice of the democracy<sup>c</sup>.

The cruelties of Agathocles in Syracuse.

NOTWITHSTANDING the solemn oath he had taken, he no sooner saw himself restored to his country and estate, but he began to court the favour of the populace, and espouse their cause against the senate, which consisted of six hundred of the chief citizens, with no other view but to sow divisions and raise new disturbances, by means of which he hoped to have an opportunity of overturning the government, and making himself master of the city. He pretended to protect the people against the oppressions and over-grown power of the senate, and was, on that account, in spite of the senate, created commander in chief of the forces, which were then raising to be sent against the city of Erbita, which had revolted from Syracuse. Agathocles, seeing himself again at the head of an army, resolved to get rid of all those who were in a condition to thwart his designs. Having therefore appointed his troops to meet him early in the morning, at a place near Syracuse called Timoleontium, he there told them, that before they employed their arms against the inhabitants of Erbita, they must clear Syracuse of the six hundred tyrants, who were far more dangerous enemies than either the inhabitants of Erbita, or the Carthaginians themselves; that Syracuse could never enjoy a perfect tranquility so long as one of them was left alive; that it was not enough to dispatch the tyrants, unless at the same time all those who sided with them underwent the same fate. This was encouraging his soldiers, who were, for the most part, the scum of the populace, to murder the whole body of the nobility at once. For their further encouragement, he gave them leave to plunder the houses, and seize on all the wealth of those they should put to death. When he had ended his speech, the soldiery shewed an eager desire to be led against the tyrants, as they called them, and to deliver Syracuse from the oppressions it groaned under. Agathocles then entering the city, commanded the trumpets to sound the charge; whereupon the soldiers, falling upon all those they met with, murdered them without distinction of rank, sex, or age, plundered their houses, and committed all sorts of cruelties. In a few hours four thousand and upwards were killed, and the streets covered with dead bodies. But this was not enough for Agathocles; his design was not only to dispatch the nobles, but to leave few of the other citizens alive to oppose him. Wherefore, when the slaughter was once begun, he encouraged his men to pursue the bloody massacre, giving them free liberty to plunder, ravish, murder, and commit what enormities they pleased for two whole days and nights. The third day he summoned an assembly of the few who had outlived the general slaughter, and told them, that for the violent distemper, with which the state had been long affected, he had been obliged to administer a no less violent remedy; that he had nothing else in view but to restore the democracy, and rescue the city from the cruel oppressions of a few tyrannical magistrates, and that for the future he would lead a private life free from further cares and toils. This he did to have the crown placed upon his head, as it were by force; for he knew, that he had left none alive fit to govern; and, on the other side, was well assured, that those who had assisted him in spoiling and murdering their fellow-citizens, would never suffer him to resign his authority, having no hopes of impunity but in vesting him with the supreme power, at whose instigation they had committed so many enormities. He therefore had no sooner ended his speech, but they all, with one voice, proclaimed him king, and decreed, that he should thenceforth govern with an absolute and uncontrolled power <sup>Agathocles proclaimed king.</sup>.

BEING thus raised to the throne, the first law he enacted was, that all former debts should be made void, and the lands equally divided among the rich and the poor. By this unjust decree he gained the affection of the common people, and so weakened the opposite party, that the very few nobles, who had outlived the general slaughter, were now upon a level with the meanest of the people. Agathocles, having thus triumphed over all his enemies, began to change his behaviour, and treat his subjects with a great deal of humanity and moderation, allowing every one to come freely into his presence, and hearing patiently their complaints, which, when it lay in his power, he never failed to redress. He likewise published several wholesome laws, seeking by all means to gain the love of his subjects, that he might be able to turn his arms against the other cities of Sicily, having a design to make himself master of the whole island. His subjects seemed disposed to second his ambitious views, which encouraged him to make war first on the neighbouring states, and afterwards to carry his arms into the very heart of the island, which in the space of two years he brought intirely under subjection, except a few cities that were held by the Carthaginians <sup>w</sup>.

WHEN news was brought to Carthage of the progress Agathocles made in Sicily, Hamilcar was immediately dispatched with a numerous fleet and a mighty army to put a stop to his conquests. The fleet was dispersed by a violent storm, in which Hamilcar lost sixty ships of war and two hundred transports, with a great number of men. However, being joined on his arrival by such of the Sicilians as hated Agathocles, his army was in a few days increased to the number of forty thousand foot and five thousand horse. With these he took the field, and encamped near the city of Himera, where Agathocles attacked him, and with incredible bravery forced his trenches, and cut most of his forces in pieces. But while the Syracusians were busy in plundering the camp, a powerful supply arrived unexpectedly from Carthage, which revived the courage of those who had fled to such a degree, that they returned to the charge, and, finding the Syracusians in disorder, attacked them in front, while the new supplies fell on their rear. Thus was the fortune of the day changed, and Agathocles, who thought himself sure of the victory, obliged to save himself first in Gela, and afterwards within the walls of his metropolis. Thither the Carthaginians pursued him, and laid close siege to that important place, which, if they could have taken it, would have put them in possession of the whole island.

Agathocles, being reduced to such straits, and abandoned by all his allies in Sicily, from their abhorrence of his enormous cruelties, formed a design of so bold, and, in appearance, so impracticable a nature, that nothing but the success with which it was attended, could justify the undertaking of it. This design was to transfer the war into Africa, and besiege Carthage, at a time when he himself was besieged in his metropolis, which was the only city left him in Sicily. He communicated his design to no person whatsoever, but only told the Syracusians in general terms, that he had found out an infallible way of freeing them from the impending calamities, and repairing all the losses they had sustained to that day. He then chose the most daring and intrepid among the soldiers and citizens of Syracuse, ordering the foot to be ready with their arms at the first call, and the horsemen to carry each along with him, besides his arms, a saddle and a bridle. He set at liberty all the slaves, who were able to bear arms, and incorporated them among his troops. Having embarked all his forces, he appointed his brother Antandrus governor of Syracuse, with forces and provisions sufficient to hold out a long siege, and taking with him his two sons Archagathus and Heracleides; he went last on board himself. His fleet consisted of sixty galleys, but the Carthaginian squadron, far more numerous than his, blocked up the mouth of the harbour, so that he was obliged to wait for some favourable opportunity to set sail. After he had attended a long time, and was ready to drop his design, a large fleet of transports appeared laden with corn and other provisions for Syracuse. To intercept these the Carthaginians put to sea, and Agathocles no sooner saw the mouth of the harbour open, but he likewise hoisted sail. The Carthaginians at first imagined, that the enemy's fleet was sent to defend the transports, and therefore tacking about prepared to engage. But Agathocles continued his course towards Africa, being closely pursued by the Carthaginians, till, night coming on, they lost sight of him. In the mean time the transports, unexpectedly escaping the danger, plentifully supplied the city with corn, and all other provisions. The Carthaginian admiral, finding that, by pursuing two fleets at once, he had missed them both, and that Agathocles did not return, resolved to pursue him close, and to prevent him from kindling the war in some other place. Having therefore sailed six days and six nights, steering his course towards Africa, he at last came up with the Syracusan fleet, and engaged them. But as his men were quite tired out with rowing, the Syracusians gained the victory, and, having dispersed the enemy's fleet, landed safe on the coast of Africa, at a place called the Quarries *.

Agathocles, having thus landed his men in the heart of the enemies country, assembled his troops, and acquainted them in a few words with his design, and the motives which had prompted him to it; he told them, that the only way to divert the enemy from the siege of Syracuse, and drive them quite out of Sicily, was, to carry the war into their own country;

that he led men inured to the hardships of war against an enemy softened and enervated by ease and luxury; that the natives of the country, who hated the Carthaginians, by whom they were treated rather like slaves than allies, would join them on the first news of their arrival; that the boldness of the attempt would strike the Carthaginians with terror, who were altogether unprepared to engage an enemy at the very gates of their metropolis; finally, that from no other enterprize they could reap more advantage and glory than from this, which would put them in possession of the whole wealth of Carthage, and transmit their names and fame to the latest posterity. The soldiers fancied themselves already masters of Africa, and applauded this speech with loud shouts of joy and acclamations. Agathocles, finding his soldiers so well disposed, resolved to set fire to his fleet, and burn all his ships except one or two for the carrying of dispatches. Many reasons determined him to so bold, or, as our historian calls it, so desperate, an action. He had not one good harbour in Africa where his ships could lie with safety; wherefore as the Carthaginians were masters at sea, they would not fail to possess themselves of his whole fleet, which was no ways in a condition to cope with theirs. As he had but a small army, if he divided it, leaving troops sufficient to defend the ships, he would not be strong enough to encounter the enemy, and thereby be deprived of all the advantages of this unexpected diversion. But what chiefly inspired him with this resolution was, that, the fleet being once destroyed, his men would be under a necessity of conquering, having no other hopes of safety remaining, save only in victory. Having therefore gained over before-hand such of the officers as were entirely at his devotion, he assembled the soldiery, and appeared among them in his royal robes with a crown on his head, as if he were going to perform some religious ceremony. Then addressing himself to the assembly, he told them, that when they left Syracuse, and were warmly pursued by the enemy, in that fatal danger he applied himself to Ceres and Proserpine, the tutelar goddesses of Sicily, and promised to burn all the vessels of the fleet in their honour, if they delivered them from the enemy, and helped them to land safe in Africa. Aid me therefore, O fellow-soldiers, said he, to discharge this vow, for the goddesses can easily make us amends for this sacrifice. Having uttered these words, he took a torch in his hand and led the way, flying on board his own ship, and setting it on fire. All the officers did the like, and were chearfully followed by the soldiers. The trumpets sounded from every quarter, and the whole shore echoed with joyful shouts and loud acclamations.

mations. The soldiers had not been allowed time to reflect on what they were doing, being hurried on by a blind and impetuous ardor ; but when they had leisure to weigh every particular, and were apprised of the danger they were in, being separated from their own country, by the vast ocean, and in the midst of the enemy's, without the least hopes or means of escaping, a sad and melancholy silence succeeded that transport of joy and those acclamations, which, but a moment before, had been so general in the army <sup>1</sup>.

HERE again Agathocles left no time for reflection, but to raise again the drooping spirits of his soldiers, he led them against an important place called the Great City, which was subject to Carthage. The country through which they marched offered the most agreeable prospect imaginable. On either side was spacious meadows, covered with flocks of all kinds of cattle, country-houses, built with extraordinary magnificence, delightful avenues, planted with all sorts of fruit-trees, delicious gardens, of a prodigious extent, and kept with all possible care and elegance, &c. This prospect reanimated the soldiers, who were again willing to run any danger in hopes of obtaining so pleasant and wealthy a country as a reward of their toils and labour. They marched full of courage to the Great City, took it by storm, and enriched themselves with the plunder, which was entirely abandoned to them. Thence they advanced to Tunis, which they likewise took sword in hand and plundered. The soldiers were for garrisoning these two cities, that they might have some place to retire to in case of any misfortune ; but Agathocles, that they might have no hopes of safety but in victory, caused them both to be levelled with the ground, and encamped in the open fields <sup>2</sup>.

IN the mean time the news of this unexpected descent, reaching Carthage, threw the whole city into the utmost terror and confusion. They all concluded, that their army before Syracuse was entirely cut off and their fleet lost. The people hastened with trembling hearts to the market-place, while the senate assembled in a tumultuous manner to deliberate how they might save the city, which the victorious enemy was with long marches advancing to besiege. They had no army in readiness to make head against the enemy, and their present danger did not allow them to wait till forces were levied among their allies. It was therefore resolved after long debates, that the citizens should be armed ; and accordingly in a few days they had on foot an army of forty thousand foot and a thousand horse, with 200 armed chariots. They appointed Hanno and Bomilcar to command the forces, notwithstanding the antient grudges that still subsisted between their families, hoping, that they would strive to outvie one another in the defence of their common country, and by that means turn their private quarrels to the public advantage. The generals immediately took the field, and, possessing themselves of an eminence not far from the enemy, drew up their troops in battle array. Agathocles had only fourteen thousand men, and was therefore not a little surprized when he saw so numerous an army ready to engage him. However, he dissembled his fear, and in order to encourage his men, who were quite dispirited and under great apprehensions of the enemies horse and chariots; he let out several owls, which he had before prepared for that purpose. These, flying about the camp and lighting on the soldiers shields, so raised their spirits, that of their own accord they began to advance against the enemy, not doubting but by the assistance of Minerva, to whom that bird was sacred, and therefore looked upon by all the Greeks as a good omen, they should gain a complete victory. Agathocles willingly seconded their ardor, and putting himself at their head charged the Carthaginians with incredible vigour. Hanno with the sacred cohort, which consisted of the flower of the troops, sustained a long time the fury of the Greeks, and even put them in disorder, but being overwhelmed with showers of darts, and covered with wounds, he fell fighting bravely to the last. Bomilcar, understanding that his rival was slain, looked upon this as a favourable opportunity of possessing himself of the sovereignty, to which he had long aspired. But, as he was sensible that he could not accomplish his design, if the army of Agathocles were destroyed. but might easily put it in execution if the enemy conquered, he resolved to retire with the forces under his command, not doubting but he should be able to get the better of Agathocles whenever he pleased. Accordingly acquainting his men with Hanno's death, he ordered them to keep their ranks, and retire in good order to a neighbouring hill, as the only means to escape the fury of the victorious enemy. But as their retreat looked like a flight, the Greeks pursued them so close, that they put them in disorder, and gained a complete victory. The sacred cohort fought with great bravery, even after the death of Hanno, and courageously advanced over the dead bodies of their fellow soldiers, till they saw themselves abandoned by the whole army, and in danger of being surrounded by the enemy. They then retired in good order, and gained an eminence, where they halted, and anew made head against those who pursued them ; but, not being supported by Bomilcar they were either cut off, or forced to save themselves by flight, after having distinguished themselves in a very eminent manner. Two hundred Greeks were slain in this battle, and a thousand, or according to some six thousand, Carthaginians ; so that the slaughter on neither side was considerable. Agathocles, after having pursued the enemy some time, returned and allowed his soldiers to plunder the Carthaginian camp, where they found twenty thousand pair of fetters and manacles, which the enemy had provided, not doubting but they should take many prisoners <sup>a</sup>.

THE Carthaginians, now giving all up for lost, dispatched messenger after messenger to Hamilcar in Sicily, with the news of what happened in Africa, and express orders to hasten over to the relief of his country. When the messengers arrived, Hamilcar commanded them not once to mention the victory of Agathocles ; but on the contrary to noise it abroad in the camp, that he had been entirely defeated, his forces all cut off, and his fleet taken by the Carthaginians. The senate of Carthage had sent to Hamilcar by the messengers all the beaks of the Syracusan ships, that this report might more easily gain credit, for it was by their orders that he had caused it to be spread abroad. Hamilcar therefore immediately dispatched ambassadors to Syracuse with the beaks of the ships, summoning the governor and citizens to deliver up the city, since their army and fleet in Africa were utterly destroyed. This sad news was commonly believed, and the whole city thrown into the utmost confusion. But the leading men, to prevent the mischiefs that might attend so general a consternation, not only dismissed the messengers without any answer, but drove out eight thousand of their citizens, who seemed inclined to capitulate with the enemy. Hamilcar entertained the exiles with great kindness, and understanding from them the miserable condition the city was in, he resolved to assault it on all quarters at once, but first sent new deputies, promising to spare Antandrus and all those who sided with him, if he delivered the city up into his hands. Hereupon a council of war was summoned, when Antandrus, who was very unlike his brother, was for capitulating : But Eurymnon the Ætolian, whom Agathocles had left to assist his brother with his advice, prevailed upon him and the rest to hold out, till they had certain intelligence of the truth. The assembly was scarce dismissed, when a galley with thirty oars arrived from Africa, and brought the agreeable news of Agathocles's victory, which immediately flew through the city, and restored life and resolution to the inhabitants. Hamilcar made a last effort to storm the city, but being repulsed with loss, he raised the siege, and sent five thousand men to the relief of his distressed country. All his forces he thought it needless to send, and still entertained hopes of obliging Agathocles to quit Africa, and return to the defence of his own kingdom. He spent some time in reducing such cities as sided with the Syracusians, and, after having brought all their allies under subjection, he returned again to Syracuse, hoping to surprize the city by attacking it in the night. But the Syracusians, having timely notice of his design, made a sally unexpectedly, routed his army, which was an hundred and twenty thousand men strong, and took Hamilcar himself prisoner. We are told, that Hamilcar dreamt the night before that he should sup the next day in Syracuse: his dream proved true, but the entertainment he met with was not much to his satisfaction; for those, whose parents and relations he had barbarously murdered, led him in chains about all the streets of the city, and after having vented their rage on their miserable captive by all sorts of torments, struck off his head and sent it into Africa, a welcome present to Agathocles, who, advancing to the enemy's camp, and shewing them the head of their general, struck them with such terror, that their commanders, with the utmost difficulty, kept them from abandoning the camp and returning to Carthage <sup>b</sup>.

Agathocles had already reduced all the cities subject to the Carthaginians, and was preparing to besiege Carthage itself. But, before he ventured upon so difficult and hazardous an enterprize, he sent ambassadors to all the princes of Africa, inviting them to join in the common cause, and lend him their assistance in overturning that imperious republic, which, with so much haughtiness, lorded it over them. His chief design was to gain over Ophellas prince of the Cyreneans, who had been one of Alexander's captains, and at that time had on foot an army of ten thousand regular troops, and was contriving how he might enlarge his dominions. The ambassadors sent to him were charged to flatter his ambition, by promising him, in their master's name, the sovereignty of all Africa, which Agathocles had invaded with no other view but to oblige the Carthaginians to quit Sicily. Ophellas allured by this promise set out at the head of twenty thousand men, and after two months march, mostly through sandy deserts, joined <sup>a</sup>t last Agathocles. As that prince did not scruple to commit the most enormous crimes to promote his interest, Ophellas had no sooner put himself and his army in his power, than by the blackest perfidy he caused him to be murdered, and by fair words and large promises prevailed upon his army, now destitute of a leader, to serve under him, and be entirely at his devotion. Such of the Cyreneans as he found unfit to bear arms, for many of them had brought along with them their wives and children, he put on board some transports and sent them to Syracuse, where few of them arrived, most of the ships being cast away near the Pithecusian islands. Agathocles seeing himself now at the head of a numerous army assumed the title of king of Africa, and as Carthage was the only city which still held out, he invested it on all sides, with a design to reduce it by famine &c.

WHILE he was lying before Carthage, news was brought him, that, after the defeat of the Carthaginians in Sicily and death of Hamilcar, most of the cities, whether subject to the Carthaginians or Syracusians, had taken up arms, and entered into an association in defence of their liberties. As his affairs in Africa were in a very flourishing condition, he thought he might safely return for a while into Sicily. Having therefore built some open vessels with fifty oars apiece, and put two thousand men on board, he set sail for Sicily, leaving his son Archagathus commander in chief of his African army. The fame of his victories flew before him, and the news of his arrival struck the confederates with such terror, that many cities submitted of their own accord; others were reduced by dint of arms, and in a short time the whole island, except some few cities subject to the Carthaginians, acknowledged the sovereignty of Agathocles. Having thus settled affairs in Sicily, he returned to Africa, where he found the face of things quite changed by his absence. His son Archagathus had lost a battle, and his army was ready to revolt for want of provisions; the Carthaginians had recovered their courage, and were encamped in an advantageous post, whence it was no easy matter to dislodge them; all the avenues to the enemy's camp were guarded by strong detachments, and no pass was left open for the conveying of provisions to Agathocles's army, which was already in the utmost distress. In this critical juncture Agathocles attacked the enemy's camp, but was repulsed with the loss of three thousand men. After this unsuccessful attempt, all the Africans in his army deserted him. Whereupon, not having a sufficient force to contend with the Carthaginians, he resolved to leave Africa. But as he could not possibly transport his army, both for want of ships and because the Carthaginians were masters at sea, he determined to slip away privately, taking along with him only a few of his friends and his younger son Heraclides; for as Archagathus was a daring young man, he had always entertained some jealousy of him. But Archagathus, being apprised of his design, discovered it to the officers and commanders of the army, and these to the soldiery, who, immediately running to their arms, seized on Agathocles and committed him to custody. The army being now without a head, there was nothing in the camp but tumult and confusion. The ensuing night a report being spread, that the enemy was advancing to attack them, they were all seized with a panic fear, and having none to command them, every one was preparing to save himself by flight, though they knew not whither to fly. In this confusion Agathocles with a small attendance stole away, and embarking on board a small vessel put to sea, leaving his children to the wild fury of the disappointed soldiers, who immediately putting his two sons to death, chose leaders from among themselves, and concluded a peace with the Carthaginians, upon the following terms: That the Greeks should deliver up all the places they held in Africa, receiving for them three hundred talents; that such of them as were willing to serve under the Carthaginians should be kindly treated and receive the usual pay; that the rest should be transported to Sicily, and have the city of Selinus for their habitation. These articles were agreed to and punctually observed by the Carthaginians. Our historian observes, that Agathocles lost both his army and his children the same month, and the same day of the month, on which he treacherously murdered Ophellas and brought over to himself his army<sup>d</sup>.

Agathocles was no sooner landed in Sicily, but sending for part of his forces he marched against the Egestines, who had revolted in his absence, and having taken the town by storm, he put all the inhabitants to death, without distinction of sex or age. The nobles he caused to be first tortured with the most exquisite torments rage or malice could invent. When news was brought him of the death of his children in Africa, he ordered his brother Antandrus, governor of Syracuse, to put all those to death who were any ways related to such of the Syracusians as had attended him in the Carthaginian expedition. His orders were put in execution with such cruelty, that the sea was dyed a great way with blood. Such an inhuman butchery had never before been heard of even in Sicily, all those who were related to any of the African army, from the great grand-father to the sucking child, being barbarously murdered by the tyrant's orders<sup>e</sup>.

THIS inhuman cruelty raised him many enemies, who joining Dinocrates, whom the tyrant had banished, reduced him to such straits, that he was fain to court the friendship of the Carthaginians, and purchase a peace with them at a very dear rate, for he restored to them all the cities which they had formerly possessed in Sicily. He even sent ambassadors to Dinocrates, offering to resign the sovereignty, provided two strong holds, which he named, were left in his hands for the greater security of his person. These proposals were rejected by Dinocrates, who aspired himself to the supreme power, and had then under his command above twenty thousand foot and three thousand horse, which he must have disbanded, and submitted to the democracy, if Agathocles had abdicated the tyranny. Agathocles, finding he could not upon any terms obtain a peace, resolved to put all to the issue of a battle, and attacking Dinocrates in his camp put him to flight, and gained a complete victory with five thousand foot only, and eight hundred horse. The remains of the shattered army retired to a neighbouring eminence, whence they sent deputies to capitulate with the conqueror, who promised to spare their lives, provided they delivered up their arms. But they were no sooner disarmed, than the tyrant caused them to be hemmed in, and all to a man put to the sword. As for Dinocrates, who was a man of the same stamp with himself, he received him into his friendship, and ever after entrusted him with his most weighty affairs. After this victory, Agathocles in two years time brought the whole island under subjection, save those cities only, which by the late treaty he had restored to the Carthaginians<sup>f</sup>.

Agathocles, having nothing more to do in Sicily, passed over into Italy, where he subdued the Brutii, rather by the terror of his name, than by force of arms. From Italy he passed over to the Lipari islands, and obliged the inhabitants, who lived in perfect peace and security, to pay him an hundred talents of gold. After he had received this sum, which was all they had, he plundered the sacred treasure, stripp'd the temples, and then set sail for Syracuse, with eleven ships laden with the gold and spoils of the temples. But, a violent storm arising, all the vessels were cast away, except one galley, on which he himself escaped to suffer a more miserable end. He was poisoned by one Mænon, whom he had unnaturally abused, at the instigation of his grandson Archagathus. It was the tyrant's custom always after his meals to pick his teeth with a quill, which Mænon having dipp'd in poison, his teeth and gums putrified, and his whole body was tortured with most racking pains, in the height of which he was hurried away to the funeral pile and burnt, while he was still alive, in the twenty-eighth year of his reign and ninety-fifth of his age. He was a man of great boldness and resolution, but of a most cruel and savage temper; for he is said to have put more persons to death in the three last years of his life, than all the tyrants before him during the whole time of their respective reigns. He never forgot his mean extraction, but rather gloried in the contemptible calling of a potter, which he had followed in his youth, saying, that it set off with more lustre the high station to which his own valour had advanced him; nay, even in public entertainments, while his guests were served in gold and silver plate, he used to eat in earthen ware, saying, that though he wore a diadem, yet he was still a potter (M). From the meanness of his condition Polybius endeavours to prove his capacity and talents, in opposition to Timæus, who tells us, that his rise was entirely owing to fortune, and not to any parts of his own. Scipio Africanus agrees with Polybius; for that illustrious Roman being asked, who, in his opinion, were the most prudent in the conduct of their affairs, and most judiciously bold in the execution of their designs, answered, Agathocles and Dionysius the elder<sup>s</sup>. The descent of Agathocles into Africa prompted Scipio to make the same attempt, wherefore in his answer to Fabius, who did not approve of his design, he did not forget to mention Agathocles as an instance in favour of his enterprize, and to shew, that frequently there is no other way to get rid of an enemy, but by carrying the war into his country. But how great soever Agathocles's parts may have been, they were far exceeded by his cruelties, which have rendered his memory execrable, and obscured the glory of his greatest conquests.

IT was after the death of Agathocles, that the Mamertini Messana treacherously seized on Messana, and by degrees possessed seized by themselves of a considerable part of the island. According the Ma- to the Latin writers the Mamertini were originally Campani, mertini. and assumed the name of Mamertini, that is, invincible warriors, from the word Mamers or Mavors, signifying Mars the god of war. As they were a bold and resolute nation, they were invited into Sicily by Agathocles to assist him in his conquests. But being disbanded after his death they retired to Messana, with a design to return into their own country. The inhabitants of Messana admitted them into the city, and entertained them with great kindness, which was ill requited by them; for being charmed with an habitation, which greatly resembled their native country, they resolved to settle there, seize on the city, and form themselves into a republic. Accordingly they fell unexpectedly upon the antient inhabitants, put all the men to the sword, and married their wives and daughters. Being masters of the city, they not only maintained themselves in their usurpation, but reduced most of the neighbouring states, and extended their dominions to the middle of the island. Sicily was at that time a prey to numberless tyrants, and the Mamertini were powerfully assisted by the inhabitants of Rhegium, where a Roman legion had settled, by following their example in murdering the citizens who had called them to their assistance.

BUT to return to Syracuse; that unfortunate city un- The dis- derwent many revolutions after the death of Agathocles. tracted Mænon, who had poisoned him, usurped the supreme autho- state of rity, but being driven out by Hycetas he had recourse to the Syracuse. Carthaginians, which gave rise to a new war, wherein Hycetas having gained several victories over the joint forces of Mænon and the Carthaginians, he at last seized on that authority of which he had deprived his rival, and governed Syracuse with an absolute sway, though he declined the title of king, contenting himself with that of prætor. In the ninth year of his command, the Agrigentines having revolted, he left Syracuse and marched out against Phintias, who was at the head of the rebels and Syracusan exiles. In his absence one Tænon possessed himself of the sovereign power, but being being opposed by Sosistrates, who had the same aim, a civil war broke out within the very walls of the city; Tænion held the island, and his rival the other quarters of the city. In the mean time the Carthaginians, taking advantage of these divisions, reduced most of the cities subject to Syracuse, and invested that capital itself with a mighty fleet, and an army of fifty thousand men. A regard therefore to common good united the two competitors Tænion and Sosistrates. They were tired of a war, which could only end in their common ruin, and therefore joined together in inviting Pyrrhus king of Epirus to put an end to the troubles, which threatened the state with utter destruction. Many reasons prompted them to have recourse to Pyrrhus, rather than to any other of the many sovereigns, who reigned at that time in Europe and Asia. Pyrrhus had married Lanessa the daughter of Agathocles, and had by her a son, whom the Syracusians thought it reasonable to place on the throne of his grandfather, since they could not by any other means rid themselves of their domestic tyrants. Besides, he had already given signal proofs of his courage, and therefore seemed the best qualified of any to make head against the Carthaginians, and stop the great progress they were making towards the reduction of the whole island. The Leontines and Agrigentines joined with Tænion and Sosistrates in pressing the king of Epirus to come and take upon him the defence of their respective states, offering to deliver up the cities into his hands. Pyrrhus, who wanted but an honourable pretence to withdraw from Italy, where he was engaged in a war with the Romans, willingly complied with the request of the Sicilians, and, leaving a strong garrison in Tarentum, embarked for Sicily, where he landed among the acclamations of a numberless multitude, which on the news of his approach had flocked to see him. Tænion and Sosistrates immediately put him in possession of the city, the fleet, and public treasure. All the cities on that coast followed the example of Syracuse, the name of Pyrrhus resounding every where, as if victory had landed with him. His insinuating and affable behaviour at first arrival gained him the hearts of all the Sicilians; and as he had an army of thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse, with a fleet of two hundred sail, he drove the Carthaginians from place to place, till he divested them of all their acquisitions in the island, except the two important places of Eryx and Lilybæum. The former he took by assault, and was himself the first man who mounted the wall, after having killed a great many of the Africans with his own hand. The Mamertini likewise felt the effects of his courage, being defeated by him in a pitched battle, driven from all the places they possessed, and shut up within the walls of Messana. The Carthaginians, alarmed at the rapidity of his conquests, sent ambassadors to treat of a peace with him upon very advantageous terms; but he, puffed up with his great success, answered them, that the only means to obtain what they desired was, to abandon Sicily, and let the Libyan sea be the boundary between Carthage and Greece. He depended so much on the reduction of the whole island, that he stiled his son by the daughter of Agathocles king of Sicily, and caused him to be acknowledged as such by the Syracusians and their confederates. Having thus put his son in possession of the kingdom of Sicily, he began to entertain thoughts of sailing over into Africa, and making war on the Carthaginians in their own territories, though they were still masters of Lilybæum, which was a key to the whole island. This design was no-ways agreeable to the Sicilians, who were sensible, that they could not enjoy a perfect tranquillity, so long as the Carthaginians had any footing in the island. Besides, Messana was still in the hands of the Mamertini, who, as they were a warlike people, would not fail to take advantage of the king's absence and raise new disturbances. They therefore did all that lay in their power to dissuade him from his African expedition. But, notwithstanding their remonstrances, he persisted in his new resolution, and began to make the necessary preparations for the conquest of Africa, which he hoped to subdue with as little trouble as he had done Sicily <sup>h</sup>.

Pyrrhus had ships enough of his own for this expedition, He dis- but, as he wanted seamen, he obliged the maritime cities in bliges the his interest to furnish him with sailors and mariners, and even Sicilians forced into the service persons of rank, who had any experience in maritime affairs. The cities complained of this violence, but he had no regard to their complaints. However, the Sicilians bore these outrages with patience, as they carried some appearance of zeal for the public welfare. But the king, who could bear no contradiction, taking offence at their opposing his new scheme, began to treat them more like an arbitrary tyrant, than a prince who was come to deliver them from the oppressions they groaned under; which soon drew upon him the hatred of the whole nation. In defiance of the customs of the country, he conferred the first dignities and the governments of the cities on foreigners, and continued them in their employments as long as he thought proper, without any regard to the time prescribed by law. As to judicial proceedings with respect to private property and other affairs of that-nature, he either decided them by his own arbitrary sentence, or left them to the determination of his courtiers, whose sole views were to enrich themselves. A conduct so different from that, by which he had at first succeeded so well in all his enterprizes, could not but estrange the minds of the people from him; and when he plainly saw that he was universally hated, and that the Sicilians, not able to brook his arbitrary government, were contriving how to shake off the yoke, he placed in most of the cities such garisons as he knew to be entirely at his devotion, under pretence, that the Carthaginians were preparing to renew the war. He likewise seized the most powerful and illustrious citizens of each city, and, charging them with treasonable practices, either put them to death, or banished them the island. Full of jealousy, as all tyrants are, he would have forced Sosistrates to attend him into Africa, not thinking it safe to leave him in Syracuse, during his absence. But Sosistrates, to avoid complying with his commands, revolted from him and retired from his native city. As for Tænion, he was more complaisant and continued with the king; but, while he believed himself one of his chief favourites, he was by his order cruelly assassinated. Tænion had crowned him king of Syracuse on his first landing, and contributed more than any other person to the reduction of Sicily; but all the important services he had rendered the king were not sufficient to exempt him from the cruel effects of his jealousy. Such tyrannical proceedings put an end to the success of Pyrrhus in Sicily. The aversion, which the cities conceived against him, was so great, that some of them entered into a league with the Carthaginians, and others with the Mamertines his avowed enemies. His troops were soon reduced to his Epirot Phalanx, the Sicilians daily deserting in crowds and encreasing the enemies forces. When Carthage heard of this change, new troops were raised all over Africa, and a numerous army sent into Sicily to recover the antient conquests of the African republic; whilst a mighty fleet cruised round the island to prevent Pyrrhus from making his escape<sup>1</sup>.

He abandons Sicily and returns to Italy.

THIS was the situation of Pyrrhus's affairs, when deputies came to him from the Samnites, Tarentines, Brutians, and Lucanians, whom he had abandoned to pursue new conquests in Sicily. They represented to him the dangers they had been in, and the losses they had sustained since his departure, and remonstrated, that without his assistance their cities and liberties must fall a sacrifice to the Romans, who had already dispossessed them of all their lands, and shut them up within their walls. This embassy furnished him with an honourable pretence for his departure; he was glad to have an opportunity of making the world believe, that he had abandoned Sicily, not out of fear of the enemy, but to comply with the requests of his allies. He therefore seemed at first to deliberate what part to chuse, being, as it were, divided between Sicily, Africa, and Italy. But Italy prevailed, and he began to prepare for his voyage, from which his new subjects in Sicily did not offer to divert him. When he was on the point of setting sail, he cried out, at the sight of that wealthy country which he was abandoning, What a fine field of battle do we leave to the Carthaginians and Romans! A prediction, which was soon fulfilled. He embarked on the ships which he had brought with him from Italy, but was met at sea by the Carthaginians, who attacking him sunk seventy of his gallies, and dispersed or took the rest, so that he saved himself in the ports of Italy with only twelve vessels, the poor remains of a fleet of two hundred sail. Nor was this all: The Mamertines no sooner heard of his departure, but they detached a body of eighteen thousand men to harass him after his landing. These, having passed the streights before him, posted themselves in the road, which Pyrrhus must take in marching by land to Tarentum, and, lying concealed among the woods and rocks, attacked him unexpectedly with great resolution. But Pyrrhus behaved himself on this occasion with his usual bravery. The attack being made on his rear, he hastened thither, and at the head of his men made a dreadful slaughter of the enemy, till a wound he received on the head obliged him to retire. But he soon returned to the charge with fresh fury. As he was supposed to be disabled by his wound, a proud Mamertine, of an extraordinary size, and shining in bright armour, advanced out of the ranks, and with a loud voice challenged the King of Epirus, if he was yet alive, to a single combat. Pyrrhus immediately turned about, and making a dreadful appearance by reason of the blood which ran down his face, flew upon this new champion, and discharged such a blow on his head, that he cleaved him in two, one part of his body falling to the right, and the other to the left. This feat, which has been since ascribed to other warriors, perhaps with as much truth as to Pyrrhus, filled the Mamertines with terror, who suffered the Epirots to continue their march to Tarentum <sup>k</sup>.

 UPON the departure of Pyrrhus, Hiero was appointed to command the Syracusan forces, and make head against the Carthaginians, who had regained most of the places which they possessed before the arrival of the Epirots. Hiero was the son of Hierocles, one of the descendants of Gelon the first king of Syracuse, of whose glorious reign and exploits we have already given a full account. His descent was not so honourable by the mother's side ; for she was a slave and of a very mean extraction. Wherefore Hierocles, or as Justin calls him Hieroclytus, thinking it beneath him to take care of the education of a son, who was the fruit of an unlawful intercourse, caused him, according to the barbarous custom of those days, to be exposed soon after his birth in a forest, where a swarm of bees is said to have nourished him some days with their honey. Upon the report of this prodigy, Hierocles consulted the soothsayers, who told him, that this son of his would one day mount the throne of his ancestors, and restore its family to its antient splendor. The father being pleased with this answer, owned him, and caused him to be brought up in a manner suitable to his birth. When he came to man's estate, he distinguished himself by his courage, prudence, and address in all military exercises. He made his first campaigns under Pyrrhus, who had a great value for him, and honoured him with such rewards as generals used to bestow on those who excelled the rest in valour. In his first campaign an eagle is said to have perched upon his helmet, and an owl upon his lance ; and these two birds, the former being the symbol of valour, the latter of wisdom, seemed to confirm the first prediction. And indeed young Hiero did not belie those prognostics, he so improved in the art of war under the direction of so great a master as the king of Epirus, that he was looked upon as the best commander in the army, when he was but twenty five years of age. But his great moderation, affability, and engaging behaviour gained him more honour than his military exploits. He seemed to have been born for virtue, and to be governed by no other passion but the love of glory. Justin draws the following picture of this brave youth. He was exceeding handsome, of a robust constitution, and an extraordinary strength. His affability in conversation, equity in the management of affairs, and moderation in the government of the people were such, that he wanted nothing but a crown to be a great king. And this his great merit soon procured him, as we shall see anon.

destitute of a governor, fell into the greatest disorders. To put a stop to this confusion, the troops chose Hiero and Artemidorus for their commanders; and the two generals had nothing more at heart than to re-establish good order in the capital. With this view they entered the city at the head of the army, and Hiero on this occasion first discovered an uncommon talent and genius for governing. By the arts of insinuation and address, without shedding of blood or hurting one single citizen, he calmed the minds of the people, reconciled the factions, and so gained the hearts of all, that the Syracusians, though highly dissatisfied with the soldiery for assuming the right of chusing their own generals, yet unanimously confirmed him in the command, investing him with all civil and military power during the interregnum<sup>1</sup>.

Hiero, being now at the head of the army, began to take such measures as should prevent any further disturbances in the city. He observed, that the generals and troops no sooner left the city to take the field, but Syracuse was involved in new troubles by seditious spirits and lovers of novelty. He thought it therefore necessary to have some person of merit and rank, upon whom he might rely for retaining the city in its duty, during his absence and that of the army. Leptines seemed very fit for this purpose, being a man of great interest and authority among the people. In order therefore to attach him to his interest, he married his daughter, and always left his father-in-law governor of the city when he took the field; by which means he secured both himself and the public tranquillity. Another thing that gave Hiero great uneasiness and raised frequent disturbances was, the ungovernable temper of the mercenaries in the service of the republic. They had no respect for their commanders, nor affection for a state of which they were no part, and therefore always ready to revolt, and even join the enemy, when their unjust demands were not complied with, and their hopes of gain not answered. They were so united among themselves, that Hiero could not by any means get the better of them; if he undertook to punish the most criminal among them, the whole corps took his part; so that the general was rather governed by them than they by him. He therefore concluded, that the only means to put an end to the troubles they occasioned, was utterly to extirpate that seditious body, whose licentiousness and rebellious disposition could only corrupt others, and incline them to the same pernicious practices. Accordingly he came at last to this resolution, which was contrary to his natural inclination, but judged by him necessary for the tranquillity of his country, and safety of his own person. He took the field under pretence of marching against the Mamertines; but when he came within sight of the enemy, he divided his army into two bodies, the one composed of Syracusians, the other of mercenaries; he ordered the latter to begin the charge, putting himself at the head of the former as if he designed to support them. The mercenaries fell upon the enemy with the utmost fury, but, being abandoned by the Syracusians, were all cut in pieces. The Syracusan troops he brought back safe to the city, having taken care to post them so as to have a river between them and the enemy <sup>m</sup>.

Hiero, having thus purged his army of those mutineers, revived the military discipline among the Syracusians, took other mercenaries more tractable into his service, and by degrees rendered his army formidable both to the Carthaginians and Mamertines. He first made trial of their valour against the latter, who, elated with the advantage they had gained over the mercenaries, marched into the territories of Syracuse, destroying all before them with fire and sword. Hereupon Hiero took the field, engaged them in the plains of Mylæ (N), utterly defeated them, and took their general by name Cios prisoner. Cios, being carried to the Syracusan camp, saw there the horse which his son had rode in the battle, and taking it for granted that he was killed, resolved to live no longer; and accordingly loosening the ligatures of his wounds, he soon after expired. By his death the Mamertines being destitute of a head, Hiero invaded their territories, and possessed himself of the cities of Mylæ, Amasela, Alæsa, and Abacænum (O),

(N) Mylæ, now Milazzo, was formerly a colony of the Tyndariti, who settled in that part of Sicily. It was situated in a peninsula in the north point of the island, and had a very convenient harbour. Pliny speaks of a fountain near Mylæ, which dried up in winter, and was full of water during the hottest part of the summer (39). Faxellus tells us, that he observed the same thing. The situation of the city of Amasela is altogether unknown.

(O) Abacænum stood in the north part of Sicily. Cluverius places it near the little city of Tripio. As for the city of Tyndaris, it was not far distant from Abacænum, and the name of it is still preserved in the place called at present Santa Maria di Tyndaro. It was originally a colony of the Lacedæmonians, who are supposed to have given it the name of Tyndaris, from Tyndarus the father of and then returned loaded with glory and booty to Syracuse, where he was declared king by the unanimous consent of the citizens, and soon after acknowledged as such by all the allies. This happened seven years after he had been invested with the command of the army <sup>n</sup>.

SOME time after his accession to the throne he again worsted the Mamertines, and reduced them to such straits, that they began to entertain thoughts of surrendering their city to him. Accordingly they sent ambassadors inviting him to a parley, wherein it was agreed, that the city of Messana should be put into his hands, and that he should maintain the inhabitants in the possession of their antient rights and privileges, and protect them against any foreign invasion. But as Hiero was advancing to take possession of the place, he was deceitfully prevented by Hannibal, who at that time commanded the Carthaginian forces in Sicily. The cunning African came, as it were, to congratulate Hiero on his late victory, and amused him, till some troops, which he had kept concealed in the Lipari islands, drew near Messana. The officer, who commanded that detachment, assured the Mamertines that he came as a friend, and that his only design was to assist them against the Syracusians, and prevent them from delivering their city into the enemies hands. The Mamertines, seeing themselves supported with a new reinforcement, summoned an assembly to deliberate on what measures they should take in so critical a juncture. The members of the assembly were divided in their opinions; some were for accepting the protection Carthage offered them, others for surrendering to Hiero, with whose mild government and strict honour they were well acquainted; but the greatest part were for calling the Romans to the assistance of a city, whose inhabitants were originally Italians <sup>o</sup>.

THE Mamertines, before they fought the last battle with Hiero, had sent deputies to Rome, imploring the assistance of the Roman senate and people against the invasions of their neighbours; and the people, at the instigation of their consuls, had promised to comply with their request. But the senate, having more regard to honour and equity than the people, were not yet come to any resolution. They considered, that the Sicilians were only endeavouring to recover a city which the Mamertines had taken by the blackest treachery, and thought it altogether unworthy of the Roman virtue to undertake openly the defence of traitors, who were guilty of the same perfidy, which they had lately punished in the Rhegians with the utmost severity. The senate therefore could not be prevailed upon to come into the measures of the people, so long as the Mamertines had no enemies to contend with except the Syracusians. But when news was brought to Rome, that the Carthaginians had entered Messana, and offered to defend it, the conscript fathers changed their mind. They were sensible, that Carthage undertook the defence of that important place only with a design to seize it for herself, and therefore, as they did not care to be so near neighbours to that powerful republic, they forgot the strict regard they had hitherto had to probity, came readily into the people's measures, and agreed to send the consul Appius Claudius to attempt the deliverance of Messana, and stop the progress of the Carthaginians <sup>P</sup>.

Leda. In this city was antiently a temple dedicated to Mercury, and a statue of that god, which was looked upon as a master-piece of art. Pliny tells us, that a great part of Tyndaris was swallowed up by the sea (40).

Appius Claudius did not go at first in person to Messana, but sent thither one of his military tribunes, who was also named Claudius, in his stead. The tribune was a man of extraordinary boldness, and at the same time of great prudence and address, fit for the carrying on of any great enterprise, and incapable of being terrified at the greatest dangers. He immediately set out for Rhegium, and his first care there was, to get together what vessels he could in order to cross over into Sicily. But before he ventured to sea with the few triremes he had under his command, he thought it adviseable to discover first the disposition of the Mamertines; and accordingly going on board a fisher-boat, he passed undiscovered through the midst of the enemy's fleet, and arrived safe at Messana, which he found possessed by the Carthaginians, who had entered it with the consent of some of the inhabitants, and contrary to the inclinations of others. The tribune convened the Mamertines in the place where they usually met, in order to acquaint them with the motives of his coming among them. But at first the clamours of the Carthaginians, who assisted at the assembly with the inhabitants, prevented him from being heard. However, he obtained at last a moment's silence, and then he addressed the assembly

thus: “ Mamertines, I come hither, as a deputy from the “ Romans, to offer you the assistance you have desired. The “ senate and people concur in granting it, and have nothing “ more at heart than to defend Messana from the oppression “ which threatens her. We engage our words, that we “ will withdraw our forces as soon as your city and fortunes “ are safe.” These few words made a deep impression on their minds; but, as they had already introduced the Car- thaginians into their city, they were no longer their own masters, and therefore returned such an answer as would have discouraged any one less bold than Claudius: It is a “ great pleasure to Messana, they replied, to be able to spare
 “ the Romans the trouble of assisting her. Carthage is before“ hand with them, and her protection is sufficient. Where“ fore, if you have no other proposal to make, you may “ withdraw. Every free city has a right to call in to her “ assistance whom she pleases.” “ A free city! (replied
Claudius) “ Are you not in the power of the Carthaginians?
 “ Are you not, even in this place, besieged by a foreign “ force? Does not Carthage already lord it over you, and “ make you feel the weight of that yoke, which you must,
 “ if not relieved by us, bear for ever? Answer me, if you “ dare.” Upon these words the Mamertines held their peace for fear of the Carthaginians; and the Carthaginians were struck dumb with the truth of the tribune’s speech, who, taking advantage of this general silence: You, Cartha- ginians, said he, know not what to answer, because you “ are conscious of your own injustice; and you, Mamertines, “ are dumb, because you dare not speak; if fear had not “ shut your mouths, I am confident, you would not reject
 “ my offers, and therefore I interpret your silence as a tacit “ consent to my proposal.” Upon these words a murmur arose in the assembly, and Claudius, crying aloud, “ Ma- mertines, I understand your meaning, you implore the as“ sistance of the Romans, we will comply with your re“ quest,” left the assembly and the city without further delay, and returned to Rhegium <sup>9</sup>.

UPON his report the senate judged, that the Mamertines were disposed to receive succours from Rome, and ordered the same tribune to set sail with his fleet to Messana. His fleet was no-ways in a condition to cope with that of Carthage, the Romans having at that time only a few triremes, and their men being quite ignorant of sea affairs; whereas the Carthaginians were masters at sea, had numerous fleets cruising off the coasts of Italy and Sicily, and were furnished with expert mariners. However, the tribune, despising all danger, had the boldness to weigh anchor, and steer his course to Messana; but being met by Hanno the Carthaginian admiral in the straits between Rhegium and Messana, some of his ships were taken by the enemy, others by a violent storm dashed in pieces against the rocks on the coast of Italy; inso-much that he was obliged to return to Rhegium, after having lost the best part of his fleet. Claudius, not at all discouraged by his bad success, began to refit his fleet, in order to put to sea again, saying, that he did not expect to learn the art of navigation without paying dear for it. Before he set sail the Carthaginians sent him back the ships which they had taken in the late engagement, hoping by means of this artful present, either to pique the Romans in point of honour, and so divert them from sending succours to Messana, or at least to lay the whole blame of a rupture upon them. When Hanno's deputies restored the ships, they reproached the Romans with having infringed the treaties agreed on by both republics, and pretended that the straits belonged to Carthage. This so incensed Claudius, that he rejected the present with indignation, and pursued his former resolution with more vigour than ever. Hanno's deputies, before they left Rhegium, told Claudius in an imperious stile, that Carthage would not suffer a Roman even to wash his hands in the straits. But this served only to make Claudius, who was undaunted in the greatest dangers, more eager to force out of the neighbourhood of Italy so proud and encroaching an enemy. Soon after the departure of the deputies he set sail again, and timed his enterprize so well, that he eluded the vigilance of the Carthaginian admiral, and arrived safe in the port of Messana. Hanno, who had exchanged the command of the fleet for that of the land-forces in Messana, upon the arrival of the Romans retired into the citadel, abandoning the city to Claudius, who immediately desired the Mamertines to call an assembly, and invite Hanno to it. It was not without the utmost difficulty that Hanno was prevailed upon to leave his citadel, and trust himself among the Romans and Messanians. However, he came at last, but hard words arising between him and Claudius, the bold Roman, who no longer appeared as an envoy, but was backed by his legionaries, was so provoked, that he ordered his soldiers to seize him, and kept him under confinement, till he prevailed upon him, by menaces and fair promises, to deliver the citadel up to the Romans, and evacuate the city. This piece of cowardice cost him dear ; for he was tried by his countrymen, found guilty, and condemned to be crucified<sup>r</sup>.

Hiero, king of Syracuse, had already made the necessary preparations to besiege Messana, which city he looked upon as a sure conquest, after the victory he had gained over the Mamertines. But when he heard that it was defended by the Romans, thinking himself too weak to enter the lists against two such warlike nations, as the Romans and Mamertines, he sent ambassadors to the Carthaginians, offering to join them, provided they would assist him in the siege of Messana, and help him in driving out the Romans. Such an embassy was, as we may well imagine, very acceptable to the Carthaginians, who were determined to venture all, rather than suffer the Romans to get any footing in Sicily. A treaty therefore was immediately concluded between Carthage and Syracuse, whereby they were to assist each other in driving the Romans quite out of the island ; Messana was to be delivered up to Hiero, and some places subject to Syracuse were to be put into the hands of the Carthaginians. Great preparations were carried on both at Syracuse and Carthage, new forces were raised, and a mighty fleet sent from Africa under the command of another Hanno, the son of Hannibal, who was charged with the whole management of the war. This fleet put in at Lilybæum, whence the land-forces marched to Selinus, and encamped there, while their general went to Agri- gentum, and caused the fortifications of that place to be repaired. The Carthaginians and Syracusians being now ready to enter upon action, Hanno, before he began hostilities, sent an herald to the Romans, summoning them to leave Sicily, and surrender up Messana to him, or to the king of Syracuse, if they desired to live in amity with their respective republics. Claudius answered, that he was determined to defend the place and the allies of the people of Rome to the last drop of his blood. Hereupon the Carthaginian and Syracusan armies joined, and invested Messana. The Carthaginians posted themselves near cape Pilorus, and lined the coast, whilst Hiero with his troops blocked up the city on the land side, and encamped round mount Chalcis ; so that Messana was surrounded on all sides, and no succours or provisions could be conveyed into it either by sea or land<sup>s</sup>.

As soon as the tribune Claudius had refused to quit the place, Hanno the Carthaginian general, ordered all the Italians, who served in his army, to be massacred. When the murder of these unfortunate men was heard at Rome, the consul Appius, who had not appeared yet in this dispute, set out with all speed and went to Rhegium, with a design to cross over into Sicily. Upon his arrival at Rhegium, he sent deputies to king Hiero, conjuring him by his antient friendship to the Romans not to persist in the siege of Messana, which alone could create a quarrel, the consequences of which might prove fatal to him. L. Genucius was the first of the Romans who began a correspondence with Hiero. Genucius was consul, and charged with the siege of Rhegium, which was held by the rebellious Campanian legion. While the consul carried on the siege, his provisions falling short, he applied to Hiero, who not only supplied him with what he wanted, but moreover sent him some Sicilian forces ; and this was the first time the Romans had any troops in their service from beyond-sea. Claudius, mindful of his former kindness to the Romans, proceeded at first with him in a friendly manner. But Hiero, taking it very much amiss, that the Romans should undertake the defence of a city, which must have otherwise fallen into his hands, broke out into invectives against the ingratitude of a republic, which he had assisted in her distress. As he was himself a man of strict equity, he thought it surprizing, that the Romans, who had lately punished with the utmost severity one of their legions for treacherously seizing on Rhegium, should now protect those, who in the very same manner had made themselves masters of Messana. He therefore answered the deputies sent to him by the consul Claudius, that the events of war were indeed uncertain, but should he in his attempt against the rebellious city prove unsuccessful, all men would agree, that though the ambition and power of the Romans prospered, yet Hiero fell in a just and honourable cause. The Romans themselves were very sensible, that his integrity was the only motive which prompted him to take up arms against the Mamertines. But, as he had joined the Carthaginians, the consul was little affected with his answer, and only said, that good king Hiero was not aware of the intention of his new allies, since their design in seizing Messana was only thereby to pave themselves a way to the conquest first of Sicily, and then of Italy†.

The consul Claudius passes over into Sicily. Claudius, finding the king of Syracuse determined to carry on the siege of Messana, resolved to sail thither in person, but, as the Carthaginian fleet watched all his motions, he dissembled his design, and gave out, that it was not in his power to make war upon Hiero, without fresh orders from the senate, and that he must therefore return to Rome, and lay the matter before the senate and people. This report soon reached Messana, and the Carthaginians, hearing it, left off cruising in the streights. Whereupon Claudius, having first ordered his troops to repair to several ports of Italy, and be there in a readiness to sail, went on board a galley built unskilfully and in a great haste, pretending only to coast along the shore in order to return to Rome. But as soon as he was out of sight he tacked about, and, being favoured by a dark night, reached the nearest shore in the island, and landed the few troops he carried with him, without being observed by the enemy. The Romans, who were then unexperienced in sea affairs, thought this so glorious an action, that they gave the consul the surname of Caudex, a Latin word signifying a boat unskilfully built <sup>u</sup>.

THE consul, having landed his forces, resolved to advance against Hiero, who blocked up Messana on the side of mount Chalcis, in hopes of surprizing him. When the king saw the enemy marching up to attack his camp, he very imprudently left his trenches and went out to meet them, not doubting, but he should get the better of them in the open field, which he thought far more glorious than to fight behind a rampart. The Syracusians charged with such fury and resolution, that the Roman cavalry was put in disorder at the first onset. But the legions fought with so much bravery, that the Syracusians could not with their utmost efforts break through them; nay, they were themselves, after a long and obstinate dispute, forced to give way, and leave the Romans an open passage into the city. The consul, overjoyed at his gaining the first victory which Rome had ever obtained out of her continent, entered Massana in triumph, and was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable by the inhabitants, who now began to entertain hopes of being soon delivered from a siege, which had already reduced them to great straits. Neither were they disappointed in their expectation; Hiero could not continue any longer before the place after his overthrow, being distressed for want of provisions; and besides, he thought himself betrayed by the Carthaginians; for if they had guarded the streights, the Romans could never have attacked him so unexpectedly, nor even ventured out of the ports of Italy. He could not help thinking, that the Carthaginians had suffered the Romans to enter the island on purpose to de-

The progress of the Roman arms in Sicily.

Appius, having now but one enemy to contend with, sallied out of the city and attacked the Carthaginian camp, but as it was in a very advantageous post, and strongly fortified, he was obliged to withdraw his legions and retire into Messana after having sustained a considerable loss. His retreat looked like a flight, and this encouraged the Carthaginians to quit their trenches and pursue him. But the legions unexpectedly facing about fell upon the pursuers, put them in disorder, and made a dreadful havock of the broken troops. Thus the advantages of the day were equal; but Claudius, not thinking it adviseable to attempt the enemies camp a second time, laid waste all the neighbouring country, and made excursions to the very gates of Syracuse itself. Hiero, finding that the Carthaginians were not in a condition to protect his dominions, began to entertain some thoughts of abandoning them and siding with the Romans. But the sudden departure of the consul Claudius for Rome prevented him, for the present, from entering into any treaty with that republic.

NEXT year early in the spring, both the Roman consuls, Manius Valerius Flaccus and Manius Otacilius Crassus, were ordered to transport their legions into Sicily, and carry on the war against Hiero and the Carthaginians. They both landed without meeting with the least opposition from the Carthaginian fleet, and then parted, Valerius undertaking to dislodge the Carthaginians from their advantageous post, where they kept Messana blocked up, and Otacilius advancing into the heart of the country to spread the terror of the Roman arms. What success attended the former, we find no where mentioned; but the surname of Messana which was given him on this occasion, and afterwards by corruption changed into that of Messala, as some writers inform us*, is a convincing proof that he signalized himself by some gallant action. As for Otacilius, he advanced to the foot of mount Ætna, and possessed himself of all the cities in that fruitful country: Adranum and Centuripe were taken by assault, but many other cities, and among the rest Alæsa, submitted of their own accord to the conqueror. Afterwards the two consular armies sometimes joined to fight the united forces of the Syracusians and Carthaginians, and

sometimes separated to extend their conquests the wider; the enemies were every-where vanquished, and as they took the cities subject both to the Syracusians and Carthaginians, without distinction, they reduced in a few months time no fewer than sixty seven places; of which number were Taurominium and Catana, two cities of great importance. As they drew great reinforcements from these cities, their armies were soon so increased, that they thought themselves in a condition to undertake the siege of Syracuse, the capital of the whole island, and at that time one of the greatest and strongest cities in the world. Hiero, being intimidated at the danger he was in, and now more sensible than ever, that an alliance with Rome would be less disadvantageous to him than one with Carthage, lost no time in endeavouring to save his stately metropolis from impending ruin. As soon as the two consular armies appeared before it, he sent out deputies to treat with the Romans of a peace, who on their part were no-ways averse to it, knowing that, by keeping up a friendly correspondence with Hiero, the Carthaginians would be reduced to their own forces only, and the Roman armies plentifully supplied with all manner of provisions, for want of which they had been greatly distressed the year before. A treaty Hiero concludes an alliance with the Romans. therefore was soon concluded on the following terms: that the Romans should receive Hiero into the number of the friends and allies of their republic, and protect his capital and dominions, particularly the cities of Acra, Leontini, Megara, Elorum, Netum, and Taurominium, from all hostilities whatsoever; and on the other hand, that Hiero should deliver up the prisoners he had taken without ransom, pay the republic an hundred talents of silver, and cultivate her friendship by a faithful observance of the treaty. This agreement was drawn up by the king and consuls, and afterwards ratified at Rome first by the senate, and then by the people, at the motion of Cn. Attilius Calatinus, then a tribune of the people. It was at first only a truce for fifteen years, but the conditions were so faithfully performed on both sides, that it lasted as long as Hiero lived <sup>y</sup>.

FROM thenceforth Hiero saw no war in his dominions, nor had any other share in it but that of sending from time to time supplies of provisions to his allies the Romans, who gratefully acknowledged his generosity, and with great care protected his dominions from the insults of their common enemy. During the space of above fifty years he lived after his accession to the throne, while the country around him was in flames, occasioned by the cruel wars which the two most powerful republics in the world made upon each other, he was only a spectator, and heard the noise of the arms, which shook all the neighbouring regions, himself and his people enjoying the sweets of a profound peace and tranquillity. The Romans perceived on several occasions, during the first Punic war, and especially at the siege of Agrigentum with which it was begun, how necessary it was for them to cultivate the friendship of Hiero; for that prince abundantly supplied them with provisions, when without his aid they had been obliged by famine to quit the island, their convoys from Italy being often intercepted by the enemy's fleet which guarded the straits<sup>2</sup>.

THE interval between the end of the first Punic war and the beginning of the second, which was about five and twenty years, was to Hiero a time of tranquillity, in which his actions are not mentioned by the historians. Polybius only informs us, that the Carthaginians in the war, which they were obliged to support against the mercenary troops that had served under them in Sicily, had recourse to king Hiero, who kindly assisted them, fearing perhaps lest the mercenaries, getting the better of the Carthaginians, should carry their victorious arms into Sicily, which island they were perfectly well acquainted with. Hiero's sole application during this long interval was to make his subjects happy, and to redress the many evils, which the tyrannical government of Agathocles, and the intestine divisions arising upon his death, had occasioned. Before his reign the state had been divided by two factions, the one of the citizens, the other of the soldiers; and their differences, supported on both sides with great animosity, kept up the spirit of division in the republic, and gave birth to numberless disorders. But Hiero, with his prudent and impartial conduct, so rooted out all seeds of discord and misunderstanding, that during a reign of fifty years no revolt or sedition ever arose, or the least commotion either in the army or the city. Both soldiers and citizens looked upon him rather as their common father and protector, than as their lord and sovereign, and were fully convinced that he was infinitely averse from doing any thing that could in the least prejudice their fortunes or liberty. His particular care was to encourage agriculture, which he looked upon as the certain means to diffuse abundance throughout his kingdom; he did not think it unworthy of the sovereignty to study that art, and even compose a book on that subject, of which we ought much to regret the loss. As the chief riches of the country, and the most certain fund of the prince's revenue, consisted in corn, the tenth part of which was paid to him, Hiero made such wise and equitable regulations on this head, that they became in a manner, the fundamental laws of the country, and were always observed as sacred and inviolable, not only in his reign, but in all succeeding times. When the Romans had reduced the city and dominions of Syracuse under their obedience, they imposed no new tributes, but only decreed, that all things should be regulated according to the laws of Hiero *.

In the second Punic war, Hiero gave signal proofs of his attachment to the Romans. As soon as he received advice of Hannibal's arrival in Italy, he went with his fleet well equipped to meet Tiberius Sempronius at Messana, and assured him, that, advanced in age as he was, he would shew the same zeal for the Roman people as he had done in his youth, if they thought it necessary that he should put himself at the head of his troops and cross over into Italy. He supplied the consul's legions with corn and cloaths at his own expence, and was preparing to attend him into Italy, when Sempronius, receiving news of the advantage gained by the Romans over the Carthaginian fleet, thanked the king for his advantageous offers, but made no use of them at that time <sup>a</sup>.

Hiero's sincere affection for Rome appeared still more conspicuous, after the victory gained by Hannibal at the lake Thrasymenus. The Romans had already lost three battles, and were abandoned by many of their allies. In this mournful conjuncture Hiero sent a fleet laden with provisions to the port of Ostia: The ambassador, who came with the present, being introduced to the senate, told the conscript fathers, “ That Hiero, their master, had been as sensibly “ affected with their misfortunes, as if he had suffered them “ himself; that though he knew the grandeur of the Roman “ people displayed itself more in times of adversity, “ than after the most signal successes, yet he had taken the “ liberty to send them, as a faithful ally, a victory of massy “ gold weighing three hundred pounds, which the king “ hoped they would vouchsafe to receive as a favourable “ augury, and a pledge of his vows for their prosperity; “ that they had also brought three hundred thousand medii “ of wheat, two hundred thousand of barley, and were

“ charged by their master to acquaint them, that if they “ wanted more, he could cause what quantity they pleased “ to be transported to such places as they should appoint ;
 “ that he knew the Romans employed no strangers in their “ armies, except light-armed troops, and therefore he had “ only sent a thousand archers and slingers, whom they might “ oppose to the slingers of the Balearic islands, and the Nu- “ midians in the Carthaginian army.” To his presents Hiero added a wholesome piece of advice, which was, that the prætor, who should be sent to command in Sicily, might cross from thence over into Africa, and by that means divert the Carthaginians from sending any succours to Hannibal in Italy. Rome was touched with the affection good king Hiero shewed her, thanked him for his presents and advice, and sent him this obliging letter : You have ever been a constant and generous friend. No change of times has altered your af- fection and generosity towards us. We received with pleasure the victory from your hands. It is a pledge of your friendship, which we will carefully preserve ; and in order to keep her a- mong us, and prevent her ever leaving us, we will shut her up in the strongest place of Rome. We will place her upon the capi- tol our citadel, and even in the temple of Jupiter. The gods grant, that she may be as faithful and friendly to us as you.
 All the corn and barley on board the ships with the archers and slingers were sent to the consuls. They likewise sent, pursuant to Hiero’s advice, from the ports of Italy a reinforcement of twenty five quinqueremes to T. Otacilius, who commanded the armies in Sicily, empowering him to carry the war into Africa, if he thought proper <sup>b</sup>.

Valerius Maximus observes here the noble and polite liberality of Hiero, who did not offer the Romans three hundred pounds weight of gold in specie, as being well acquainted with their delicacy in that point ; but under the form of a victory, which they dared not refuse, on account of the good omen it seemed to bring along with it. It is uncommon to see a prince, whose dominions were so exposed to the insults of the enemy, continue unalterably faithful to his former allies, even when they were on the brink of ruin. But nothing could shake Hiero’s attachment to Rome. But it was also his interest to act as he did. For had the Carthaginians entirely ruined, or even weakened the Romans too much, Syracuse must have fallen a prey to the conquerors. That city was situated over against Carthage, and lay mighty convenient for securing its commerce, and gaining the empire of the sea. Wherefore as

Syracuse must have necessarily fallen after Rome, it was absolutely requisite for the king of Syracuse to hazard every thing, and either save Rome or fall with her.

NEITHER did king Hiero's generosity extend to the Romans alone ; Polybius informs us, that he sent an hundred talents to the Rhodians, with other rich presents, after the great earthquake, which laid waste their island, and threw down the famous colossus. He moreover caused two statues to be erected in the market-place at Rhodes, representing the people of Syracuse placing a crown on the head of the Rhodians, as if, says our historian, Hiero, after having made the people magnificent presents, believed himself indebted to them. So great was the modesty with which his presents were always attended <sup>c</sup>.

HOWEVER, there is a pastoral in Theocritus <sup>d</sup> bearing the name of Hiero, wherein that poet seems to reproach the king, as if he had not acknowledged in a handsome manner the verses made in his commendation. But the mean manner, in which he claims, as it were, a reward for his poetry, leaves room to conclude, that the imputation of avarice falls with more justice on the poet than the prince, whose generosity is extolled by all the historians who mention him.

THO' Hiero seemed entirely employed in maintaining the peace and tranquillity of his kingdom, yet he did not neglect matters relating to war, knowing, that the surest means to preserve the public quiet, was to hold himself always ready to make war upon such as should attempt to disturb it. To him Syracuse was indebted for those amazing machines of war, which the Syracusians made use of when besieged by the Romans, as we shall see anon. The public buildings, such as palaces, temples, arsenals, &c. which were erected in Syracuse by his order, and under the direction of Archimedes, were the greatest ornaments of that stately metropolis. He caused also an infinite number of ships to be built for the exportation of corn, in which the whole riches of the island consisted. We are told of a galley built by his order, which was looked upon as one of the wonders of that age. Archimedes, who was the overseer of the work, spent a whole year in finishing it ; Hiero daily animating the workmen with his presence. This ship had twenty benches of oars, three spacious apartments, and all the conveniencies of a large palace. The floors of the middle apartment were all inlaid, and represented in various colours the stories of Homer's Iliad. The ceilings, windows, and all other parts were finished with wonderful art, and embellished with all kinds of ornaments. In the uppermost apartment there was a spacious gymnasium, or place of exercise, and walks with gardens and plants of all kinds disposed in wonderful order. Pipes, some of hardened clay, and others of lead, conveyed water all around to refresh them. But the finest of the apartments was that of Venus, the floors being inlaid with agates and other precious stones, the inside lined with Cyprus wood, the windows adorned with ivory, paintings, and small statues. In this apartment there was a library, and a bath with three great coppers, and a bathing vessel made of one single stone of various colours, and containing two hundred and fifty quarts. It was supplied with water from a great reservoir at the head of the ship, which held an hundred thousand quarts. The vessel was adorned on all sides with fine paintings, and had eight towers of equal dimensions, two at the head, two at the stern, and four in the middle. Round these towers were parapets, whence stones might be discharged against the enemy's vessels when they approached. Each tower was constantly guarded by four young men compleatly armed, and two archers. To the side of the vessel was fastened an engine made by Archimedes, which threw a stone of three hundred weight, and an arrow of eighteen feet, the distance of a stadium, or an hundred and twenty five paces. Though the hold of this vessel was exceeding deep, a single man could soon clear it of water with a machine invented for that purpose by Archimedes. An Athenian poet having composed some verses on this magnificent vessel, Hiero, who understood the value of verse, rewarded him with a thousand medimni, that is, six thousand bushels of wheat, which he caused to be carried to the Pyræus or port of Athens. Hiero made afterwards a present of this great vessel to Ptolemy, probably Philadelphus, king of Egypt, and sent it to Alexandria. As there was at that time a great famine in Egypt, good king Hiero sent along with it several other ships of less burden, with three hundred thousand quarters of corn, ten thousand great earthen jars of salt fish, twenty thousand quintals of salt meat, and an immense quantity of other provisions<sup>c</sup>.

Hiero's fidelity to the Romans was put to a severe trial after the battle of Cannæ, which was followed by an universal defection of their allies. The Carthaginians, having landed a great many troops in Sicily, made a dreadful havock in the territories of Syracuse. But nothing could shake the king's constancy. He was only concerned to see some, even of his own family, favour the Carthaginians. He had a son named

Gelon, who married Nercis the daughter of Pyrrhus, and had by her several children, and amongst others Hieronymus, of whom we shall soon have occasion to speak. Gelon, despising his father's wholesome advice, and looking upon the Romans as already subdued by Hannibal, openly declared for the Carthaginians. He had already armed the multitude, and stirred up the allies of Syracuse to join him; but his measures were broken by a sudden and unexpected death, which happened so seasonably, that his father was suspected to have been privy to it. Hiero did not survive his son long. After he had continued faithful to the Romans for fifty years together, he died in the ninetieth year of his age, and fifty-fourth of his reign, infinitely regretted by his subjects, and no less by the Romans, who lost in him the most constant friend they had ever had. Hiero dies.

THERE was none to whom Hiero could leave his crown, except Hieronymus the son of Gelon, on whom he could not depend as to his conduct, the young prince being but fifteen years old at his grandfather's death. The good old king therefore, who had more at heart the happiness of his people, than the aggrandizing of his family, had formed a design of abolishing monarchy, and restoring the Syracusians to their antient liberty. He had two daughters, both married to the greatest lords of the kingdom, Demarata the elder to Andranodorus, and Heraclea to Zoippus, a man of a quiet disposition, and who had served Hiero with great fidelity, but was in his heart a zealous republican. Wherefore his wife Heraclea, whom he suffered to go but very seldom to court, never attempted to divert her father from reinstating the Syracusians in their antient rights. But her sister, at the instigation of her ambitious husband, used her utmost endeavours to engage Hiero not to deprive his grandson of a crown which was due to him by right of inheritance. The private views of Demarata and her husband were to govern the kingdom, during the minority of Hieronymus, and to wait for a favourable opportunity of placing the crown upon their own heads. It was not easy for an old man of ninety to hold out against the caresses, tears, and intreaties of a daughter, who besieged him day and night. So that he at last gave way to the repeated instances of an ambitious woman, made a will, and bequeathed the crown to his grandson. To prevent as far as possible the evils he apprehended, he appointed him fifteen guardians, who were to form his council, earnestly desiring them at his death never to depart from the alliance with the Romans; to which he had inviolably adhered for fifty years, to teach the young prince to abstain from pomp and ostentation, and to instil into his mind the same principles by which he had acted during his whole reign.

Hieronymus.

Hiero's eyes were no sooner closed, but the guardians, summoning the people, read the king's will in the assembly. As the tastes of the Syracusians and their views were different, so were their opinions with relation to the things established by the king. Some did not like the monarchical government; others took umbrage at the crown's being settled in one family; the greatest part were dissatisfied at the perpetual alliance to be made with Rome already half subdued by Hannibal. In short, the will was liked only by a very few, who were gained over by the court, and artfully placed in several parts of the assembly to shew their approbation of it by shouts and acclamations. However, none had courage enough to protest against it; and therefore the assembly broke up, without either openly contradicting or accepting the will. The king's obsequies were celebrated with great pomp by the citizens, to whom his memory was dearer than to his relations. A few days after, Andranodorus, thinking the young prince securely seated on the throne, because he saw no open opposition, began to take such measures as plainly discovered his intentions, and encreased the number of the enemies of the monarch and monarchy. Hiero's chief aim in appointing fifteen guardians was, to engage so many of the greatest lords in his dominions to be defenders of his crown and family. But Andranodorus, out of a selfish view, deprived Hieronymus of his chief support by removing all the other guardians, under pretence, that the king was of age to take the reins of government into his own hands. By this means that wicked minister, who had gained a great ascendant over the young prince, united in his own person all the power which had been divided among them. The best of princes, succeeding a king so greatly beloved by his subjects, would have found it very difficult to maintain himself in the throne. Whereas Hieronymus, under the direction of Andranodorus, became quite the reverse of his grandfather. He seemed to take pleasure in increasing the sorrow of the people for the loss of Hiero, and they, by comparing the vices of the successor with the virtues of his predecessor, began to conceive a great aversion to the new king. They no longer saw the throne filled with a prince, who was affected with all the misfortunes of his subjects, and gave the meanest of them a free access to him, being distinguished from the rest of the people, only by the

the great respect and veneration they all paid him. Hieronymus assumed the purple and diadem, and never appeared in public, but in a chariot drawn by white horses, and surrounded by a troop of guards. His whole conduct was suitable to this equipage. He was difficult of access, never gave audience but with an air of contempt, and often added severe jests to his denials. Even his guardians were with great difficulty suffered to approach him. He had no confidants, but the ministers of his pleasures, giving himself up to all manner of debauchery. His cruelty was no-ways inferior even to that of Agathocles, and seemed to have extinguished all sense of humanity in him. This raised an universal alarm both among the people and nobles, insomuch, that some of his guardians laid violent hands on themselves, to avoid seeing the vices of their ward, and others voluntarily withdrew from their country<sup>s</sup>.

ONLY three men of distinction continued at court, Andranodorus, Zoippus, both Hiero's sons-in-law, and Thraso, surnamed Charcarus. The latter was a true courtier, that is a slavish flatterer, and a mere tool; but at the same time a cunning statesman, and one who indeed readily complied with all the inclinations of the prince, but understood better than any other his master's true interest. The king often took pleasure in engaging him in disputes with Andranodorus and Zoippus about state-affairs. Thraso was a zealous advocate for the Romans; but the two others, believing the Romans could never recover, after the dreadful overthrows they had received, openly declared for Carthage; and their speeches had most weight with the young prince. However, the reasons alledged by Thraso kept him in suspense, till a melancholy accident determined him to chuse the worst part. One, named Solis, a man of a mean condition, and who had served the king from his infancy in the lowest offices, discovered a conspiracy against the king, but could name none of the conspirators, except Theodotus, who was delivered up to Andranodorus, and tortured in order to make him discover the whole plot and the names of the conspirators. Being in the utmost agony he confessed the crime as to himself, but, instead of naming his accomplices, he accused all the king's best friends, though innocent, and amongst others Thraso, as the ringleader of the whole enterprize, adding, that they should never have engaged in it, if they had not been countenanced by one in favour with the king, and who had free access into the palace. His deposition was believed, and all the interest Thraso had at court could not save his life. As for Theodotus, he persisted to the last breath in accusing the innocent in order to save the guilty. And his accomplices depended so much on his secrecy, that none of them left the city, or absconded during the whole time he was kept in prison and racked <sup>h</sup>.

UPON the death of Thraso, who was the sole support of the Roman alliance, Andranodorus and Zoippus easily brought the king into their measures, who immediately dispatched ambassadors to the Carthaginian camp in Italy. Hannibal received them with great demonstrations of kindness, and sent an embassy to the young king of Syracuse, at the head of which he put a young officer of great distinction at Carthage, named also Hannibal, hoping that the conformity of age and inclinations would make him agreeable to Hieronymus. With him he sent two persons advanced in years, who were both great statesmen and experienced commanders; one was called Hippocrates, and the other Epycides; they were born at Carthage, but originally Syracusians, their grandfathers having been banished Sicily, in the time of the tyranny of Agathocles. Claudius Pulcher, the Roman prætor in Sicily, took umbrage at the arrival of these ambassadors, and immediately sent deputies to the court of Syracuse to renew the alliance made with king Hiero. But the Carthaginians having already had audience of Hieronymus, had given him such high notions of Hannibal's victories and reputation, that he had sent away young Hannibal to Carthage to prepare that senate for the receiving his ambassadors, when they should come to conclude a treaty of alliance with them<sup>i</sup>.

IN this situation of affairs, the envoys of the Roman prætor were not received at Syracuse with the respect due to their character. They began their speech with explaining the motives of their deputation. We are come, said they, to renew that alliance and good understanding, which the wise king Hiero maintained for so many years with Rome. But Hieronymus, who was naturally given to rallery, replied, I will ask you but one question: Who were conquerors at Cannæ, you or the Carthaginians? I am told such surprising things of that battle, that I should be glad to know all the particulars of it. This severe reproach put the Romans out of humour; however, they only made him this reply, that when he would please to be serious they would desire another audience. They accordingly had one some days after, and spoke to the king with as much haughtiness as if they had been conquerors, advising him not to determine upon the choice of his allies from doubtful accounts, nor change sides too rashly, lest he should soon have occasion to repent of the measures he had taken. To this the king replied with an insulting air: Yes, indeed, I suppose it was out of pure friendship, that the Romans, upon a false report of my grandfather's death, brought their fleet in sight of Syracuse. Did they design to make themselves masters of my dominions, or to protect them? This reproach was wholly founded on an ill turn, which the enemies of Rome had given to a step of the Romans. A report being spread of king Hiero's death, the Roman fleet had advanced as far as cape Pachynum to assist the grandson of their faithful ally. But as soon as they understood that Hiero was still alive, the fleet returned to Lilybæum. Hence the friends of Carthage took occasion to persuade the king, that the design of the Romans was to seize on his dominions, and keep them for themselves. The ambassadors endeavoured to undeceive him, but he with an air of rally only replied; Since then you could tack about, give me leave in my turn to take advantage of the wind, from what point soever it blows: it is now set for Carthage, and I shall sail thither. Upon this the deputies withdrew without returning any answer, and informed the prætor, who had sent them, of all that had passed<sup>k</sup>.

FROM this time Rome looked upon the king of Syracuse as her enemy. And truly that prince soon after the departure of the ambassadors sent three deputies to Carthage, to ratify the alliance he had made with Hannibal. The conditions of this treaty were; first, that the Carthaginians should send a fleet and a land-army to assist Hieronimus: Secondly, that after they had with their joint forces driven the Romans quite out of the island, they should divide it into two equal parts, the river Himera (Q) being the boundary of the Syracusians on one side, and of the Carthaginians on the other. Such a treaty could not meet with any difficulty from the senate of

(Q) There were two rivers in Sicily known by the name of Himera. The smaller fell into the Tyrrhenian sea, near the present city of Termini. The larger, after having watered the middle of the island, discharges itself into the Libyan sea. Both these rivers rise on mount Nebroda, now Madonia. Solinus, Mela, and some other geographers, make these two but one river, which afterwards divides itself into two branches (42).

Carthage, since the whole end of it was first to draw off Hieronimus from his alliance with the Romans, and then to sacrifice him to their ambition. Hippocrates and Epicydes were sensible of this, and therefore, as they had more at heart the interest of Syracuse than that of Carthage, they opened the young prince's eyes, and gave him to understand how prejudicial the second article might prove to him. Your right to all Sicily, said they, is indisputable. You are the son of Nercis, the daughter of Pyrrhus; and who does not know that Pyrrhus was, by the unanimous consent of all the Sicilians, declared king of the whole island? Though this discourse was no-ways conclusive, yet the young prince's eyes being easily dazzled with discoveries that favoured his ambition, he immediately dispatched a new embassy to Carthage. The former proposals he had made were just upon the point of being signed, and the Carthaginians were not a little surprized to see the king change his mind. The ambassadors after a long preamble, wherein they endeavoured to prove their master's right to all Sicily, and to shew that he could not divide it without wronging himself, confined the alliance with Carthage to mutual assistance. The king of Syracuse, said they, will assist Hannibal in Italy, and Carthage shall assist him in Sicily. As it was of the utmost importance for Carthage to separate Syracuse from the Romans, and to recover a footing in Sicily, the senate consented to the new proposals of Hieronimus, and began to raise an army and equip a fleet to be sent into that island. Half Sicily was at that time in the hands of the Romans, and had been a Roman province ever since the treaty, which put an end to the first Punic war; for by that treaty the island was divided into two parts; the one was possessed by the Romans, and the other by Hiero; so that at this time the Romans were in a condition to give Hieronimus great trouble. However, they could make no impression on the king, who returned them only this unpolite and provoking answer, Let the Romans restore all the gold, presents and corn that they drew from my grandfather, and consent, that the river Iimera be the common boundary between us, and I will renew the antient treaties with them<sup>1</sup>.

THE Roman prætor, being exasperated at these proceedings, took the field, and began hostilities in the territory of Syracuse, before the arrival of the Carthaginians in Sicily. On the other hand, Hieronimus, leading his troops to Leontini on the confines of his dominions, fixed his residence there. His army amounted in all to about fifteen thousand men, of which he detached two thousand under the command of Hippocrates and Epicydes to dislodge some Roman garisons from the posts they possessed.

 execution, at last appointed a day for the dispatching of a tyrant, whose cruelties and other vices they could no longer bear. They posted themselves in a narrow street, through which the king, during his residence at Leontini, used to ride every day on his return from the forum to the palace. His guards always attended him, but one of them, by name Dinomanes, was in the number of the conspirators, and agreed with the rest to make the guards halt, and by that means give them an opportunity of falling upon the king, while he was at some distance from his attendants. Accordingly Dinomanes, who was at the head of the guards, stopped as it were to tie the strings of his buskins; upon this signal the conspirators, rushing out of their ambush, stabbed the king in several places before he could receive any assistance. For Dinomanes, facing about upon his fellow-soldiers, stood their onset, and, though dangerously wounded, did not retire till the king was dead. When the guards saw the prince wallowing in his blood, and the conspirators advancing to attack them, they betook themselves to flight. When the king's death was known in the army, which was encamped under the walls of Leontini, the soldiers cried out, that the conspirators ought to be all sacrificed to the manes of Hieronymus. But the sweet name of liberty, with which the conspirators filled the city and camp, soon appeased their resentment. Hopes were also given them, that the king's treasures should be divided among them, and that they should soon be headed by more able generals, than the late unexperienced young prince. They were also put in mind of the public crimes and private vices of the late king, which, being artfully represented and in the worst light, filled them with such horror that they left the dead body to rot in the public street. A remarkable instance of the little dependence that is to be had on the zeal of an inconstant multitude<sup>m</sup>.

THE king was no sooner dead, but Sosis and Theodotus, two of the conspirators, hastened to Syracuse to prevent the attempts of Andranodorus, and the others of the king's faction. But notwithstanding their diligence, Andranodorus had notice of what had happened before their arrival, and taken his precautions accordingly. He had already seized on the citadel and the island of Ortygia, and filled them with troops and officers in whom he could confide. Some writers are of opinion, that the Roman prætor Claudius was not entirely unconcerned in a plot, which was so useful to his republic. But, however that be, he did not fail to give the senate immediate advice of all that had passed, and to take the necessary steps for the preserving of that part of Sicily, which belonged to the Romans <sup>a</sup>.

Disturbances in Syracuse.

WHILE Andranodorus, supported by the king's faction, was fortifying himself in Ortygia, Sosis and Theodotus entered that quarter of Syracuse called Tyche. The sun was set before they reached the city, but still there was light enough to see the king's diadem and bloody robes, which the conspirators carried in their hands, and shewed to the people. This sight drew crowds of the inhabitants round them, whom they invited into Acradina, which was as it were the heart of the city, to take there proper measures for the recovery of their liberty. Hereupon all the city sided with the conspirators; lights were seen in all parts; some took to their arms, and those who had none in their houses, ran to the temple of Jupiter Olympius, where the arms of the Gauls and Illyrians were hung up, which the Romans had presented to their good ally king Hiero. Such citizens as were armed posted themselves in all the avenues leading to the citadel, and there kept guard all night. Andranodorus attempted to possess himself of the public granaries, but the soldiers, whom he employed on this occasion, revolted from him, and delivered them up to the magistrates of the city. In this manner the first night was spent after the murder of Hieronimus <sup>b</sup>.

THE next morning, as soon as it was light, all the inhabitants of Syracuse, some armed and some unarmed, crowded into Acradina, where the senate was assembled, which had not been convened, nor consulted upon any affair since Hiero's death. Polyærnus, an illustrious citizen, spoke to the people with great freedom and moderation: “ Syracusians, “ said he, I am not at all surpris'd to see you up in arms, in “ order to recover your antient liberty. The sense you have
“ of your past slavery, and the calamities you have suffered “ under a tyrannical government, have inspired you with “ this generous resolution. But, after all, you have heard “ from your fathers, that civil discord is likewise attended “ with great evils, and that Syracuse has suffered more from “ domestic “ domestic than foreign wars. I commend your readiness in “ taking arms, but should think you still more worthy of “ commendation, if you only used them in the last extremi“ ty. It is my opinion, that you send deputies to Andrano- “ dorus, and that you first try by gentle methods, whether “ you can prevail upon him to open the gates of the citadel, “ to put the island into the hands of the magistrates, and to “ withdraw his garisons. If he submits, violence is useless; “ but if he persists in maintaining himself upon a throne, to “ which he has no right, his crime is greater than that of “ Hieronimus, and deserves a more severe punishment.”

This discourse had the desired effect; deputies were sent to Andranodorus, who entered into a conference with them. He was sensible, that it would be very difficult for him to maintain himself in his usurpation against the unanimous consent of the people. Ortygia was already partly possessed by the citizens, and the public granaries, on which he had depended, were in the power of the magistrates. These considerations gave him just apprehensions; but his wife Demarata, Hiero's daughter, a haughty and ambitious woman, taking him aside, put him in mind of the famous saying of Dionysius the tyrant, that no man ought to quit a throne till he is dragged from it by the heels; she advised him to demand time to consider, and, in the interim, to bring the troops from Leontini, and endeavour to gain them, by promising them half the king's treasures<sup>p</sup>.

Andranadorus did not entirely reject this counsel, nor think proper to give into it without reserve. He chose a mean between both, and resolved to submit to the senate, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity to bring his designs to bear. He therefore answered the deputies, that he would open the gates of Ortygia the next day, come into Acradina, and give the assembly an account of his conduct. Accordingly he threw open the gates the next morning, and repairing to the market-place of Acradina, where the people were assembled, he mounted the tribunal of harangues, and, after excusing his delay, from the apprehensions he had been under of being involved in the tyrant's punishment, he declared, that he was come to put his life and fortune into the hands of the senate. Then, turning to Sosis and Theodotus, As for you, said he, illustrious avengers of the public wrongs, do not imagine that the glorious work of establishing your liberty is yet accomplished. What you have done hitherto is but a sketch of what ought to follow. An unrestrained populace

Andranodorus submits to the senate. is as dangerous in a republic as a persecuting tyrant. Andranodorus, having spoke these words, laid down the keys of Ortygia, and of the king's treasures, at the feet of the two chiefs of the conspiracy. The whole city was highly rejoiced on this occasion, and the rest of the day spent in feasting, and returning thanks to the gods for so happy a change.

THE next day the people assembled to elect the chief magistrates to govern the state, when Andranodorus was one of the first chosen, and with him the chief conspirators, among the rest Sospater and Dinomanes, though then at Leontini. They had there seized on the money, which Hieronymus had with him to pay the troops, and had caused it to be removed to Syracuse, where treasurers were chosen to take care of all the effects of the late king. And, lastly, as a sign of their having entirely recovered their liberty, they caused the wall to be beat down between Acradina and the island Ortygia, which was the retreat of the kings.

IN the mean time Hippocrates and Epicydes, Hannibal's two agents, whom Hieronymus had placed at the head of his troops, endeavoured to conceal the king's death from them, and caused those to be assassinated who first spread the report of it in the camp. But all was to no purpose; they were abandoned by the greater part of the troops, and obliged to quit the field and repair to Syracuse, in order to carry on there the same negotiations with the republic, which they had begun with the king. But finding that the change of government had changed the dispositions of the Syracusians, when they were introduced into the senate, they spoke thus: We came into Sicily being sent by Hannibal as ambassadors to Hieronymus his friend and ally. We have only obeyed the commands of our general, and if our abode in the island gives you any umbrage, allow us at least a free passage to our army. Locri is the place where we desire to be set ashore in Italy; both sea and land are infested by the Romans, we beg therefore you would give us a guard to escort us to that port. The Syracusians were not sorry to part with those two strangers, who were of a turbulent and factious disposition, and well experienced in military affairs. But as the senate was too dilatory in appointing the time for their departure and the guards to escort them, they found means to form a party against the senate of Syracuse and against Rome. They had commanded the king's forces, and therefore being well known to the soldiers, they assembled as many of them as they could in their lodgings, and by seditious speeches stirred them up to rebellion, telling them, that the senate designed to deliver up the state to the Romans, and sacrifice the public good to their private ambition.

bition. Andranodorus was not a stranger to these plots, but favoured them underhand, in hopes of turning them to his own advantage. The seditious Demarata was continually spiriting him up to re-establish monarchy and place himself on the throne. The time is come, said she, for placing Hiero's daughter on the throne of her father. All is quiet in Syracuse, but the republic not yet well settled, the soldiers, who are used to receive the king's pay, are not yet dispersed, nor have they imbibed the republican spirit; two great generals, disciples of Hannibal in the art of war, are ready to lend us their assistance; they are acquainted with the troops, and esteemed by them: Let us then seize this happy moment, and not delay, till Hippocrates and Epicyles are forced from Syracuse, and we deprived of their concurrence<sup>9</sup>.

THIS discourse of Demarata made no small impression on Andranodorus; however, he did not think fit to embark in so dangerous an enterprize, till he had communicated his design to Themistus. This nobleman had married Harmania the late king's sister, and therefore shewed a great readiness to enter into the plot, being well apprized, that, if the republican state were restored, he should be reduced to a private station. Thus the design for usurping the throne was formed, and measures taken for the putting it in execution; but an indiscreet confidence disconcerted the whole. Themistus was very intimate with one Aristo, a man of no mean birth, but by profession an actor, which was not deemed dishonourable among the Greeks, men of distinction appearing sometimes on the stage, and acting parts in tragedies. As soon as Aristo was informed by his friend, that the conspirators had resolved to put the magistrates to death, and re-establish the monarchy he thought it his duty to prefer the interest of his country to the laws of friendship; and accordingly discovered the conspiracy to the chief magistrates or prætors, by whom, after he had been examined, sentence of death was privately passed upon Andranodorus and Themistus upon his deposition alone; for Aristo was known to be a man of great honour and probity. The sentence was to be executed at the door of the senate-house, when these two chief conspirators should come to the senate, and guards were placed at the entrance with private orders, to kill them as soon as they appeared. The guards, pursuant to their orders, fell upon them as they were entering the senate, and the two conspirators fell down dead on the spot covered with many wounds. Their death struck the rest of the senators with terror, for they were quite strangers to the motives of that execution ; but the prætors, when the tumult was quelled, introduced Aristo, who unriddled the whole secret to them, lamented the unhappy fate of his friend Themistus, and discovered the designs of the conspirators. He told them, that the Iberian and African mercenaries, whom Hieronymus had kept in his pay, were to have been the instruments of this new revolution, and to have been employed in cutting off the chief citizens of Syracuse ; that their estates were to have been the rewards of the assassins, and that the due preparations were made for the seizing of Ortygia again in the name of Andranodorus. He then entered into a detail of all the circumstances of the conspiracy, and named the persons, who were to have executed each particular part of that black design. As his evidence carried with it all the appearance of truth and sincerity, the senate passed a decree, declaring that the death of Andranodorus was as just as that of Hieronymus.

IN the mean time, the populace, not knowing for what reason two citizens of distinction had been so unexpectedly put to death, threatened to revenge the violence offered them. But the sight of the dead bodies of the two conspirators, which were dragged out into the porch, appeased the tumult, and then Sopater, appointed by the senate to harangue the people, informed them of their pernicious designs, ascribing all the misfortunes of Sicily to them, and not to Hieronymus, who, being only a youth, had been led astray, by their wicked counsels. He insinuated, that the king's guardians and tutors had reigned in his name ; that they ought to have been exterminated with the tyrant ; that impunity had encouraged them to commit new crimes, and even to aspire to the tyranny ; that not being able to succeed in their design by force, they had made use of dissimulation and perfidy ; that neither favours nor honours could get the better of the wicked disposition of Andranodorus, whom they had raised to the highest dignities with the deliverers of their country ; that as to Themistus, he had been inspired, as well as his accomplice, with the ambition of reigning by his wife. These furies are the occasion of all our misfortunes, said Sopater ; these the first authors of the present conspiracy. At these words, the whole assembly cried out, that none of them ought to be suffered to live, and that it was necessary to root out entirely the race of the tyrants, without any reserve or exception†. This cruel sentence was no sooner passed by the people, but the prætors, who ought to have checked the fury of the mulitude, ordered it to be put in execution. Demarata Hiero's daughter, and Harmonia Gelon's daughter, the former married to Andranodorus, and the latter to Themistus, were killed first. The executioners went afterwards to the house of Heraclea, the wife of Zoippus. That virtuous princess was the only person of the royal family, who was not concerned in the conspiracy. Her husband, having been sent on an embassy to Ptolemy king of Egypt, he remained at Alexandria to avoid seeing the vices and ill conduct of Hieronimus. During his abode there, Heraclea, whom he had inspired with noble sentiments, spent her days in retirement, wholly employed in the education of the two young princesses her daughters. When she heard that the executioners, after having murdered her sister and niece, were come to her, she took refuge with her two daughters in the most remote part of her house, where she worshipped her gods. But the murderers found her out, and Heraclea, seeing those who were to embroil their hands in her blood, went to meet them, and with her hair dishevelled, her face bathed in tears, and, in a condition most proper to move compassion, conjured them in the name of Hiero her father, not to involve an innocent woman in the guilt of Hieronimus; she represented to them, that the king, whom they had so much reason to hate, had done nothing for her but increase her affliction, by separating her husband from her; that not having any share in the designs of her sister and niece, she ought to have none in their punishment; that her husband had always declared for a republican state, and would return with joy to Syracuse, if he knew of the death of Hieronimus, and the present revolution. But alas! said she, how will his hopes be disappointed? he will find his zeal for his country rewarded with the murder of his wife and children. Tell me, at least, what my crime is. What have you to fear from me in the forlorn condition to which I am reduced, or from my daughters, unhappy orphans, without credit or support? We are indeed of the blood-royal, and if that gives you umbrage, banish us. At Alexandria I shall find a kind husband, and my daughters a tender father<sup>c</sup>.

HER speech made no impression on the minds of the executioners; they drew their swords to sacrifice those innocent victims, and then Heraclea, forgetting her own danger, interceded only for her daughters; but her intreaties and tears were to no purpose; they first stabbed her in the sight of her daughters, and then with innumerable wounds dispatched them already stained and covered with the blood of their mother. They were scarce dead when an order came from the people to suspend the execution ; but when they understood that the innocent princesses were already executed, they exclaimed with the utmost rage and fury against the magistrates, who had been so ready to put that cruel sentence in execution, without allowing them time to reflect on the injustice of it. The death of Andranodorus and Themistus had occasioned two vacancies in the college of prætors, and the people took hold of this pretence to come to a new election. The day was fixed for the assembly, and all the Syracusians met in the public market-place to give their suffrages. Compassion for the unfortunate Heraclea had greatly abated the hatred of the people to the king's party ; insomuch, that Hannibal's ambassadors, who had always been zealous for the late king, did not despair of being elected. They were originally Syracusians, highly esteemed by the soldiery, and besides had gained over to their interest such among the people, as were most touched with compassion for the death of Heraclea and her daughters. They had also the address to place some among the crowd, whom they had hired to act and speak in their favour ; and these, when the people came to vote, cried out, some Epicyles, and others Hippocrates, whose names being repeated in several places, the assembly took these scattered votes for the unanimous consent of the multitude. The prætors indeed were for bringing the cause before the senate, but were prevented by the clamours of the people ; so that Epicyles and Hippocrates were declared duly elected.

*Epicyles
and Hippocrates

Hannibal was at the bottom of all these disturbances, and had good grounds to hope that they would both secure his conquests in Italy, and give Carthage an opportunity of recovering her antient dominions in Sicily, where Rome would find it more difficult to maintain a war, than in her own neighbourhood. The Romans, who had been put in possession of the greatest part of this island at the end of the first Punic war, had divided their dominions there into two provinces, under the government of two prætors. Appius Claudius ruled in that which bordered on the territories of Syracuse ; and Cornelius Lentulus, at the head of two legions, commanded in the province which was nearest to Lilybæum. Besides, Otacilius was cruising on the coast with a fleet of an hundred sail, and ready to act according to the resolutions that should be taken at Syracuse. However, the forces of the two prætors were not thought sufficient by the senate of Rome to make head against the Syracusians, when supported by the numberless troops which in all likelihood would be sent into the island from all parts of Africa. It was therefore resolved, that Marcellus should transport the army he commanded at Nola into Sicily, and assist Claudius and Lentulus. As Hannibal was no longer so formidable as he had been, Marcellus, though just recovered from a fit of sickness, set out for Sicily on the first orders, leaving Fabius to keep the Carthaginians in awe on the continent. The greatest part of the Syracusan prætors were still inclined to keep up a good understanding with Rome, and had sent deputies to Claudius to renew the ancient treaties, which had been violated by Hieronimus. But Claudius, who knew that the consul Marcellus would soon arrive in Sicily, came to no conclusion with them, referring the whole matter to the consul; who, upon his arrival having heard their proposals, and finding them advantageous to his republic, dispatched an embassy to Syracuse to confirm the treaty. But the ambassadors found the state of affairs much altered. A report had been industriously spread by the emissaries of Hannibal, that a Carthaginian fleet appeared off cape Pachynum, and this report gave new confidence to the enemies of Rome. Besides, Hippocrates and Epicydes left no stone unturned to inspire the populace with an aversion to the Romans. By means of the mercenaries and Roman deserters they spread a report, that Syracuse was to be delivered up to the Romans, and that this design was carrying on by the prætors, who had sold themselves to Rome. These suspicions were confirmed by the approach of some ships of Otacilius, which Appius had ordered to draw near to Syracuse, to encourage the party in the Roman interest. Nay, the populace, at the instigation of Hippocrates and Epicydes, had already taken up arms, to oppose the pretended descent of the Romans.*

Apollonides exhorts the Syracusians to join the Romans.

IN this confusion the wisest among the prætors thought proper to summon an assembly of the people. Hot debates arose, and there being reason to fear some sedition, Apollonides, one of the principal senators, made a discourse very suitable to the occasion. He represented, that never city was nearer its destruction or preservation than Syracuse was at that time; that if they unanimously joined either the Carthaginians or Romans, they might escape the dangers that threatened them; but if they were divided, the war would not be more cruel and bloody between the Carthaginians and Romans, than between Syracusians and Syracusians, as having different troops and commanders within the narrow compass of their own walls; that it was therefore absolutely necessary in the first place to agree among themselves, and then to consider

which of the two alliances was to be preferred, since they could not possibly stand neuter, while the two rivals were making war under the very walls of Syracuse. As for me, said Apollonides, if I may be allowed to declare my private opinion, the love I bear my country inclines me to the Romans, who have shewed us a steady friendship, and protected us for fifty years together. Hiero sided with the Romans, and how happy were we during the whole time of his long reign? Hieronymus entered into an alliance with Hannibal, and hence his untimely end, and our present disturbances. In what then have the Carthaginians deserved the preference? He added to this one very material consideration, which was, that if they declared against the Romans, they would have the war immediately upon their hands; whereas on the side of Carthage the danger was more remote. This discourse made no small impression on the minds of the people, who ordered, that a certain number of military officers should be joined in commission with the prætors and the chief men in the senate to deliberate on the matter. Accordingly the council was held, and after long and warm debates, it appeared, that Syracuse had no just cause to break with Rome. So that it was declared, that the treaty of peace concluded with the Romans should be continued, and an embassy sent to Marcellus to renew it. But the consul would not accept of the alliance, unless Leontini and the other cities, which had been subject to the kings, were included in the treaty. Hippocrates and Epicydes were overjoyed to hear that the signing of the treaty was put off, being resolved to imbroider matters, and create a misunderstanding between Rome and Syracuse on the first opportunity; and one offered in a few days. The Leontines, being harassed by their neighbours, sent to demand aid of the Syracusians, who willingly granted them their request, thinking this a favourable opportunity to discharge their city of a turbulent unruly multitude, and to remove their no less dangerous leaders. Hippocrates was therefore charged to march at the head of the mercenaries and Roman deserters, to the number of four thousand men, into the territory of Leontini, and cover their borders against the incursions of their troublesome neighbours. Hippocrates was not at all displeased with this new commission; he immediately left Syracuse, and, not content to defend the Leontines, and ravage the territories of their enemies, made incursions into the Roman province, and laid waste the lands belonging to Rome, which bordered on the country of the Leontines. In this he acted contrary to the orders he had received; but his only view was to provoke the Romans, and oblige them to commit commit hostilities in the territories of Syracuse, where he succeeded; for Appius Claudius, who was then the Roman prætor in that part of Sicily, not being able to bear the insults of Hippocrates, marched his troops to the frontiers of his province, and there posted them in different places, with orders to oppose the Syracusan prætor, and repel force by force. This was what Hippocrates wanted, and accordingly, pretending that the Romans were come to attack him, he fell upon one of Appius's detachments, and cut the whole body in pieces. Marcellus, upon advice of these proceedings, sent deputies to Syracuse, enjoining them to declare before the senate and people, that no alliance was to be expected with Rome, so long as these two enemies to the Roman name continued in Sicily, and therefore to insist upon their being banished the island. The Syracusians shewed a great readiness to comply with the consul's request, and orders were given for the apprehending of Epicydes, Hippocrates being at that time in the territory of the Leontines at the head of an army. But Epicydes, having timely notice of the design of the Syracusians, made his escape, and took sanctuary in Leontini, where he hoped to create new troubles. He was there received by his colleague, and both together used their utmost endeavours to imbroid the Leontines with the Syracusians, by stirring them up to resume their antient liberty. The city of Leontini had been always subject to Hiero and Hieronymus; but in more antient times an independent state, and was now inclined to throw off the yoke, and recover its antient rights and privileges. This disposition of the people Epicydes made use of to attach them to his interest, openly declaring, that neither he, nor his colleague Hippocrates, would ever abandon them, till they were as free as Syracuse herself. What, said he, shall Leontini be in a worse condition than Syracuse? Shall that imperious city shake off the yoke of her kings, and at the same time keep you in slavery? That liberty, which Syracuse is so proud of, took birth within your walls. The blood of Hieronymus was shed here; the cry of liberty was first heard among you. What then prevents you from procuring that freedom for yourselves, which Syracuse found in your city? Hippocrates and I will assist you to the utmost of our power, and promise you, in the name of our republic, and in that of the great Hannibal, that you shall be soon in a condition to act as independently of Syracuse, as that city has done of you. The name of liberty was so agreeable to the Leontines, that with one consent they declared Hippocrates and Epicydes their generals, protesting, that whatever measures Syracuse might take, they would enter into none, but such as were approved of by their new commanders. Hence, when the Syracusians sent to complain of the hostilities committed against the Romans, and to demand, that Epicydes and Hippocrates should be expelled Sicily, neither their complaints nor demands were heard. They received only this proud answer, that the republic of Leontini had not empowered that of Syracuse to comprehend her in their alliance with the Romans<sup>u</sup>.

Leontini

Marcel-

THE Syracusan deputies informed the consul of the revolt of the Leontines, and not only left him at liberty to declare war against them without any infraction of the treaty made with their republic, but even offered to assist him in so just a war, on condition, that the Leontines, when subdued, should again be subject to the Syracusians their antient masters. Marcellus immediately took upon him the command of the troops which served under Appius the prætor, whom he appointed his lieutenant, and marched against the city of Leontini. The legionaries were so enraged at the remembrance of the unexpected massacre of their companions by Hippocrates, that they took the place at the first assault. Hippocrates and Epicydes had time to save themselves in the citadel, whence they withdrew the night following, and retired to Erbessus or Herbessus on the river Anapus, near the frontiers of the Syracusan territories. In their retreat they were informed, that a body of eight thousand men was marching from Syracuse under the command of Sosis and Dinomenes to join Marcellus. Whereupon the two cunning partizans of Hannibal hired men of their faction to meet those two commanders on the road, and to pretend, that they had escaped from the general slaughter at Leontini, where the Romans had put all the inhabitants to death, and burnt the city to the ground. Marcellus indeed had caused all the Roman deserters found in the place, to the number of two thousand, to be beheaded; but had treated both the inhabitants and the mercenary troops with his usual clemency; nay, he was busy at that very time in restoring the inhabitants their goods; and scarce any thing had been taken out of their houses but what the soldiers had seized in their first fury. However, this false report made such an impression on the soldiers, that their officers could not prevail upon them to march any farther, but were forced to lead them to Megara, a city in that neighbourhood. There they had a more certain account of what had passed at Leontini, and having discovered the cheat Hippocrates and Epicydes had put upon them, they resolved to be revenged, and pursued them to Erbessus. The two chiefs of the Carthaginian party, hearing that the Syracusians were on full march to Erbessus, and dreading the resentment of the two commanders, whom they had exasperated with the false reports which had caused a tumult in the army, took this desperate step. Remembering that they had formerly acquired great reputation among the Syracusan troops, that had served under them in the time of Hieronimus, and consisted chiefly of foreigners and mercenaries, they resolved to leave their asylum, meet the army, and throw themselves upon the mercy of the soldiers. It happened luckily for them, that a body of Cretans, who were greatly addicted to the Carthaginians, were marching at the head of the Syracusan army. These Cretans had formerly served the Romans as auxiliaries ; but being taken prisoners at the battle of Thrasymenus, had been kindly treated by Hannibal, and sent home without ransom. To them therefore Hippocrates and Epicydes addressed themselves as suppliants, and presenting them with olive-branches, which were the symbols of peace, Cretans, said they, we now expect you will shew us some marks of your friendship and gratitude, not suffering the Syracusians to give us up to the fury of the Romans. The Cretans, affected with their speech, immediately took them under their protection, and promised either to share their danger, or deliver them out of it. Sosis and Dinomenes ordered the two prisoners to be put in irons as enemies of the state, but the soldiers refused to obey their orders, protesting that they would stand by them to the last drop of their blood. So that the two generals were forced to let the criminals escape unpunished, and guard as well as they could against new intrigues. And now Hippocrates and Epicydes, seeing the disposition of the army, invented a stratagem worthy of Hannibal himself. They counterfeited a letter from the two generals to Marcellus, and hired a courier, who was to suffer himself to be taken in the road from Megara to Syracuse. The letter was couched in the following terms : Sosis and Dinomenes to the consul Marcellus, greeting. We are overjoyed to hear that you have put all the Leontines to the sword, especially the mercenaries who were commanded by Hippocrates. Our republic will never be at rest while we have any of these foreigners amongst us. Turn then your arms towards Megara, and deliver Syracuse from the mercenaries we command. It is easy to imagine what effect the reading of this letter must have had on the minds of the soldiers. They immediately cried, to arms, and would have fallen on their generals, if they had not saved themselves by flight to Syracuse, whither

the calumny followed them. For Hippocrates and Epicyles, having corrupted one of the soldiers who had been shut up in Leontini, sent him away to Syracuse, that he might appear there as an eye-witness of the pretended cruelties practised by Marcellus at the taking of the city. He exaggerated the inhumanity of the Romans, and declared that every thing had been destroyed by fire and sword. This report found credit not only among the common people, but even among some of the magistrates. The informer was brought into the senate, and being examined, his deposition raised a jealousy among the leading men of the republic, who thought it necessary to shut the gates of Syracuse, and guard the city against the Romans, as an enemy, whose avarice and cruelty would spare nothing. However, this falshood did not take with all; there were but few, besides the populace and soldiery, who gave into it; the rest were undeceived by Sosis and Dinomenes <sup>w</sup>.

IN the mean time Hippocrates and Epicyles, taking advantage of the absence of Sosis and Dinomenes, made themselves masters of the army, and so incensed them against their generals, that they were for cutting in pieces the few Syracusan troops that served among them, as privy to their design of destroying all the foreigners. But the two Carthaginians stopped their fury, not so much out of compassion as policy. They were sensible, that the massacre of those innocent men would have provoked the citizens of Syracuse against them; whereas by protecting them they secured to themselves both their friendship and that of their relations. Having taken these precautions, they began their march to Syracuse, and finding the gates shut, they prevailed upon the officers of the guard to open one, declaring, that their only design was to defend the city against the Romans. Some part of the army was already entered, when the Syracusan prætors, hastening to the gate, commanded it to be shut. But the soldiers without and populace within conspiring together, the few Syracusan troops, that were then under arms, could not prevent the whole army from entering the city, and possessing themselves of the quarter called Tyche. The prætors, retired to Acradina, but as they had only a handful of young citizens to defend it, that post was soon forced, and all the prætors who were there massacred, except Sosis, who escaped in the tumult, and took sanctuary in the Roman camp. Thus the two partizans of Carthage became masters of Syracuse, and, having the people and troops at their devotion, ruled with as absolute and arbitrary a sway as any tyrants had done before them. And now, foreseeing that Marcellus would soon lay siege to the city, they neglected nothing that was necessary to put it in a posture of defence. They gave the slaves their liberty, and enrolled them in the troops. They set free all prisoners, assembled the people to elect new prætors, and prevailed upon the blind multitude to elect them only, which was confirming the sovereignty they had usurped.

Marcellus no sooner heard that Epicydes and Hippocrates were become masters of Syracuse, but he left Leontini, and, at the entreaties of the prætors, who had fled for refuge to his camp, came and invested the city. The Roman prætor Appius still endeavoured to bring about an accommodation, and with this view sent two gallies to Syracuse, with ambassadors to negotiate a reconciliation between the Romans and the citizens. But one of the gallies being by a violent storm driven into the port, the Syracusians seized it, and by that act of hostility declared war. The other galley, which had the ambassadors on board, returned without landing them, lest the law of nations should be violated in their persons. However, Marcellus, who was encamped near the temple of Jupiter Olympius, about a mile and a half from the city, in order to bring the Syracusians to reason, sent in a new embassy. But Hippocrates and Epicydes, hearing of their approach, went out to meet them with a numerous attendance, not caring they should come into the city. The Roman, who was at the head of the embassy, addressing the Syracusians, told them, that the Roman consul was not come as an enemy to deprive them of their liberty, but to rescue them from the oppression they groaned under, and to revenge the death of their murdered prætors; and that if they suffered their magistrates, who had sheltered themselves in the Roman camp, to return and live at home quietly, if they delivered up into the consul's hands the authors of the late slaughter, and restored the city of Syracuse to its antient liberty, the Romans would have no occasion to make use of arms, or employ any violence. But, if they did not comply with these just demands, they should be obliged to treat them as enemies, and make them feel the most dreadful effects of war. To this Hippocrates haughtily replied, that if they intended to besiege Syracuse, they should soon be made sensible of the difference between that city and Leontini, and that as for their demands, they would grant none of them. Having made this short reply, he turned his back upon the deputies, returned into the city with his attendants, and caused Syracuse the gates to be shut. Marcellus therefore determined to be-besieged by siege the place by sea and land, and made the necessary pre-

Archime- WHEN the Romans had taken their posts, they hoped to des defends carry the city of Syracuse by assault, as they had lately done Syracuse that of Leontini. The attack was general, on the side of A- with his cradina by sea, and of Tyche by land. Marcellus took upon surprizing himself the command of the fleet, leaving the land forces to be machines. conducted by Appius. The city was twenty two miles in compass, and nevertheless Marcellus caused machines of various sorts to be raised all round it, in hopes of finding some weak place in so vast a compass of walls. But to his great surprize he found all places equally defended by the wonderful industry of a single man. This was the celebrated Archimedes, who, at the request of king Hiero, to whom he was related, had framed such engines of war, as quite disconcerted the measures of the Romans. That pacific prince had no occasion to make use of these master-pieces of art, during the whole length of his reign, nor, probably, did he ever imagine, that they would be first used against his faithful allies the Romans. But Hippocrates and Epicydes, finding how useful both the machines and the contriver might prove in so critical a conjuncture, prevailed upon that great mathematician to undertake the defence of his country ; and to his genius alone it was owing, that the city, though of so large a compass, held out near three years against the utmost efforts of a consular army. The immense preparations, which the consul made for the taking of the city by storm, could not have failed carrying it, had it not been defended by Archimedes.
The Roman fleet consisted of sixty quinqueremes, besides a far greater number of other ships. The decks were covered with soldiers armed with darts, slings, and bows, to drive the besieged from the ramparts, which on the side of Acradina were washed by the sea, and to facilitate the approach to the walls. But a machine of Marcellus's own invention was what he chiefly depended on. He had fastened together sideways eight gallies of different lengths, which made but one large body, and were rowed only by the oars of the outermost gallies. These eight gallies, thus joined, served only as a basis for a machine, which was raised up higher than the highest towers of the walls, and had at the top a platform, guarded with parapets in front and on each side. This machine was called a Sambuca, from its resemblance to a musical instrument of that name, not unlike a harp. The consul's design was to bring his sambuca to the foot of the walls of Arcadina ; but while it was still at a considerable distance (and it advanced very slow being moved only by two ranks of rowers) Archimedes discharged from one of his engines a vast stone, weighing according to Plutarch's account (R), twelve hundred and fifty pounds, then a second, and immediately after a third, all which, falling upon the sambuca with a dreadful noise, broke its supports, and gave the gallies, upon which it stood, such a violent shock, that they parted, and the machine, which Marcellus had raised upon them, at a vast trouble and expence, was battered to pieces. At the same time several other machines, which were not visible without the walls, and consequently did not lessen the confidence of the Romans in the assault, played incessantly upon their ships, and overwhelmed them with showers of stones, rafters, and beams pointed with iron. Infomuch, that Marcellus, being at a loss what to do, retired with all possible haste, and sent orders to his land-forces to do the same ; for the attack on the land-side was attended with no better success, the ranks being broke and thrown into the utmost confusion by the stones and darts, which flew with such noise, force, and ra-

(R) It is not easy to conceive how the machines formed by Archimedes could throw stones of ten quintals, or of ten talents weight, as Plutarch expresses it (43). at the fleet of Marcellus, when it was at a considerable distance from the walls of Syracuse. If what Plutarch affirms be true, our artillery falls short of those frightful machines. Some have therefore questioned that author's account, and adhered to Polybius, who reduces the stones, that were thrown by the Balistæ made by Archimedes, to the weight of ten pounds. If we suppose that each of these stones, or rather rocks, weighed ten quintals, we cannot compute them at less than twelve hundred and fifty pounds weight each, at the rate of an hundred and twenty five pounds each quintal or talent, according to the custom of computing received among the antient Greeks, and here used by Plutarch. Livy seems to agree with Polybius, and only says, that the machines of Archimedes threw stones of a great weight on the gallies of Marcellus. If we reckon the talents mentioned by Plutarch, according to the talents used in Sicily, the stones will be reduced to the weight of 125 pounds only ; nay, some authors infer from various passages of Suidas, Pollux, and Festus, that the talent of Sicily scarce weighed ten pounds.

pidity, that they struck the Romans with terror, and dashed all to pieces before them †.

Marcellus surprised, though not discouraged, at this artificial storm, which he did not expect, held a council of war, in which it was resolved, the next day before sun-rise, to come up close under the wall, and keep there. They were in hopes by this means to secure themselves against this terrible storm of stones and darts, which fell on the ships when at a distance. But Archimedes had prepared engines, which were adapted to all distances. When the Romans therefore had brought their ships close under the wall, and thought themselves well covered, they were unexpectedly overwhelmed with a new shower of darts and stones, which fell perpendicularly on their heads, which obliged them to retire with great precipitation. But they were no sooner got at some distance, than a new shower of darts overtook them, which made a dreadful havock of the men, while stones of an immense weight, discharged from other machines, either disabled or broke in pieces most of their galleys. This loss they sustained without being able to revenge it in the least on the enemy. For Archimedes had placed most of his engines behind the walls, and not only out of the reach, but even out of the sight of the enemy; so that the Romans were repulsed with a dreadful slaughter, without seeing the hand that occasioned it, as if they had been fighting, to use Plutarch's expression, not with men, but with the gods themselves. What most harassed the Romans in the attack by sea was, a sort of crow with iron claws, fastened to a long chain, which was let down by a kind of lever. The weight of the iron made it fall with great violence, and drove it into the planks of the galleys. Then the besieged, by a great weight of lead at the other end of the lever, weighed it down, and consequently raised up the iron of the crow in proportion, and with it the prow of the galley, to which it was fastened, sinking the poop at the same time into the water. After this the crow letting go its hold all on a sudden, the prow of the galley fell with such force into the sea, that the whole vessel was filled with water, and sunk. At other times the machines dragging ships to the shore by hooks, dashed them to pieces against the points of the rocks, which projected under the walls. Other vessels were quite lifted up into the air, there whirled about with incredible rapidity, and then let fall into the sea, and sunk with all that were in them. How these stupendous works were effected, few, if any, have hitherto been able to understand. Some writers are of opinion, that Plutarch and Polybius, from whom we have these accounts, had no better authority for their relations than a tradition, founded only on the ignorance of those who handed it down to them. The Romans, say they, in the time of Marcellus, did not value themselves upon diving into the secrets of mechanism, and therefore to extol the conqueror of Syracuse, took pleasure in magnifying every thing, and making miracles of the most common effects of mechanics. Thus some authors reason, and chuse to lessen the credit of venerable writers, and of Archimedes himself, rather than honestly confess, that the machines, as described by Polybius, Plutarch, and Livy, were wonders of mechanism, which all mankind are not capable of understanding.

THE troops under the command of Appius suffered no less in this second attack than the fleet. In the whole space of ground, which the army, when formed, took up, the last files, as well as the first, were overwhelmed with showers of darts and flints, against which they could not possibly defend themselves. When they had with infinite trouble brought the mantelets and covered galleries, under which they were to work the rams, near the foot of the wall, Archimedes discharged such large beams and stones upon them as crushed them to pieces. If any brave Roman ventured to draw too near to the wall, iron hooks were immediately let down from above, which, taking hold of his cloaths, or some part of his body, lifted him up in the air, and dashed out his brains with the fall. Thus one single man repulsed two Roman armies, by mere dint of genius, without having any occasion to make use of the sword. The Syracusians were no more than his instruments in managing the machines according to his directions, while he himself was the soul that presided over all their powers and operations. Marcellus, though at a loss what to do, could not, however, forbear expressing himself with pleasantry; shall we persist, said he to his workmen, in making war upon this Briareus, upon this giant with an hundred hands? But the soldiers were so terrified, that if they saw upon the walls only a small cord, or the least piece of wood, they immediately turned their backs and fled, crying out, that Archimedes was going to discharge some dreadful machine upon them<sup>2</sup>.

Marcellus and Claudius, seeing their troops thus disheartened, and having no hopes of making a breach in the walls, called a council, in which it was resolved to turn the siege into a blockade, shut up all the avenues to the place both by sea and land, and force it to surrender by famine. But, in the mean time, that so great an army might not continue inactive before one single city, Marcellus, leaving Appius before Syracuse to intercept all convoys to it, put himself at the head of two-thirds of the Roman troops, and set out to reconquer the cities, which, in this general disturbance of Sicily, had deserted the Romans. Elorum and Herbessus surrendered of their own accord, and were kindly treated by the conqueror; but Megara, having stood a siege, was taken, and razed to the ground, which struck no small terror into the Syracusians, who now began to fear the like fate. After Marcellus had reduced a great many cities without opposition, there being no army in the field to oppose him, at last Hamilco entered the port of Heraclea with a numerous fleet sent from Carthage, and landed twenty thousand foot, three thousand horse, and twelve elephants. His forces were no sooner set ashore, but he marched against Agrigentum, which he retook from the Romans, with several other cities lately reduced by Marcellus. Upon the news of his arrival and progress, which were soon known at Syracuse, the garison, which was yet entire, and had suffered no hardships from the siege, was very impatient to take the field, and join Hamilco. Accordingly it was resolved, that Epicydes should command in the city, during the blockade, and Hippocrates march out at the head of ten thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, to carry on the war in concert with Hamilco, and stop the progress of Marcellus. This design was executed in the night without difficulty. Hippocrates, at the head of his detachment, broke through the Roman lines, and encamped at Acrillæ, a small town to the south of Syracuse.

In the mean time Marcellus, after having made a vain attempt upon Agrigentum, which was held by Hamilco, was returning with his army to Syracuse. He did not know that Hippocrates had broke out of the besieged city, and was so near him; but nevertheless marched in good order for fear of a surprize. As he drew near Acrillæ, he unexpectedly discovered the enemy busy in fortifying their camp, in order to pass the night there. Whereupon he advanced in great haste, and, falling upon them before they had time to draw up, cut eight thousand of them in pieces. The cavalry, with a small body of infantry, made their escape, under the conduct of Hippocrates, to Acræ (S), a city belonging to Syracuse; and Marcellus,

(S) Acræ was built, according to Thucydides (44), by the Syracusians about the fourth year of the eighth Olympiad, seventy years after

Marcellus, after this victory, which kept several cities steady in the interest of Rome, pursued his march to Syracuse, and kept it more closely blocked up than ever <sup>a</sup>.

WHILE Marcellus and Appius continued inactive before Syracuse, succours were brought both to the Carthaginians and Romans, the two republics being resolved to make their utmost efforts in Sicily. Bomilcar arrived at Syracuse with a fleet of fifty sail; and about the same time a Roman fleet brought a whole legion to Panormus. This legion Hamilco hoped to surprize before they reached the Roman camp, but they luckily kept along the coast, and arrived safe at cape Pachynum, while Hamilco, expecting they would have crossed the country, lay in wait for them at a great distance from the shore. At Pachynum Appius met them with a large detachment, and conducted them to the main body of the army before Syracuse. As for Bomilcar, the Carthaginian admiral, soon after his arrival he put to sea again, and returned to Carthage, upon advice, that the Roman fleet, which was far more strong than his, was advancing to attack him. Hamilco, being joined by Hippocrates, and the few troops that had escaped the late slaughter, advanced to Syracuse, in order to draw Marcellus to a battle. But, finding the Roman general kept close in his lines, which were well fortified, he left Syracuse, and marching about the country drew several cities off from the Romans. Murgantia betrayed the Roman garison into his hands and surrendered. Enna, a city of great importance, intended to follow the example of Murgantia. But Pinarius, the commander of the garison, being alarmed at the reports which were spread of the revolt of many cities, after having massacred the Roman garisons, kept part of his men under arms night and day, so that all the Sicilian artifices to deceive him proved ineffectual. He set and relieved the guards himself, and was ever ready against all events, as if Hamilco had been at the gates. The inhabitants therefore, who had promised to deliver up the city to Hamilco, finding that Pinarius could not be surprised, resolved to attempt something by open after the foundation of Syracuse. Cluverius plainly proves from the march which Hippocrates here takes, and from the old itineraries, that this city stood near the monastery, which the Sicilians call Santa Maura d'Arcia, between the cities of Noto and Avula, about twenty four miles from Syracuse.

force, and, assembling in crowds, demanded of him the keys of their city. Pinarius calmly told them, that he had received the keys of the city, and his commission to guard it, from his general; that it was in vain to apply to him while the consul was within reach; and, lastly, that he could not disobey the orders of his general, without drawing upon himself and his family the severest punishments. The Ennenses answered, that if he did not of his own accord comply with their request, they would deliver themselves from their present slavery by force. To which Pinarius replied, that since they would not be at the trouble of recurring to Marcellus, he desired they would at least suffer an assembly of the people to be called, that he might know, whether this was the motion of a few only, or of the whole city. This being granted, and the assembly appointed to meet the next day, Pinarius, perceiving that the multitude were determined to come to some violent resolution, took his measures accordingly. In order to secure himself against their furious attempts, he retired with his garison into the citadel, and there acquainted them with the danger that threatened them. The perfidious Ennenses, said he, design to put us all to death, and then surrender themselves up to the Carthaginians. An assembly of the people is appointed to meet to-morrow. By break of day therefore our fate or that of the treacherous Sicilians must be determined. If we are not by that time masters of their lives and fortunes, they will be of ours. Let us not then suffer them to prevent us. Arm yourselves, and wait for a signal from me. I shall be at the assembly, and when I give you a signal with my robe, make a great shout, fall on the citizens, and cut them in pieces without giving any quarter. Having thus spoke, he posted some of his troops in the avenues to the market-place, and others in the theatre, where the assembly was held. As soon as it was day, Pinarius came to the place appointed, and represented to the multitude, that he could not surrender the keys, without incurring the displeasure of his general, which would prove fatal to him and his children. Upon this the whole multitude cried out, that he must deliver the keys, and that as to the incurring the displeasure of his general, that was nothing to them. They then crowded round him and began to offer violence, when Pinarius starting up, Your blood, said he, shall atone for the affront you offer a Roman officer, and immediately gave the signal agreed on, and the soldiers rushing in upon the unarmed multitude began the slaughter. Some posted themselves at the doors that none might escape, others sword in hand fell upon those who had surrounded their commander. The floor and seats of the theatre theatre were in an instant covered with blood, and as many were stifled in endeavouring to escape, as fell by the sword. The slaughter in the streets was no less dreadful, the dead and wounded lying every-where in heaps; none were spared, and the city was treated as if it had been taken by assault, and given up to the soldiers to be plundered. Thus Enna was kept in the hands of the Romans, who excused their conduct on this occasion by saying, that they had only been before-hand with those, who designed to treat them in the same manner. And indeed Marcellus, who was a man of a very mild and humane temper, approved of this action, and even granted the soldiers all the plunder which had been found in the city. But, as the city of Enna was consecrated to Ceres and her daughter Proserpine, the Sicilians were highly offended at the massacre of the Ennenses, and their revolts became daily more frequent <sup>b</sup>.

IN the mean-time Marcellus, having kept all the avenues to Syracuse shut up the whole summer, thought it advisable to put his men into winter-quarters, in some place near the besieged city; and accordingly retired to Leon (T) in that neighbourhood, to watch there the city and keep it blocked up till spring. He sent Appius Claudius to Rome, that prætor intending to ask the consulship against the next year, a dignity which he had well deserved. T. Quintius Crispinus, one of Marcellus's lieutenants, was put in his room, and soon after new consuls being created, viz. Q. Fabius Maximus and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Marcellus, from being consul, became proconsul in Sicily, and commander in chief of all the Roman forces there.

WHEN the season of the year suffered the proconsul to take the field again, he was at a loss what to do; some of his offi-

(T) The town of Leon stood north of Syracuse, six or seven furlongs from Hexapylum, as Thucydides informs us (45) Hexapylum was a stately building, which served for an entrance into Syracuse by the quarter called Tyche. Livy (46) reckons the distance between Hexapylum and Leon to be five thousand paces. But this seems very improbable; for Marcellus encamped there with a design to continue the blockade of Syracuse. Interpreters therefore commonly take for granted, that the text of Livy is corrupted, and that we ought to read Mille & quingentis passibus, instead of quinque milia passuum. By this correction Livy's account agrees better with that of Thucydides.

cers advised him to attack Hamilco in Agrigentum, and others to return to his trenches before Syracuse and continue the blockade. But the wise proconsul foresaw, that it would be impossible for him to take the city, either by force, while it was defended by Archimedes, or by famine, while the Carthaginian fleet, which was returned far more numerous than before, supplied it with provisions. He therefore thought, that the only expedient was to try whether he could make himself master of Syracuse by some secret intelligence. There were many Syracusians in his camp, who had taken refuge there in the beginning of the troubles. Marcellus therefore disclosed his scheme to these faithful allies, and impowered them to offer their countrymen their lives and liberties, if they surrendered to the Romans. The Syracusians in the camp zealously entered into the proconsul's measures; but as they found it impossible to carry on a correspondence with their friends in the city, they resolved to send into Syracuse a trusty slave, as a deserter, to acquaint their friends with the proconsul's proposals. The slave acquitted himself of his charge with great fidelity, and above fourscore persons of distinction, hiding themselves under the nets in a fisher-boat, came successively to the Roman camp and conferred in person with Marcellus. But when the conspiracy was upon the point of taking effect, one Attalus, in resentment for not having been admitted into it, discovered the whole to Epicyles who put all the conspirators to death.

Marcellus, seeing his scheme thus defeated, found himself involved in new difficulties. Nothing came into his thoughts but the grief and shame of raising a siege, after having spent so much time in it, and lost great numbers of men and ships. While he was deliberating what to do, an unforeseen accident revived his hopes of gaining at last the place. Epicyles had sent one Damippus, a Lacedemonian, to demand succours of Philip king of Macedon, who had already entered into a treaty with the Carthaginians. Damippus, was taken by some ships of the Roman squadron, and brought to the camp of Marcellus. But Epicyles, extremely concerned at his detention, expressed a great desire to ransom the prisoner, and the Roman general was not averse to it, Rome having her reasons to keep up a good understanding with Lacedemon at that time. Conferences therefore were appointed to be held near Syracuse, at a place called Portus Trogilorum (U), by the foot of a tower

(U) Trogilorum was a name common both to a suburb and a port near Syracuse; both which lay north of Tyche and Acradina. As tower called Galeagra. As the deputies went to and fro, it came into a Roman soldier's thoughts to consider the wall with attention. After having counted the stones, which were all of an equal size, and examined with his eye the measure of each, he found that the wall was not so high as had been imagined, and concluded, that it might be scaled with ladders of a moderate size. The soldier therefore, without loss of time, gave the proconsul an account of what he had observed, and Marcellus did not neglect the hint; he examined the place himself, and found that the soldier's observations were very just. But the difficulty was how to come with his men to the place, which indeed was weak, but well defended with Archimedes's machines, and guarded with extraordinary care. While Marcellus was meditating with himself by what stratagem he might surprize the centinels there on guard, a deserter informed him, that the Syracusans were on a certain day to begin the celebration of the festival of Diana (W), which lasted three days, and that Epicydes, who wanted other provisions, designed to distribute wine in great plenty among the people and soldiers. Upon this advice Marcellus resolved to attack the city in one of the nights during the festival, not confining the assault to the weak place, but making it general. To this end he held a council with some tribunes of the army, and chose out a certain number of the most resolute centurions, giving them leave to select a thousand men out of the whole army. These were ordered first to take a repast, and then to repose till the trumpet called them. In the mean time ladders were prepared with great secrecy, to prevent the enemy from being informed by their spies. The Roman general determined to make his attack, when the townsmen and soldiers, after having drunk plentifully, were in their first sleep. The scaling-ladders were committed to the tower called Galeagra, it stood near the Portus Trogilorum, where Tyche and Acradina joined.

(W) This festival was celebrated in honour of Diana under the name of Artemis, not only at Syracuse, but at Delphos, and in most cities of Greece. On this occasion they offered to the goddess a mullet, as being thought to bear some sort of relation to her; because it is said to hunt and kill the sea-hare (47). The bread offered to the goddess was called Lochia, and the women, who performed the sacred rites, Lombai (48). The Greeks celebrated no fewer than twenty two festivals in honour of Diana; of which Johnson in his work, intitled, de Fests Græcorum, gives a minute and distinct account.

to the management of one single manipulus or company, consisting of an hundred and twenty men. Those advanced silently to the foot of the wall, to which they applied their ladders, and made themselves masters of the tower Galeagra, without meeting with the least opposition, or even being discovered, the soldiers being all asleep after their debauch. When the first had gained the top of the ramparts without noise or tumult, the others followed, encouraged by the boldness and success of their leaders. At length this whole detachment, consisting of a thousand chosen men, got safe and undiscovered into the city. In the mean time another detachment, taking advantage of the enemy's stillness, for they were all either drunk or asleep, beat down one of the gates of Hexapylum, and gave a free passage to a great body of Romans on that side. Other detachments scaled the walls in different parts, and they all met at Hexapylum, which had before been appointed for the place of their general rendezvous. The Romans now kept silence no longer, but advanced in order of battle, and made themselves masters of the quarter called Epipolæ, which was encompassed with the same common wall as Ortygia, Acradina, Tyche, and Neapolis; had its own citadel called Euryalum on the top of a steep rock, and was, we may say, a fifth city. Here the Romans spent the night, making a dreadful noise with their trumpets in order to strike terror into the enemy. The sound was not heard all over this vast city, but it reached far enough to alarm all Tyche, and throw that quarter into the utmost consternation; some of the inhabitants there, thinking the Romans already in possession of the whole city, leaped down from the walls into the ditch, while others, falling in with the Roman guards, were cut in pieces. Notwithstanding this confusion, Marcellus waited till day-break, and then having beat down the stately entrance with six gates, called Hexapylum, he entered Tyche with his army in battalions.

In the mean time Epicydes, who was quartered in the farthest part of Ortygia, at a great distance from the places possessed by the Romans, hearing that the enemy had seized on Epipolæ and Tyche, went out of the island, and crossed Acradina at the head of a numerous body of mercenaries, with a design to drive the Romans from their posts, imagining that only a few desperate men had scaled the wall. But when he saw, to his great surprize, all Epipo- læ full of legionaries, after a slight skirmish, he retired into Acradina, to allay the people's fears and prevent a tumult. Then Marcellus marching from Tyche to Epipolæ joined the detachment, which had possessed themselves of that quarter in the night. As Marcellus was now on the point of becoming master of one of the finest and most opulent cities in the world, his officers did not fail to congratulate him on his success. But he, considering from an eminence the beauty and extent of that great and stately metropolis, is said to have shed tears, being touched with compassion on the miseries, to which so many inhabitants, formerly rich and fortunate, were going to be reduced. He called to mind the two powerful Athenian fleets, which had been sunk before this city, and the two numerous armies cut in pieces with the illustrious generals who commanded them; the many wars sustained with so much valour against the Carthaginians; the famous tyrants and kings, who had reigned in that antient metropolis, Hiero particularly, who had signalized himself by the important services he had rendered the people of Rome, whose interests had been as dear to him as his own; moved with these reflections, and his natural inclination to try gentle methods before he used violence, he thought it incumbent upon him to engage the Syracusan noblemen of his party to solicit their countrymen to surrender of their own accord, that they might thereby prevent the sacking of the city. The soldiers murmured a little at the general's good nature, looking upon Syracuse and its immense riches as a sure booty. Their wishes were but too successful, for the Syracusians would hearken to no proposals, though the Romans were already masters of a considerable part of the city. Acradina, the strongest and best part of the city, was not yet taken, and Epicydes had appointed the Roman deserters to guard it, who, as they were to die according to the Roman laws, though the town were taken by composition, watched all the avenues to it with extreme care. Marcellus therefore, leaving Acradina, turned his arms against the citadel of Epipolæ, called Eurydon, which was not yet taken. This fort stood on an eminence, some distance from the sea, and commanded the great road by which the convoys were brought into the city. The governor was an Argian, by name Philodemus, and had been entrusted with the defence of the place by Epicydes. Son, who had formerly taken sanctuary in the Roman camp, hoped to prevail upon him to capitulate. But the Greek, having demanded time to consider, put off the surrender of the citadel from day to day, not doubting but Mar-

milco and Hippocrates would hasten to the relief of Syracuse already half taken. Hereupon Marcellus, encamping between Neapolis and Tyche, cut off all communication with Epipolæ, hoping to reduce the citadel in a very short time by famine. In this new camp the inhabitants of Tyche and Neapolis sent deputies to him, entreating him to spare their lives, and preserve their houses from being plundered. Their city had been taken by assault, so that according to the laws of war the conqueror was master of their lives and fortunes. However, Marcellus shewed them some clemency. The plunder of the place was due to the soldiers, as a reward of their valour, and he could not deprive them of it without injustice. But he enjoined them under pain of death not to kill, or any ways abuse the inhabitants, and even posted guards in all the avenues to see that his orders were put in execution. No city was ever plundered with so much order or less cruelty. The soldiers, breaking open the houses, seized indeed every thing they found, money, moveables, and provisions ; but did not offer the least violence to the vanquished. The booty was immense, but it only raised their expectations of a greater, when Acradina and Ortygia should be taken. During this military execution, Philodemus, governor of the citadel of Epipolæ, despairing of being able to subsist in the midst of a plundered city, which could not supply him any longer with provisions, came to terms with the proconsul, and being allowed to march out with his men and join Epicydes, put the citadel into the hands of the Romans. Then Marcellus, turning all his efforts against Acradina, blocked it up so close, that it could not hold out long without new supplies of men and provisions <sup>d</sup>.

DURING these transactions, Hamilco and Hippocrates appeared before Syracuse, and their arrival gave the Romans no small apprehension. Marcellus, as we have said, was shut up within the walls, being encamped between Neapolis, or the New City, and Tyche, in a place which was almost destitute of inhabitants ; Crispinus was not yet entered Syracuse, but still continued in the old post of the Romans. The two Carthaginian generals, after having taken a view of both camps, resolved to divide the attacks between them. Hamilco was to fall upon Marcellus's camp, while Hippocrates endeavoured to force the trenches of Crispinus. The Carthaginian fleet at the same time was drawn up in line of battle along the coast within reach of Acradina, so as to cut off all communication between the forces of Marcellus, which surrounded Acradina, and Crispinus. Hippocrates began the attack, and fell with the utmost fury upon the camp of Crispinus, but was three times repulsed with incredible bravery. At the same time Hamilco without, and Epicydes within the walls, attacked the posts of Marcellus; but were attended with no better success. Epicydes was forced to return into Acradina with great loss, and narrowly escaped being taken prisoner by Marcellus, who commanded there in person. After these two advantages the Roman general pitched three camps round Acradina, and kept it blocked up closer than ever, but durst not draw too near it for fear of the machines of Archimedes. The unfortunate Syracusians were now in the utmost distress for want of provisions, and, to complete their misfortunes, a plague broke out among them. The infection began in the country, being occasioned by the excessive heat of the season, and the unwholesome exhalations of the neighbouring marshes. The two camps of Hamilco and Crispinus were first infected with it, and from the latter it spread to Marcellus's army, by means of his communication with Crispinus. Soon after it began to rage in Acradina; so that, within and without the city, nothing was seen but persons dead or dying. None durst relieve or assist the sick, for fear of being infected by them; and the bodies of the dead were for the same reason left without burial, to infect and poison the air with their stench and corruption. Nothing was heard night and day but groans of dying men, and the heaps of dead bodies continually presented mournful objects to the living, who expected every moment the same fate. However, the distemper made less ravage in the two Roman armies, than in those of Hamilco and Hippocrates. As the latter had no place to retire to, and were not inured to the climate and air of the country, being for the most part but lately come from Africa, they died daily in great numbers, and at length Hamilco and Hippocrates themselves were carried off. Upon their death most of the Sicilian troops, which had joined the Carthaginians, disbanded and returned to their respective cities. Thus Marcellus was delivered from a great army, which had besieged him as close as he had done Acradina. He had now only a small body of Sicilians to contend with, for the Carthaginians, both officers and soldiers, were all swept off by the plague. The Sicilians retired to two small towns, strong by situation, and at a small distance from Syracuse, and there waited for a new reinforcement from Carthage, wher ther Bomilcar had failed to give the senate an account of the death of Hamilco and the utter ruin of his army. He allayed the grief, which this news occasioned, by representing, that the Romans had imprudently shut themselves up in one city to besiege another, that their troops were greatly diminished by the plague, and that it would be no difficult matter to besiege them, and bring them into the same straits, to which they had reduced Acradina. His speech revived the hopes of the senate, who gave him the command of an hundred and thirty gallies, with seven hundred transports, which formed a fleet considerably greater than that which the Romans had on the coasts of Sicily. With this squadron Bomilcar set sail from Carthage, and had a quick passage. The news of his return raised the courage of the besieged, and greatly disheartened the Romans, who were quite tired out with so long and tedious a siege. But as Bomilcar was for several days prevented by contrary winds, from doubling cape Pachynum, Marcellus had time to recollect himself, and cause his fleet to be got ready with a design to engage that of the Carthaginians, though far superior in number to his. In the mean time Epicydes, fearing lest the Carthaginians should be surprized by the Romans, took it into his head to leave Syracuse and go to the fleet, which was designed for his relief. On his arrival he found Bomilcar uneasy about the event of a battle, and very backward to engage the Romans, of whose preparations he had been already informed. But, nevertheless, he was prevailed upon by Epicydes to venture an engagement, and advanced in sight of the Roman fleet. Marcellus, who commanded it, as soon as the high winds abated, began to prepare for a battle, when all on a sudden, Bomilcar, doubling cape Pachynum, took to the main, and steered his course towards Tarentum, after having dispatched expresses to Heraclea, with orders to the transports, which lay there, to return to Africa. What induced him to take so sudden and unexpected a resolution was never known. Epicydes, being thus disappointed in the great hopes he had entertained, was afraid to return into a city already half taken, and therefore fled for refuge to Agrigentum, rather with a design to wait the event of the siege in a place of safety, than to make any attempts towards the relief of a city, which he had brought to destruction.

WHEN it was known in the camp of the Sicilians, that Epicydes had quitted Syracuse, and the Carthaginians Sicily, they sent deputies to Marcellus, after having founded the disposition

position of the besieged, to treat of a surrender. It was The Syra- unanimously agreed, both by the Sicilians in the camp and cusians the Syracusians in Acradina, to surrender on the following propose to terms, viz. that all the demesnes of the kings of Syracuse capitulate. should be delivered up to the Romans, and that Rome should suffer the Syracusians to live according to their own laws, and enjoy their estates and liberties. Marcellus was willing to grant them the terms they demanded, in order to prevent the spilling of blood and the ruining of so stately a city. But those, whom Epicycles had entrusted with the government of the city during his absence, opposed the wise measures of the inhabitants. As these were all strangers, they were little concerned for the welfare of Syracuse, and still retained some hopes of relief, either from Epicycles or Bomilcar. But the magistrates, seeing the city already reduced to great straits for want of provisions, resolved to get rid of their governors, and accordingly assassinated them all, and then having assembled the people in the market-place, introduced to them the deputies from the camp, who had hitherto treated only with themselves. These, in a speech well calculated for the occasion, represented to the people, that they ought not to impute the calamities they groaned under to fortune, since it was in their power to deliver themselves from them when they pleased; that the Romans had not undertaken the siege of Syracuse out of hatred, but out of affection, to the inhabitants, having no other view but to rescue them out of the hands of their tyrants; that Hippocrates and Epicycles had brought all their misfortunes upon them, but since one of them was carried off by the plague, and the other had deserted them out of fear, what remained but to have recourse to the clemency of the conqueror? The services, said they, of Hiero, and his faithful adherence to the Romans, are not entirely blotted out of their memories. Only consent to be reconciled to Rome, and you will be free and happy. Marcellus out of good nature offers you advantageous terms, which if you do not accept, all subsequent calamities will be intirely chargeable on yourselves. Seize therefore the present opportunity, and since you are delivered from your tyrants, let the first use you make of your liberty be to return to the Romans.*

THIS discourse was received with general applause; and the assembly thought proper to create new magistrates before the nomination of the deputies, to make the embassy to Mar- Deputies sent to Marcellus. cellus more solemn and authentic. Some of the prætors were

 “ that all her past achievements, whether by sea or land, will “ add to the glory of your triumph. Make it not then so “ much a point of honour to destroy it, as to leave it for a “ standing monument of your fame to the world. All strangers, from whatever part of the universe they shall come “ to Syracuse, and there observe the monuments of our antient victories over the Athenians and Carthaginians, will at “ the same time know, that Marcellus conquered this victorious people. They will be told, that the Syracusians are become perpetual clients of the Claudian family, and that “ Marcellus made himself their first patron by his valour and clemency. Let not the remembrance of Hieronimus be “ of more weight with you, than that of Hiero. The “ latter was much longer your friend, than the former

THE suppliants were graciously received by Marcellus, who was very willing to grant them their demands ; but the greatest difficulty was to preserve tranquillity and union in the city. The garison consisted of Roman deserters and mercenaries, and the former, looking upon all conferences about a surrender as so many sentences of death against themselves, used their utmost efforts to prevent the citizens from complying with the terms proposed by Marcellus. But finding all their endeavours unsuccessful, they applied themselves to the mercenaries and persuaded them that Marcellus would give them no quarter.

ter. Whereupon the mercenaries, being inspired with the same fear, joined the deserters, and both taking up arms, while the deputies were still in the camp of Marcellus, ran to the houses of the new prætors, whom they massacred, and then dispersing themselves on all sides, put to the sword all they met, without distinction, plundered the houses, and filled the city with blood and slaughter. That they might not be without leaders, they appointed six officers of their own body, three to command in Acradina and three in Ortygia. The tumult being at length appeased, the mercenaries were made sensible, that they had been imposed upon by the Roman deserters ; and the deputies, returning at the same time from the camp of Marcellus, assured them, that the Romans had not decreed any punishment against the foreign troops.

AMONG the six new governors, chosen by the seditious to Marcellus command in Syracuse, was a Spaniard, named Mericus, a man of great integrity, and who did not approve of the measures taken by his colleagues. This man Marcellus took upon him to gain over to the Romans, and with this view sent into the city a young Spaniard lately come from Spain, charging him to make great offers in his name to his countryman, provided he would do him some important service. The young Spaniard got safe into the city among the attendants of the Syracusan ambassadors, and discharged his commission so well, that Mericus sent his brother privately to Marcellus with the Spanish soldier, who having obtained a private audience agreed with Marcellus, in the name of Mericus, to deliver up one of the gates to the Romans. As soon as the two Spaniards were returned into Acradina, Mericus made it his only business to perform his promise. He first feigned an extraordinary zeal for the defence of the city, pretending, that the deputies of Marcellus were allowed too much liberty, and that it was dangerous to admit any such deputies into Acradina, or to send embassies to the Romans. Upon the credit of this first step he proposed that, as they had to deal with so artful an enemy as Marcellus, each governor should have his distinct quarter of the city assigned him, and should be responsible for any neglect of duty in it. His advice was followed, and in this division that part of Acradina fell to him, which lay between the fountain of Arethusa and the great port, not far from the island Ortygia. Marcellus, being informed in what part Mericus commanded, resolved to make an attempt on that side. Accordingly, having filled a transport with soldiers, he ordered them to land at the gate of Arethusa, where they were received within the walls by Mericus, and put in possession of the gate. A false attack was carried on at the same time in a neighbouring quarter, which drew all the enemies forces out of the island, and diverted them from observing what happened at the gate Arethusa. As the island of Ortygia was by this means quite abandoned, Marcellus, who had foreseen this, sent several transports with a strong detachment to take possession of the island, which they did without opposition, the gate being left open by the garison, while they halted to repulse the enemy at the place where the false attack was carried on. When Marcellus was informed, that his men were in possession of the island, which was reckoned impregnable, and also of a quarter in Acradina, he immediately caused the retreat to be sounded, lest the soldiers should, in the heat of the action, plunder the treasures of the kings of Syracuse, which were much magnified by fame<sup>f</sup>.

AND now Marcellus, after a three years siege, being at length become master of the unfaithful city, gave signal proofs of his clemency and good nature. The place was taken by assault, and had greatly provoked the Romans by joining their most avowed enemies, while they were engaged in a war, that was likely to prove fatal to them. But notwithstanding their infidelity, he would not use all the rights of a conqueror, nor practice that severity which the faithless city perhaps deserved. The first instance he gave of his good nature was, his ordering that the Roman deserters should be suffered to escape, being unwilling to shed the blood even of traitors. Accordingly a gate was left open for them, and all the Roman forces withdrawn from thence till they had made their escape. The inhabitants of the two conquered cities sent deputies to him, demanding nothing else but their own lives and the lives of their children. These Marcellus received with great humanity, and having assembled a council composed of his own officers and of some Syracusians who were in his camp, returned them the following answer. “ Syracusians, said he to them, “ the services which good king Hiero rendered Rome in a “ long reign, have been exceeded by the insults you have offered her in a few years ; and now you are going to reap the “ fruits of your unfaithfulness, and pay dearer for the breach “ of your treaties than we desire. My aim was not, in sitting down before Syracuse, to reduce you to slavery, but “ to deliver you from your tyrants, and prevail upon you to “ deliver up into my hands two men, who have now abandoned you without sharing the misfortunes they have “ brought upon you. Both the examples of your magistrates

 “ for myself, the glory of having taken Syracuse, and the sa-army to take possession of the kings treasures for the use of the republic, and gave the rest of the booty up to his troops with-

As soon as the trumpets sounded, the Roman soldiers dispersed themselves all over Ortygia and Acradina, and nothing escaped their avarice. Nay, the enraged soldiers went be-his memory to the utmost of his power. He made a diligent and granted them peculiar privileges. He likewise caused his a monument to be erected to his memory, among the great short digression, and give the reader some account of so extraordinary a person. He was born in Syracuse, and descended of an illustrious family, being related to king Hiero. Most of the antients tell us, that he was no less considerable for his noble extraction, than sublime genius. Yet Cicero represents him as a man of a very mean birth, who had nothing to recommend him, but his skill in geometry<sup>b</sup>; and the only elogium he bestows on this famous mathematician is, that he had a fruitful genius, and made many fine discoveries. But the Roman orator knew no more of Archimedes than what he had learned of Polybius, who only mentioned such endowments, as have made his name immortal, and these were not so much esteemed by the Romans in Cicero's times, who thought no merit equal to that of an orator, a general, or a statesman. And hence it is, that Cicero prefers Archytas and Plato to Archimedes. The former had governed Tarentum, and, together with a singular talent for the mathematics, had all the qualities of an excellent general. The latter was eminent among the antient legislators, which was enough to gain him the preference in the opinion of the Romans. But Archimedes was neither a statesman, nor a soldier, nor an orator. But if we consider, that he alone found means to disconcert all the measures of one of the greatest officers of the Roman republic, and by the force of his genius rendered all the efforts of two numerous armies unsuccessful, we cannot without injustice degrade him so far, as to place him after an Archytas, or a Plato. And therefore Plutarch speaks of him with admiration: He says, that his great genius made him be looked upon as something more than a mortal, that he excelled all those who had gone before him, and that it was hardly credible any should in future ages ever rival him. His strong passion for mathematics gave room for the report, that he was continually so charmed with the soothing songs of a domestic syren, that he neglected the common concerns of life: For he took delight in no pleasure of life, but in that of study. For the sake of this he despised every thing else. Not to interrupt his studies he often denied himself the necessaries of life, and was dragged from his contemplations, to take a frugal repast. Sensible only to the pleasures of the mind, he so neglected his person, that his friends were obliged in a manner to force him to the public baths, to make him preserve a decency suitable to his rank; and even then he employed himself for the most part in drawing mathematical figures, on the walls of the stoves with the water in which he bathed. In short, the contemplation of the heavens and the earth gave him such delight as rendered all other pleasures quite tasteless to him and insipid. He long confined his thoughts to speculations only, according to the prejudice of that time, when it was thought too low an employment for a great genius to reduce the sublime discoveries of the mind to practice. But king Hiero had sufficient power with him to make him descend from those sublime speculations to practice, and to convince him, that no man could without ingratitude, deprive the public of the fruits of his private studies. One day when Archimedes was explaining to the king the wonderful effects of the motive powers, he told him, that he had invented, but not made, a machine, by which he could draw the whole globe of the earth to him, provided he could find another globe or earth to stand on. The king, surprized at the proposal, desired him to give a proof of so bold an assertion, by removing some great weight with a small force. Archimedes complied with the king's request, and having caused one of the heaviest galleys in the port to be drawn ashore by a great number of men, he built his machine, and then sitting down at a proper distance from the galley, without trouble or exerting his force in the least, drew the vessel to him, though she had her full lading in her, and was crowded with men. This experiment plainly shewed the king what use he might make of the wonderful talents of this great man, if he could only persuade him to put his inventions in practice. This the king undertook to do, and by many intreaties prevailed upon the speculative geometriician to descend to mechanics, and build those wonderful machines for the defending of cities, which we have spoke of above. Besides the warlike machines, amongst his master-pieces was reckoned a sphere of glass, the circles of which represented the periodical and synodical motions of the stars and planets. Cicero himself could not help doing justice to the inventor of so fine a work, saying, that we ought to look upon the artificial globe, or rather little world, in which Archimedes had so happily imitated the wise hand of the divine architect of the universe, as the effect of a superior genius<sup>1</sup> (X). Some have have falsely imagined, that Archimedes set fire to the Roman fleet by means of a burning glass<sup>k</sup>. But the honour of this invention is due to Proclus, who first made use of brazen burning-glasses, to set on fire the ships of Vitalian, who besieged Constantinople, in the 500th year of the Christian æra. Those who have the least knowledge of mathematics, understand what kind of demonstration Archimedes made use of against a dishonest goldsmith, who having received from king Hiero a certain quantity of gold, which was to be formed into a crown for one of the gods, kept some of the gold for himself, and putting silver in the room of it delivered to the king of Syracuse a crown as heavy as the gold he had received. The discovery of this fraud, which Archimedes made in a bath, gave him so great pleasure, that he ran home, without reflecting he was naked, crying out aloud, I have found it, I have found it. But the force of his genius shewed itself to far greater advantage in the structure and direction of the formidable batteries he played against the Roman armies and fleets. It is a great misfortune, that neither he, nor any after him, have given us an account of the manner of building and working those machines. Upon his tomb, as he had ordered in his life-time, was placed a cylinder and a sphere, with an inscription shewing the proportion between them, which he first found out. An invention of so little use, as this may seem, pleased that great artist better, than the devising of those machines which made him so famous. The Syracusians, who had been in former times so fond of the sciences, did not long retain the esteem and gratitude they owed a man, who had done so much honour to their city. In less than an hundred and forty years after, Archimedes was so perfectly forgot by his citizens, notwithstanding the eminent services he had done them, that they did not even know he had been buried at Syracuse. It is from Cicero we have this circumstance, who being led by his curiosity, while he was quæstor in Sicily, to make a search after the tomb of Archimedes, was assured by the Syracusians, that his search would be to no purpose, there being no such monument among them. Cicero pitied their ignorance, which only served to encrease his desire of making that discovery. After many fruitless attempts, he at last observed, without the gate of the city leading to Agrigentum, a pillar almost entirely covered with thorns and brambles, through which he could discern the figure of a sphere and cylinder. Those who have any taste for antiquity, may easily conceive the joy of Cicero on this occasion. He cried out with the words of Archimedes, I have found it, I have found it. The place was immediately cleared, when the inscription appeared still legible. So that, says Cicero, in concluding this account, the greatest city of Greece, formerly the mother of sciences, would not have known the treasure it possessed, if a man born in Arpinas had not discovered the tomb of one of its citizens, so highly distinguished by the greatness of his genius<sup>1</sup>. But to resume the thread of our history.

Marcellus, after having plundered Syracuse, and stript it of all its valuable monuments, which were sent to Rome, advanced to the city of Engyum, which was one of the most ancient colonies the Cretans had founded in Sicily. The Engyans had received a strange superstition from their founders, which it was dangerous to contradict. It was affirmed, that certain goddesses, called the Mothers, appeared from time to time in a temple of that city. But one Nicias, a man of wit, had talked with some pleasantry of these pretended apparitions, and being likewise a friend to the Romans, the inhabitants resolved to put him to death. But he avoided the danger by counterfeiting madness, and then made his escape to the Romans, who took him under their protection. This enraged the Engyans against them to such a degree, that Marcellus thought it necessary to curb their insolence, and punish them for the severity they practised on the friends of Rome. He flew to Engyum, and took it by assault, but, at the request of Nicias, spared the inhabitants, and would not even suffer his soldiers to plunder the place. By this clemency Marcellus gained the hearts of the Sicilians, and his reputation was extended far among the Greeks<sup>m</sup>.

Sicily.

AFTER the reduction of Syracuse, most of the cities of Sicily, which had sided with the Carthaginians, voluntarily submitted to Marcellus; and those which had continued faithful to Rome, or had renewed their alliance with the republic without waiting till Syracuse was taken, were maintained in possession of their antient privileges. Nevertheless Sicily was not entirely settled in peace: Epicydes, and Hanno, the commander of the Carthaginian forces in the island, were fled to Agrigentum for refuge; Mutines, who had been sent by Hannibal to supply the place of Hippocrates, kept the field at the head of a detachment of Numidians. This general was a Phœnician by descent, and a native of Hippo, a city of Africa, which the Greeks called Diarrhytos, to distinguish it from another city, bearing the same name of Hippo, in Numidia. This officer, who was formed by Hannibal himself, had acquired great reputation in the army by his valour and conduct. Epicydes and Hanno, who were well acquainted with his merit, had given him the command of a body of Numidian horse, and this brave man answered their expectations. He soon made himself dreaded in all Sicily, by the many advantages he gained over the cities in alliance with Rome. After he had, with surprising expedition, ravaged the enemy's lands, he flew to all the places that still adhered to Carthage, and, by his presence, kept the wavering people in awe, even after the reduction of Syracuse. He secured the fidelity of some, by sending them the provisions and succours they wanted; others he encouraged with his presence to hold out resolutely against Marcellus, and raised their dejected spirits. He seemed to be in all places where the interest of the republic required his presence. Epicydes and Hanno had till now shut themselves up in Agrigentum; but being encouraged by the successful expeditions of Mutines, they ventured to take the field, and, advancing as far as the river Himera, formed a camp there. Marcellus, being informed of his enemy's march, immediately put himself at the head of his army, and encamped about four miles from the Carthaginian troops, with a design to watch their motions. Mutines did not give him time to deliberate what part to act; for that brave general, who only wanted an opportunity of signalizing himself, immediately passed the river, and falling on the advanced guards, spread an alarm in the whole Roman army. The next day Marcellus marched out of his lines, and attacked the camp of Mutines, but was repulsed with great loss. Mutines was preparing to attack the Romans in their entrenchments, when news was brought him, that the Numidian cavalry, falling out among themselves, had raised raised great disturbances in the neighbouring country, and that a body of three hundred of them had retired to Hera-clea. This obliged the general to drop, or rather put off, his enterprize. He instantly flew to suppress a revolt, the consequences of which might defeat his designs, and at the same time desired Epicydes and Hanno not to venture an engagement till he returned. This request was no-ways agreeable to the two generals. Hanno, who had been long jealous of the glory and reputation of Mutines, could not brook his seeming to impose laws upon him as if he had been a subaltern. What, said he, am I sent into Sicily with a commission by the senate and people of Carthage, only to be subject to the caprice of a man of no birth or family? Hanno found it no difficult matter to instil the same uneasiness into the mind of Epicydes. So that they both resolved to pass the river, and give battle without waiting for Mutines. Their rage and jealousy made them look upon this brave African only as a troublesome rival, who would assume to himself all the honour of a victory, which they might gain without him. Marcellus, seeing the Carthaginians form their army, drew up his likewise in battalia. This great general had four years before humbled the pride of Hannibal before Nola, and therefore thought it shameful to retire before two commanders, who were much inferior to him, and who had already felt so often the effects of the Roman valour. So that the Roman accepted the challenge, and, while he was preparing for the battle, ten Numidians came from the Carthaginian army to inform him, that their countrymen were determined to continue inactive during the engagement. They were persuaded, that Epicydes and Hanno had sent away Mutines their commander, and employed him elsewhere, on purpose to rob him of the glory of conquering the Romans. The report of the revolt of the Numidians was soon spread among the legionaries, who looked upon it as a happy presage of victory. The most cowardly took courage when they were no longer to contend with those squadrons, which had been to that time so formidable to them. As to the enemy, they were seized with a sudden terror upon the first report of the revolt. Besides, Epicydes and Hanno could no longer depend on the Numidian cavalry, which was the main strength of their army, and were under no small apprehension, lest, in the heat of the engagement, they should turn their arms against the Carthaginians. While they were in this perplexity, the Roman army advanced, and, falling upon the affrighted troops with the utmost fury, put them to flight upon the first onset. The fugitives took the road to Agrigentum, whither they were pursued.

sued by the Romans, who killed many thousands of them, and took eight elephants. The Numidians, after having been idle spectators of the battle, refused to follow the others to Agri- gentum, for fear of being besieged there by the Romans, and retired to the neighbouring cities. This great advantage raised Marcellus to the highest pitch of glory; he returned victorious to Syracuse, and soon after set out from thence for Rome, after having delivered up his army, and the government of Sicily, to Marcus Cornelius Cethegus. He was scarce gone, when a Carthaginian fleet landed eight thousand foot and three thousand Numidian horse in Sicily. By the help of these new forces the Carthaginians began to recover their power in several parts of the island; Murgantia, Hybla, and Macella went over to them, and, after their example, some less considerable places fell off from the Romans. As for Mutines, he, at the head of his Numidians, destroyed the country with fire and sword, daily returned to the cities of his allies loaded with booty, and laid the whole country waste with impunity, even in sight of the Roman army. The Roman soldiers were enraged, that they had not been allowed to follow their general to Rome, and there share the honours of a triumph with him. Their murmurs increased, when they were forbid to take up their winter quarters in the cities; and they only wanted a head to break out into an open rebellion. All the address of Marcus Cornelius was wanting to appease their resentment; some he gained by caresses and fair words, others he intimidated by threatnings, and, having brought them to submit again to the laws of military discipline, he soon repaired the losses the republic had suffered since the departure of Marcellus. At the head of his troops he forced all the rebellious cities to return to their duty, and particularly Murgantia, which, with its territory, was bestowed by the senate on the Spaniards, as a reward for their zeal in the service of the republic<sup>n</sup>.

BUT the total reduction of Sicily was reserved for Marcus Valerius Lævinus, who, being appointed consul with Marcellus, was sent into Sicily to settle the affairs of that island. It still continued customary at Rome for the two consuls to chuse their provinces by lot; and it now happened, that Italy fell to Lævinus, and Sicily to Marcellus. But as soon as this was declared, the Sicilians, who were present, expressed as much terror and consternation as they had done at Syracuse, when Marcellus surprized it. They dressed themselves in mourning, crowded to the houses of the senators, and protested that it would be better for Sicily to perish in the flames of mount Ætna, or to be swallowed up by the sea, than to fall again under the government of her conqueror and tyrant. These accusers had been suborned by M. Cornelius Cethegus, who, being prætor in Sicily, sent them to Rome with a design to form an accusation against Marcellus, and raise his own glory on the ruins of this great man's reputation. In order to this he wrote many letters to the senate, wherein he declared, that there was a great deal to do in the island, before it could be entirely reduced; and thereby prevented Marcellus from enjoying the honour of a triumph, which was seldom granted till an expedition was completed. The Syracusians, who were to accuse Marcellus kept themselves concealed in the villages round Rome, till they heard that Sicily had fallen to his lot, and then they appeared as suppliants before the senate to demand justice against him. Marcellus, who was not a stranger to the secret plots of his enemies, and knew, that some of the senators out of compassion, and others out of jealousy, laid great stress on the complaints of the Syracusians, declared, that if his colleague was willing to change provinces, he would not be against it. Lævinus consented to the change, and accordingly orders were sent into Marcellus Sicily, enjoining the prætor Cornelius Cethegus to deliver up <sup>cleared,</sup> the troops under his command to the consul. But before either Lævinus or Marcellus set out for their respective provinces, the Sicilians were heard in the senate, and Marcellus cleared. His proceedings in Sicily were declared regular, the pillage of Syracuse approved of, and his regulations ratified. Nevertheless it was decreed, that Rome should for the future consult the interest of Syracuse, and Lævinus was exhorted to shew the Syracusians all the lenity that was consistent with the welfare of the republic. When the decree was passed, the Sicilians were brought to the senate to hear it, and Marcellus, who had retired that the debates of the senators might be more free, came in after them, and took his place as consul. Then the Sicilians, confounded at what they had done, threw themselves at his feet, bathed them with tears, and begged him to pardon the attempts, which the present sense of their misery had induced them to make against his honour. Marcellus received them very graciously, promised them his protection, and in consequence of this promise obtained of the senate, that the Syracusians should be reinstated in their antient liberties, and treated as allies of Rome. Hence proceeded the eternal gratitude of the Syracusians to Marcellus and his posterity. They enacted a decree, wherein it was ordered, that whenever any of his family set foot in Sicily, the people should should walk before him crowned with garlands, and celebrate that happy day with sacrifices. From thenceforth, the whole island remained under the patronage of the Marcellis, the Sicilians becoming clients of that illustrious family • (Y). THE

(Y) The conduct of Marcellus on this occasion was not intirely approved of at Rome. Some of the senators, remembering the attachment which king Hiero had on all occasions shewn to their republic, could not help condemning their general for giving up the city to be plundered by his greedy soldiers. The citizens were not in a condition to make good their party against an army of mercenaries, and therefore were obliged, against their will, to yield to the times, and obey the ministers of Hannibal, who commanded the army. But they were no sooner their own masters, first by the death of Hieronimus, and afterwards by the flight of Epicydes, than they declared for the Romans, and put to death such as favoured the Carthaginian party; so that they were never willingly unfaithful to Rome. Marcellus nevertheless plundered the city, and stripped it of all its valuable monuments, as if the citizens had been enemies to Rome, not by force, to use Livy's expression, but by inclination. The same writer imputes to Marcellus the custom, which prevailed among the Romans, of stripping the conquered cities of their richest ornaments, and embellishing their capital with them. It is true, says he, these spoils belonged, by right of war, to the conqueror; but it must be owned, that this custom gave rise to many evils. From that time the people began to be very inquisitive after these master-pieces of art, which have been the admiration of all ages. And hence came that unbounded licentiousness, which prevails among us to this day, of sparing nothing, either sacred or profane, to gratify our ostentation and curiosity. Religion itself could no longer set bounds to the avarice of a greedy conqueror. He laid his sacrilegious hands on sacred things. The most venerable deities were tore from the places where they had fixed their abode; and the temple, which was built by Marcellus himself, has met with the same fate. The stately monuments, with which he enriched it, are now become the prey of an unjust usurper; and there are now but few remains of the fine statues and valuable paintings, which the conqueror of Syracuse reserved for embellishing it. Thus far Livy (50). Till the age, in which this general lived, Rome had entertained her citizens with no sights, but what suited her martial genius, viz. triumphs, trophies, and the military ensigns and arms of conquered nations. This was very suitable to the taste of men, who were enemies to luxury, and had been brought up in the noise and hurry of war. The old Romans therefore, who were fond of the antient customs, thought the conduct of Fabius at the taking of Tarentum

preferable

THE cause of the Sicilians being thus determined, Lævinus set out for his province, and on his arrival found the whole island reduced by the prætor Cornelius, except Agri- gentum and its territory. Having therefore settled the government of Syracuse and its dependencies, to the advantage of the Romans and the satisfaction of the inhabitants, he turned his arms against the only place that was left to Carthage in the whole island. The city of Agri- gentum was defended by a numerous garison under the command of Hanno; but the consul with little trouble made himself master of it, more by the good fortune of Rome than his own valour. Hanno, growing daily more jealous of the great reputation which Mutines acquired, at length deprived that brave subaltern of his commission, and put his son in his room. But his having no command did not at all lessen his credit among the soldiers, especially the Numidians, who were more attached to him than ever; so that all the odium of this removal fell on the general. On the other hand, Mutines, not being able to brook the affront put upon him, resolved, at all events, to be preferable to that of Marcellus at the taking of Syracuse. The former was content with the gold and other spoils that might fill Rome with plenty, and did not touch the famous statues and pictures which adorned the temples and public places, saying, Let us leave the Tarentines their angry gods. Marcellus, on the contrary, emboldened by his example the triumphant victors to lead both men and gods in chains after their chariots. From his time, says Plutarch (51), the citizens were no longer employed as in earlier ages, in forming great designs, and conspiring to promote the glory of their country. The public places were filled only with idle people, who spent great part of the day in discoursing on statues of exquisite workmanship, valuable pictures, and those who had excelled in painting and sculpture. Polybius is no less severe on the Romans on this account, than Livy or Plutarch. These statues, says he (52), pictures, bas-reliefs, and other rich spoils of the conquered nations, were indeed a proof of the conquests of Rome, and at the same time, of the injustice of those who seized them. When these monuments were shewn to strangers, they perpetuated their hatred to the Roman name, and put the conquered people in mind of their misfortunes. This inspired the spectators with indignation against the conquerors, and with compassion for the oppressed nations. The rich spoils, which Marcellus brought out of Sicily, were placed by him in the temples of Virtue and Honour, which he had built in discharge of a vow made in the war with the Gauls (53).

revenged on Hanno ; and accordingly began to maintain a private correspondence with the consul, advising him to bring his army before Agrigentum. Upon the first news of the march of the Romans, Mutines conspired with the Numidians against Hanno, put himself at their head, and having seized one of the gates, put the Romans in possession of it. The Carthaginian guard was then cut in pieces, and the legionaries, mixed with the Numidians, advanced in order of battle into the centre of the city. So that the place was taken before Hanno knew that the Romans were before it. He hastened to the market-place, imagining, that the Numidians, who often opposed the orders of their generals, had raised some new commotion. But perceiving, while he was yet at some distance, that the Romans were mixed with the Numidians, and not doubting but he was betrayed, he turned short, and made the best of his way out of the city, and arriving at the port, he embarked with Epicydes and a small number of officers on a vessel which was ready to set sail. The rest of his army betook themselves to flight, but, Lævinus having posted guards in all the avenues and passages, they were all killed to a man. All the chiefs of the Agrigentini were, by Lævinus's order, first beaten with rods, and then beheaded. The common people were reduced to slavery, and sold to the best bidder. The spoils of the pillaged city were publicly put up to sale, and the money returned to the public treasury. After the reduction of Agrigentum and flight of Hanno and Epicydes, most of the Sicilian cities submitted to the Romans of their own accord, and others were either betrayed or taken by force. Thus the Romans became masters of the whole island, the conquest of which paved them a way to the more distant nations in Africa and Asia. Lævinus, having now no enemies to contend with, settled peace throughout the whole island; and took upon himself the government of it in the name of his republic, making it all but one province. This fruitful country, the cultivating of which had been long interrupted by wars, produced corn an hundred-fold; hence from this time it became the granary of Rome, and her constant refuge in distress<sup>p</sup>.

And all Sicily reduced to a Roman province.

Lævinus, having settled Sicily in peace, was recalled to Rome to preside in the comitia, which were to be held for the electing of new magistrates. Upon his departure, as he was to return soon, he left the command of his army and the government of Sicily to the prætor Cincius during his absence. When he came to Rome, he gave the senate an account of his expedition,

expedition and of the present state of the island. After which he introduced to the conscript fathers Mutines, and all those who deserted Hannibal to adhere to the republic. They had many honours conferred upon them; and all the advantageous terms, which the consul had promised them, were granted by a decree of the senate. Mutines himself was admitted to enjoy the rights of a Roman citizen, at the motion of one of the tribunes of the people and by the authority of the senate. He ever afterwards served the Romans with great fidelity, and accompanied the two Scipios into Asia against Antiochus, on which occasion he is said to have distinguished himself in a very particular manner.

ALL Sicily being now become a province of the Roman republic, it was not treated as the other countries, which Rome subdued afterwards, upon which a certain tribute was imposed; but suffered to enjoy its antient privileges, and retain all its former rights. This distinction, as Tully observes, Sicily well deserved, since that island was the first of all foreign nations that had entered into alliance and amity with Rome, and the first conquest the republic made out of Italy. This island was afterwards a kind of pass for their troops into Africa; and Rome would not have so easily reduced the formidable power of Carthage, had not Sicily served her as a magazine to supply her armies with provisions, and been a secure retreat to her fleets. Hence Scipio Africanus, after having taken and destroyed Carthage, thought himself obliged to adorn the cities of Sicily with some of the richest spoils he had brought from Africa, to the end that the Sicilians might have some monuments among them of those victories to which they had greatly contributed<sup>9</sup>.

BESIDES Syracuse, there were several other free cities in Sicily, namely, Leontini, Agrigentum, Gela, Messana, Himera, Catana, Ætna, Apollonia, Selinus, Taurominium, Agyris, and Centuripe. These underwent the same vicissitudes as Syracuse, being sometimes governed by their own laws, and at others enslaved by their domestic tyrants, till they were at last all brought under subjection by the Romans. Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, is one of the most famous on account of his cruelty among the Sicilian tyrants. He usurped the sovereignty of that city in the second year of the fifty second olympiad, and maintained it for sixteen years. We have still remaining some letters of Abaris to this tyrant, and his answers; though some ascribe them to Lucian, Perillus the

Athenian, to flatter the cruelty of Phalaris, made the famous brazen bull for tormenting of criminals, and was the first that suffered in it, having demanded too great a reward for his contrivance. The people of Agrigentum, unable to bear any longer with his unheard-of cruelties, made a general insurrection, seized on the tyrant and put him to death, some say, by shutting him up in his beloved bull<sup>r</sup>. The most material transactions relating to the other cities of Sicily we have delivered in the history of Syracuse, with which their respective histories are inseparably interwoven, and therefore shall now proceed to the history of the other islands, beginning with that of Rhodes, which, though small in extent, yet makes a very considerable figure in history, perhaps the first after Sicily.

Its names. THE island before us was formerly known by the names of Ophiusa, Asteria, Æthraea, Trinacria, Corymbia, Poessa, Atabyria, Macria, Oloessa, Stadia, Telchinis, Pelagia, and Rhodus. In latter ages the name of Rhodus or Rhodes prevailed, which authors commonly derive from the Greek word Rodon, signifying a rose, that island abounding, as they say, above any other with this sort of flowers. And indeed several Rhodian coins are still to be seen representing the sun, and on the reverse a rose. But Diodorus Siculus<sup>i</sup> will have it so called from one Rhoda, the daughter of Apollo by Venus (Z). It lies in the Mediterranean over-against the coast of Lycia and Caria, from which it is distant about twenty miles. This island is about an hundred and twenty miles in compass, and blessed with a most fruitful soil, which gave occasion to the fable of those golden showers that were once said to have fallen upon it. It formerly produced, in great plenty, all sorts of delicious fruits, and wines of so exquisite a taste, that they were used by the Romans chiefly in their sacrifices, and thought, as Virgil informs us <sup>t</sup>, too good for mortals. The air is here said to be so serene, that no day ever passes without sun-shine; whence the poets feigned Phæbus to be in love with this island, which, say they, was a mere marsh altogether uninhabitable, till loved by Phæbus, and raised out of the waters by his powerful influence. Soil, climate, &c.

(Z) Bochart derives the name of Rhodes from the Phœnician word Rod, signifying a serpent, and adds, that as the Greeks called it Ophiusa, because it was once greatly infested by those insects, so the Phœnicians, who were once masters of it, named it Gest-rath Rod, that is, the island of serpents; to the word Rod the Greeks adding the termination peculiar to their language formed the name of Rhodos (54). Others tell us, that it was called Rhodus from the Greek word Rodon, signifying a rose, not that it abounded with roses, but because a rose-bud of brass was found in laying the foundations of the ancient city of Lindus (55).

THE island of Rhodes had in Homer's time three cities, Cities of viz. Lindus, Camirus, Ialysus; to which in after-ages was Rhodes. added a fourth bearing the name of the island. Lindus, now Lindo, stood on the east coast of the island, and was Lindus. famous in ancient times for a temple dedicated to Minerva, whence that goddess had the surname of Lindia. This temple is said to have been built by Danaus king of Egypt, landing here on his flight from his own kingdom. A certain festival was celebrated annually in this city, not with blessings and prayers, as Lactantius informs us <sup>u</sup>, but with curses and imprecations; insomuch, that if one good word escaped any of those that were present, it was deemed a very bad omen, and the whole ceremony begun anew. Lindus gave birth to Chares, the architect of the colossus, and to Cleobulus one of the seven wise men of Greece. Camirus or Cameiros was situate on the western coast of the island, and is barely mentioned by the ancients. Ialysus, in Ialysus. the north over-against the coast of Lycia, was the most ancient city in the whole island, but we find nothing relating to it worth mentioning. These three cities were, according to Diodorus <sup>w</sup>, built by Tlepolemus the son of Hercules before the Trojan war. But Strabo <sup>x</sup> and Cicero <sup>y</sup> tell us, that they were founded by the Heliades, or grandsons of Phæbus, Ialysus, Camirus, and Lindus, who imparted their names each to the city he built (A). (A) Some writers tell us, that these three cities were built by the Dorians not long after their migration, whence they are counted by Athenæus among the Dorian colonies (56). Herodotus says, they were founded by the daughters of Danaus, who landed in this island, after having put to death the sons of Egyptus their husbands (57). In the city of Lindus was a magnificent temple, said by Plutarch (58) to have been built by them in honour of the Lindian Minerva. Zosimus tells us, that in his time were still to be seen at Constantinople two statues of exquisite workmanship, the one of Jupiter Dodonæus, the other of the Lindian Minerva, and adds, that the magnificent temple of that goddess in the city of Lindus having been by an accidental fire reduced to ashes, these two statues were found in the rubbish, no ways hurt or damaged (59). Cadmus, according to Diodorus Siculus (60), presented the Lindian Minerva with a kettle made after the ancient fashion, on which was an inscription in Phœnician letters. Amasis king of Egypt consecrated, as Herodotus informs us (61), to the same goddess two statues and a linen vest of a wonderful texture. Pliny says, that each thread of this vest consisted of three hundred and fifty smaller threads, and adds, lest we should question the truth of what he says, that the consul Mutianus, having had the curiosity to untwist several threads both of the woof and warp, found that each of them contained exactly the abovementioned number of other threads, so fine that they were scarce discernible by the naked eye (62.) The same author tells us, that Helena offered to the same goddess a cup of amber of exquisite workmanship, and speaks of several pictures in this temple done by Parrhasias, Zeuxis, and other great masters. The other two cities, Camiros and Ialysus, contained nothing remarkable; the latter was commanded by a citadel built on a neighbouring hill, and called by Strabo (63) Ochyroma. Lindus and Ialysus were both well fortified in the time of the Peloponnesian war, as appears from Thucydides (64); but Camiros, or as some write it Cameiros, was then without walls. Diodorus (65) speaks of another town, which he calls Acbaia, and supposes to have been built by Ochimus and Cercaphus, two of the sons of Apollo, at a small distance from Ialysus; but, as no other writer makes mention of this city, we are inclined to believe, that Diodorus by Acbaia meant the castle of Ochyroma, which perhaps in his time was known by that name. The cities of Lindus, Ialysus, and Camiros were, as Strabo informs us (66), three different republics, and quite independent of each other, governing themselves by their own laws till the inhabitants abandoned their ancient habitations, and went to settle in the city of Rhodes, which was built in the time of the Peloponnesian war, that is many centuries after the other three.

Rhodes (B), built during the Peloponnesian war, soon eclipsed the other three, and became the metropolis of the whole island. It was situate on the east coast, at the foot of a hill of a gentle ascent; and in an agreeable plain, environed at some distance with several hills full of springs, and covered with all kinds of fruit trees. No city, if we believe Strabo <sup>2</sup>, was in ancient times preferable to it, whether we consider the state-liness of its buildings, or the excellent laws by which it was governed.

(B) This stately city was built by the same architect, whom the Athenians had employed in building the Piræus or port of Athens, viz. Hippodamus, a native of Miletus, and deservedly counted among the best architects Greece ever produced (67). Isidorus was greatly mistaken in making Cecrops king of Athens the founder of this city (68), since it is manifest from all the monuments of antiquity, that Rhodes was not built before the Peloponnesian war; no mention being made by any writer of such a city till that period. It was built, according to Strabo (69) and Aristides (70), in the form of an amphitheatre, surrounded with walls like those of Munychia, embellished with most stately buildings, strait and broad streets, pleasant avenues, fine groves, large squares, &c. Dio Chrysostomus (71) tells us, that most of the Pagan deities had temples in this city; among which that of the sun, called by the Dorians Haleium, was one of the most noble structures of antiquity. Strabo mentions the temple of Bacchus, or, as the Rhodians stiled him, Thyonidas, which, as he tells us, was enriched with a prodigious number of pictures done by the celebrated painter Protogenes. Hesychius, Appian, and Suetonius speak of the temples of Isis, of Ocridion, and Diana, as master-pieces of art. Each of these temples contained immense treasures, votaries flocking thither with rich presents from all parts of Greece, Asia, and Italy. In the Dionysium, or temple of Bacchus, was a statue of Pluto of massy gold, and an incredible number of other statues and pictures done by the greatest masters. Pliny tells us (72), that in his time there were in the city of Rhodes above three thousand statues, most of them done with great taste; nay if Aristides is to be credited (73), there were more valuable statues and pictures in the city of Rhodes alone, than in all the other cities of Greece. governed. In the Roman times it was famous for the study of all sciences, and resorted to by such of the Romans as were desirous to improve themselves in literature, being by some of the ancients equalled to Athens itself<sup>a</sup>. It had a very convenient haven, at the entrance of which were two rocks, and on those rocks, though fifty foot asunder, the famous Colossus is supposed to have stood (C). It was a huge statue of brass erected in honour of the Sun or Apollo, the tutelary god of the island, and for its size accounted one of the seven wonders of the world, being seventy cubits, or an hundred and five foot high; insomuch, that ships in entering the harbour sailed between its legs. Demetrius Poliorcetes having for a whole year besieged the city of Rhodes without being able to take it. at last tired out with so long a siege was reconciled to the Rhodians, and on his departure presented them with all the engines of war he had employed against their city.

Apelles, and those of Perseus, Hercules, and Meleager by Zeuxis, are greatly cried up by Pliny and other ancient writers. That of Meleager was thrice singed with lightning, as the same Pliny informs us (74); but that accident did not in the least deaden the lustre and brightness of its colours.

(C) Pliny describes it in the following terms: Of all things that are deservedly admired, the Colossus of Rhodes, done by Chares of Lindus the disciple of Lyfippus, is the most worthy of admiration. It was seventy cubits high, and is still, though lying on the ground, a great prodigy. Its thumb is a fathom in compass, and its fingers larger than most statues. It was hollow, and had in its cavities vast stones employed by the artificer to counterballance its weight, and render it steady, &c. (75). Sextus Empiricus tells us, that it was eighty cubits high, and that Chares the Lindian, having spent the whole sum which he had demanded for the completing of the work, before he had half done it, laid violent hands on himself, out of shame for being so grossly mistaken in his computation. Upon his death, one Laches, a native of the same city, undertook the work, says the same writer, and put the last hand to it. That it was done, at least in part, by Laches, he proves from the inscription which was still extant in his time on the pedestal of the statue in the following words: Laches of Lindus made the Colossus of Rhodes eighty cubits high. We will not call in question the veracity of our author; but after all we cannot help thinking it somewhat strange, that no writer, either before or since his time, should mention this inscription. He flourished in the reign of Antoninus surnamed the philosopher.

These

These the Rhodians sold for three hundred talents, and, with that money and other additional sums of their own, raised this famous colossus. The artificer they employed was Chares of Lindus, who was twelve years in completing the work. After it had stood sixty years, it was thrown down by an earthquake, which did great damage in the east, especially in Caria and Rhodes <sup>b</sup>. On this occasion the Rhodians sent ambassadors to all the princes and states of Greek origin to represent the losses they had sustained, and by that means procured great sums for the repairing of them, especially from the kings of Egypt, Macedon, Syria, Pontus, and Bithynia. The money they gathered is said to have exceeded five times the value of the damages. But they, instead of setting up the colossus again, for which end most of it was given, pretended an answer from the oracle of Delphos, forbidding it, and kept the money for themselves <sup>c</sup>. Thus the colossus lay where it fell for the space of 894 years till at length Murwias, the sixth caliph or emperor of the Saracens, having taken Rhodes, sold the brass to a Jew, who loaded with it nine hundred camels, so that allowing eight hundred pound weight to every camel's load, the brass of the colossus, after the waste of so many years, amounted to seven hundred and twenty thousand pound weight <sup>d</sup>. From this colossus the island is by some authors called Collossa, and the inhabitants Colossians, whence some have falsely imagined, that St. Paul's epistle to the Colossians was directed to the Rhodians. But the Colossians, to whom the apostle wrote, were the inhabitants of Colosse, a city in Phrygia Major, of which we have spoke in the history of that antient kingdom.

THE city of Rhodes is still a place of no small note, being pleasantly seated on the side of a hill, three miles in compass, and well fortified with a treble wall. The streets, as our modern travellers inform us, are wide, strait, and well paved, and the houses built after the Italian taste. The chief haven is convenient, safe, and well fortified. The city is well peopled, and the inhabitants as wealthy as the Turkish tyranny permits any to be. It is well known, that this city and island belonged in the middle ages to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who defended it with incredible bravery against the mighty fleet and numerous army of Solyman II. till the place was betrayed by a traitor in the town. After the reduction of The inhabitants.

THIS island, if we believe Diodorus, was first peopled by the Telchinæ, who were originally from the island of Crete. The Telchinæ, who, according to that writer, were well skill'd in astrology, foreseeing, that the island would be soon laid under water and the inhabitants drowned, abandoned their habitations, and made room for the Heliades or grandsons of Phæbus, who took possession of it after that god had cleared it of the mud, with which it had been covered by the deluge. The Heliades, as the same author informs us, excelled all other men in learning, especially in astrology; and were the first who found out the art of navigation, and the dividing of the day into hours. One of them by name Tanges, continues our author, being through envy killed by his brothers, they were forced to abandon Rhodes, and take sanctuary in other countries. Macer fled to Lesbos, Candalus to Coos, Triopas, to Caria, and Actis to Egypt. Triopas possessed himself of the promontory in Caria, from him called Triopium; Actis built in Egypt a city, which from the name of the sun he called Heliopolis, and taught the Egyptians the science of astrology. But most of the inhabitants of Greece being afterwards destroyed by the flood, and the antient monuments lost, the Egyptians took this opportunity of appropriating the study of astrology solely to themselves; and it was generally believed, even by the Greeks, that the Egyptians were the first who found out the knowledge of the stars<sup>c</sup>. Thus Diodorus derives the study of astrology from the inhabitants of Rhodes. But we should be glad to know how he came to make this discovery, after all the antient monuments, relating thereunto, were lost. All authors agree, that the Egyptians were the first who applied themselves to the study of astrology, and the opinion of Diodorus, supported by no authentic monuments, is not of weight enough with us to counter-balance their authority.

IN after-ages the descendants of the Heliades, who had remained in Rhodes, (four of them only being concerned in the death of their brother Tanges) being infested by great serpents, which bred in the island, had recourse to an oracle in Delos, which advised them to admit Phorbas and his followers to share with them the lands in the island, if they desired to be delivered from their present calamity. Phorbas was the son of Lapithas, and was at that time, with many of his friends, in Theffaly seeking for a convenient place to settle in. The Rhodians, according to the direction of the oracle, sent for Phorbas, who being admitted as a proprietor with them in the island, destroyed the serpents, and freed the inhabitants from their former fears. He continued with his followers, who were all Theffalians, in Rhodes, where after his death he was honoured as a demi-god <sup>f</sup>.

AFTERWARDS Althæmenes, the son of Catreus king of Crete, consulting the oracle concerning some affairs, was answered, that it would be his fate to kill his own father. To avoid this misfortune he of his own accord abandoned Crete, and with many Cretans, who attended him, passed over into Rhodes, and settled at Camirus. There he built a temple on the top of mount Atamirus in honour of Jupiter, called from thence Jupiter Atamirus. He chose that place because he had from thence a clear prospect of Crete his native island. He was greatly honoured by the inhabitants of Camirus, and admitted with his followers to enjoy all the rights and privileges of the antient proprietors. But his father Catreus having no other son, and being exceeding fond of Althæmenes, undertook a voyage to Rhodes in order to bring him back to Crete. He landed at Rhodes in the night with a numerous attendance, which giving jealousy to the Rhodians, they fell upon him, and in this conflict he was killed by his own son. Althæmenes was so concerned for his death, that he ever afterwards avoided all manner of company, wandering in the deserts till he died of grief; but by the direction of the oracle he was afterwards honoured as an hero or demi-god <sup>g</sup>.

NOT long before the Trojan war Tlepolemus the son of Hercules, having killed unawares one Licynnius, fled from Argos, and, having consulted an oracle about planting a colony, was advised to pass over into Rhodes, which he did accordingly and settled there. He was afterwards created king of the whole island, which he governed with great justice and equity. These were, according to Diodorus, the first inhabitants of the island of Rhodes <sup>h</sup>.

AFTER the Trojan war, the Dorians possessed themselves of the best part of this island, after having driven out the antient proprietors; and hence it is, that both Strabo <sup>i</sup> and Pausanias <sup>k</sup> call the Rhodians Dorians and also Peloponnesians, the Dorians being properly the inhabitants of Peloponnesus. As the Dorians were, according to Eusebius <sup>l</sup>, descended from

Tharsis, the son of Javan and grandson of Japhet, that writer by Tharsis understands the Rhodians. On the other hand S. Jerom is of opinion, that the island of Rhodes was first peopled by the descendants of Dodanim the brother of Tharsis, whom the Greeks corruptly called Rhodanim; and hence came the name of Rhodes and Rhodians<sup>m</sup>. Be that as it will, all the antients agree, that the Rhodians after the Trojan war consisted chiefly of Dorians, and that the Doric dialect was commonly used throughout the whole island.

Their trade and navigation THE Rhodians applied themselves very early to trade and navigation, and soon became so skilled in maritime affairs and expert in navigation, that for many ages they were sovereigns of the sea, their laws, called the Rhodian laws, being the standard whereby to decide all controversies relating to maritime affairs. These laws and constitutions were so just, that they were afterwards incorporated into the Roman pandects, and followed in all the provinces of the Roman empire.

Government. THE government of Rhodes was originally monarchical, and several kings are said to have reigned there long before the Trojan war<sup>n</sup>; but as the authors (D), who have wrote of

Some writers confound Eudoxus the Rhodian historian with another Eudoxus of Cyzicum, who, following Ptolemy Latburus, sailed from the Persian gulph to Cadix, as Strabo relates on the credit of Posidonius (78), and Pliny on that of Cornelius Nepos. Simmias flourished about the beginning of the olympiads, and wrote several poems on the antiquities of Samos, where he was born of Rhodian parents. Tzetzes cites thirteen verses from his poem, intitled Apollo, on men who had dogs heads. the history, or part of the history, of Rhodes, and are frequently quoted by the antients, especially by Diodorus Siculus. It would be too tedious to insert here a catalogue of the many eminent writers, whom this island has produced. However, we shall give a succinct account of those, whom we find to have been most admired by the best judges of antiquity. These are, Aristophanes, a native of Lindos, whose comedies met with such applause at Athens, that he was declared free of that city, and honoured with a crown made of the branches of an olive tree, which grew in the citadel and was sacred to Minerva. Eudemus, counted by Strabo among the most illustrious philosophers of antiquity (79); he is said to have wrote a learned treatise of geometry, astronomy, and the power and influence of the stars: Hieronymus, commended by Strabo, Athenæus, and Tully, as the chief Peripatetic philosopher of his time. Leonidas, ranked by Strabo, Hesychius, and Vitruvius among the men, who gained more reputation to their country by the arts of peace, than the greatest captains by those of war. Pisander, a native of Camirus, mentioned by Strabo and Macrobius as the author of a poem stiled Heraclea, which comprehended in two books all the exploits of Hercules: he is said by Suidas to have been the first that represented Hercules with a club: Panætius, who was preceptor to Scipio Africanus the younger, and attended him together with Polybius in all his expeditions. Upon Scipio's death he retired to Athens, where he was highly esteemed and admitted into the number of Athenian citizens. Cicero acknowledges that he followed him in his book of offices: Molon, or Apollonius Molon, who taught rhetoric first at Rome afterwards at Rhodes, and had in both places a great many disciples of distinction, amongst others Cicero, who followed him from Rome to Rhodes. Molon wrote some historical works; for Josephus (80) complains of him as undeservedly traducing the Jews, and disparaging some of the most glorious actions of their princes: Idæus who took upon him to correct the Iliad, but did not succeed so well in that undertaking, as he did in an epic poem of his own, wherein he set forth the memorable actions of the Rhodians: Timocreon, a famous poet and wrestler, who in the olympic games was victor in five different sorts of combats. Athenæus tells us, that his epitaph was wrote by Simonides, and conceived in the following terms: Here lies Timocreon The Rhodian, who of all things liked good eating and drinking, and never spoke well of any body. Praxiphanes, a native of Lindus, wrote a most learned comment on the obscure passages of Sophocles, and is often mentioned by Strabo, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Hesychius: Antheas, born likewise in Lindus, was the first inventor, as Suidas informs us, of the Adonic verse, so called from Adonis, that who reigned in the time of the Trojan war, and after that epoch, are Tlepolemus, Dorieus, Damagetus, Diagoras, Evagoras, Cleobulus, Eraftides, Damagetus II. Diagoras II.

Tlepolemus, the son of Hercules, accompanied Agamemnon to the Trojan war, leaving the government of his kingdom to Butas, who had attended him in his flight from Argos. Some say, that he was killed before Troy by Sarpedon, others that he returned home loaded with the spoils of the plundered city<sup>o</sup>. Dorieus is only mentioned by Pausanias, and supposed to have reigned, since his son Damagetus enjoyed the royal dignity. All we know of Damagetus is, that he was commanded by an oracle to marry the daughter of the best man among the Greeks, and that in compliance with the injunction of the god he took to wife the third daughter of Aristomenes the Messenian<sup>p</sup>, by whom he had Diagoras, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and became so famous on account of his equity and justice, that the princes who succeeded him were all called Diagoridæ, as if he had been the head and first of the family<sup>q</sup>. Evagoras is mentioned only by Laertius, who gives us no account of his reign<sup>r</sup>. Cleobulus travelled into Egypt, where he studied philosophy, and on his return to Rhodes was highly esteemed, not only by his countrymen, but by all the Greeks, and counted among the seven wise men of Greece. His daughter Cleobulina is said to have been a woman of great learning, well versed in philosophy, astrology, poetry, &c. and to have had an admirable talent in making of ænigmas<sup>r</sup>. Cleobulus died in the 70th year of his age, leaving the kingdom, as he had no male issue, to his daughter, who resigned it to Eraftides, one of the descendants of Diagoras, and consequently of the same family. Eraftides, it seems, performed nothing worth mentioning; he is called by Pindar a pacific prince, and said to have reigned without giving trouble to his neighbours, or being troubled by them. After him reigned several other princes of the same family, as we gather from the scholiast of Pindar<sup>s</sup>; but poet having first made them to bewail his death. Many other writers of great note have formerly flourished in this island; but, as we cannot pretend to give an account of them all in this place, we must refer our readers to Mewsius, in his learned treatise on the island of Rhodes, printed at Amsterdam in 1675, and published with those on Creta and Cyprus by the same author.

the only one we find mentioned by the antients is Diagoras II. who was coteremporary with Pindar. He proved conqueror in the Olympic, Isthmian, Nemæan, and Argian games, and is on that account highly commended by Pindar. He had two daughters Calipateras and Pherenice, and three sons, Acusilaus, Damagetus, and Dorieus. These sons were all three victors at the same time in the olympic sports, Acusilaus in boxing, Dorieus in wrestling, and Damagetus in the exercise called Pancration, which consisted of the two former. After the judges had passed sentence, and the public herald proclaimed their names, they flew to embrace their father, who was present, and placing their crowns on his head, carried him in triumph through the crowd, all Greece extolling with loud acclamations their piety, which made that numerous assembly in a manner forget their victory. The father, not able to bear such an excess of joy, died in their arms, envied more for his death, as our author expresses it, than for the many victories, which during his life had equalled him to the gods <sup>u</sup>. Dorieus was three times successively victor in the Olympic games, eight times in the Isthmian, seven times in the Nemæan, and once in the Pythic, no one daring to contend with him. Being driven from Rhodes, he retired with his nephew Pisidorus to Thurium in Italy. What was laid to his charge, we know not; but Thucydides informs us, that he was soon recalled, and that on his return he not only openly declared for the Lacedemonians, but served in their fleet with gallics equipped at his own expence, till he was in an engagement taken prisoner by the Athenians, who at first designed to put him to death, but afterwards sent him home untouched and without ransom, in consideration of the many victories he had gained in the public sports <sup>w</sup>. His sister Pherenice, after the death of her husband, privately instructed her son Pisidorus in the exercises used at Olympia, and attended him herself in disguise to the sports; for women were not allowed to be present at those games; nay, so severe were the laws in this particular, that if any woman was found so much as to have passed the river Alpheus, during the time of the solemnity, she was to be thrown headlong from a rock on the top of mount Timæus. Pherenice, after her son had won the prize, discovered herself, and being apprehended was brought before the judges, who acquitted her, out of respect to her father, brothers, and son <sup>x</sup>. II. chronologers count two hundred and fifty years ; whence it is manifest, that neither the actions, nor even the names, of several intermediate kings have reached us. Upon the death of Diagoras II. some great revolution must have happened ; for we find another family on the throne, viz. that of the Asclepiadæ, while his children were still alive<sup>1</sup>. But we are quite in the dark both as to their names and actions. All we know is, that they did not long enjoy the sovereignty, the Rhodians having no king at the time of Xerxes's expedition into Greece, which, according to Diodorus<sup>2</sup>, happened a few years after the death of Diagoras. After the death or expulsion of the last king, the republican government prevailed all over the island, during which the Rhodians applied themselves to trade and navigation, and as Strabo informs us<sup>3</sup>, became very powerful by sea, and planted several colonies, in distant countries, namely Rhodes in Spain, and Parthenope in the country of the Opici. The same author adds, that the Rhodians at this time were masters of the Balearic islands, called then the Gymnesian islands. During the Peloponnesian war, the Rhodians first sided with the Athenians, but, after their great overthrow in Sicily, revolted from them and joined the Lacedemonians, whom they likewise abandoned, and renewed their antient alliance with the Athenians, after the former had been defeated by Conon admiral of the Persian fleet. In the time of the Peloponnesian war, and for several years after, the republic of Rhodes was rent into two factions, the people favouring the Athenians, and the nobles the Lacedemonians ; but the latter at last prevailed, the democracy was abolished, and an aristocracy introduced in its room. Under this form of government the state enjoyed a profound tranquillity, till the third year of the hundred and fifth olympiad, which was the third year of the reign of Philip the son of Amyntas, when that war broke out, which was called the Social War, and lasted four years. The Rhodians, Chians, Coans, and Byzantines, being weary of their alliance with the Athenians, by whom they were treated rather like subjects than allies, resolved to take up arms against Athens, and reinstate themselves in their antient independency. To reduce them the Athenians employed great forces and the most experienced officers of their republic, viz. Chabrias, Iphicrates, and Timotheus. These were the last of the Athenian generals who distinguished themselves either at home or abroad<sup>4</sup>. The war was begun by the siege of Chios, where Chares commanded the land-forces, and Chabrias the fleet. All the allies, especially the Rhodians, exerted themselves in sending aid to the Chians. But in spite of their utmost efforts Chabrias, having forced the passage, entered the port, and fell upon the enemy's fleet. The other gallies under his command, seeing him in great distress and surrounded by the enemy, betook themselves to flight, leaving Chabrias to the mercy of the allies. But he, chusing rather to die, than to retire or surrender, fought with incredible bravery till he received a wound, which soon put an end to his life <sup>c</sup>.

THUS the first attempt of the Athenians having miscarried, both sides made vast preparations for renewing the war. The Athenians fitted out a fleet of sixty gallies, giving the command of it to Chares, and appointed Iphicrates and Timotheus to command another fleet, consisting of the same number of gallies, which was to be employed against the Rhodians, and to prevent their joining the other allies. But the Rhodians were before-hand with them, and the confederate fleet to the number of an hundred sail being united early in the spring, they ravaged the islands of Imbros and Lesbos, took all the ships they met, and, raising contributions among the allies of Athens, got together such sums of money, as were sufficient to defray all the expences of that campaign. Being encouraged with this success they sailed to Samos, which adhered to the Athenians, and besieged the place both by sea and land. On the other hand, the Athenians, to oblige the allies to raise the siege, invested Byzantium, which had the desired effect, the allies making all possible haste to its relief. When the two fleets were in sight of each other, the allies began to prepare for an engagement, but, a violent storm arising, Timotheus and Iphicrates thought it not adviseable to hazard a battle in such a conjuncture. Chares, who was for engaging, after having earnestly pressed, but in vain, his colleagues to follow his advice, wrote to Athens accusing them of cowardice and treason. Upon his accusation, the people, who were naturally jealous of such as were distinguished by their extraordinary merit, recalled the two generals, and laid a heavy fine upon them, which Timotheus being unable to pay, retired to Chelos, where he died of grief <sup>d</sup>.

Chares, by the recal of his two colleagues, having the sole command of the fleet, engaged in a very rash enterprize,

whereby he hoped to do his country great service. Pharnabazus, having revolted from the king of Persia, was upon the point of being attacked by the governors of the neighbouring provinces at the head of seventy thousand men, he himself having but a very small army. In this critical conjuncture he prevailed upon Chares to join him with his forces, and by his assistance totally routed the king's generals; for which signal piece of service Pharnabazus rewarded him with such sums of money, as were sufficient to pay his fleet and army. When the news of this victory first reached Athens, Chares's conduct was highly applauded; but after the king had complained by his ambassadors of the injury done him by Chares, and it was spread abroad, that the Persians designed to join the confederates with a fleet of three hundred sail, the Athenians changed their notes, and treated Chares as a traitor, who had not only abandoned the service of his country for a foreign war, but infringed the articles of peace with the Persians, and thereby provoked that mighty monarch against the Athenian republic. However, the credit of Chares saved him upon this, as it had done upon several other occasions. But the people were so terrified with the threatnings of the king of Persia, that they resolved to conclude a peace with the states which had revolted, almost upon their own terms: accordingly a treaty was agreed on very little to the honour of Athens, and an end put to the Social War, after it had continued for the space of four years*. By this treaty Rhodes, Chios, Cos, and Byzantium, were to enjoy full liberty, and be quite independent of Athens. It was on this occasion that Isocrates wrote that famous oration which is entitled, of peace or social, wherein he represents to the Athenians, that real and lasting greatness does not consist in making conquests, which cannot be effected without violence and injustice, but in governing the people with wisdom, and rendering them happy, in protecting their allies, and by good offices obliging and gaining over their neighbours, without having recourse to arms, except when all other means prove ineffectual. This oration is still extant and well worth the reader's perusal.

THE peace, which put an end to the war of the allies, did not procure for all of them the tranquillity they had reason to expect. The people of Cos and Rhodes, who had been declared free by the treaty, seemed only to have changed their master. Mausolus, king of Caria, who had assisted them in throwing off the Athenian yoke, declared for an aristocracy,

and by that means having oppressed the people, came by degrees to be absolute master of both islands, the nobility not daring, as they were hated by the people, to oppose him. But Mausolus dying two years after the treaty of peace with Athens, the people and nobility, uniting together, drove out the garrisons of Mausolus, and recovered their antient liberties. Having thus cleared their respective islands of foreign forces, the Rhodians, to revenge the injuries they had suffered from Mausolus, having equipped a fleet, invaded Caria, with a design to possess themselves of that country, which lay very convenient for them. The famous queen Artemisia, who had succeeded her husband in the kingdom of Caria, being acquainted with their design, ordered the inhabitants of Halicarnassus, where it was most likely they would land, to keep within the walls, and when the enemy arrived, to express by shouts and clapping of hands, a readiness to surrender. The inhabitants followed her directions; whereupon the Rhodians, not suspecting any treachery, left their fleet without any to guard it, and entered the city. In the mean time Artemisia came with her gallies out of the little port through a small canal, which she had caused to be cut on purpose, entered the great port, and seizing the enemy's fleet without resistance, set sail for Rhodes. The Rhodians, who had entered the city, having no means to make their escape, were all cut in pieces. But before this melancholy news reached Rhodes, Artemisia had got possession of that city. When the inhabitants saw their vessels approach adorned with wreaths of laurel, they admitted them into the port with extraordinary marks of joy, not doubting but they had taken Halicarnassus. Then Artemisia, landing her troops, fell upon the unarmed multitude, dispersed them, and having possessed herself of the city, put the chief citizens, who had promoted the Carian expedition, to death. Being now mistress of the metropolis, she caused a noble trophy to be erected in the market-place, and two statues of brass; one of which represented the city of Rhodes, and the other Artemisia branding it with an hot iron. The Rhodians afterwards surrounded that trophy with a building, which prevented it entirely from being seen, religion forbidding them to demolish any monuments which had been once consecrated. From this, and from what we read in one of Demosthenes's orations<sup>B</sup>, it appears, that Artemisia did not, like a forlorn and inconsolable widow, pass her whole time in grief and lamentation, as some writers would make us believe. A modern author of no mean character<sup>b</sup> suspects, that whatever has been reported of her excessive grief is without any foundation, being advanced by some, and perhaps believed, on account of the magnificent monument she erected to the memory of her deceased husband, and afterwards copied by others. And truly her whole conduct discovers rather the active courage of a queen, than the severe affliction and retirement of a widow. The Rhodians, being thus reduced by a woman, and unable to bear any longer so shameful a servitude, had recourse to the Athenians, and privately sent ambassadors to implore their protection. They had but lately provoked the Athenians by their revolt, and the many mischiefs which they had brought upon their republic, during the social war. However, Demosthenes took upon him to back their ambassadors, and speak to the people in their favour. He began by setting their revolt in its full light, and enlarging on their injustice and perfidy; insomuch, that some imagined the orator was going to declare against them in the strongest terms. But all this was only to insinuate himself into the favour of his auditors, and afterwards stir them up to compassion for a people, who acknowledged their fault, and owned themselves unworthy of that protection, which they were come to implore. He set before them the great maxims, which in all ages had gained so much glory to Athens, the forgiving of injuries, the pardoning of their enemies, and the taking upon them the defence of the unfortunate. To the motives of glory he added those of interest, shewing how necessary it was, that they should declare for a city, that favoured the democratic government, and not abandon, to a foreign power, so wealthy an island as that of Rhodes. This is the substance of that famous discourse, entitled, For the liberty of the Rhodians. What impression this speech made on the minds of the Athenians we know not. All we can advance with certainty is, that the Rhodians were soon after delivered from the yoke they groaned under. Some writers tell us, that they were indebted to the Athenians for their liberty, while others affirm, that Artemisia dying the same year she possessed herself of the island, the Rhodians reinstated themselves in their former condition with their own forces<sup>c</sup>.

FROM this time the Rhodians enjoyed a profound tranquillity till the reign of Alexander the Great, to whom they delivered up of their own accord their cities and harbours, and were on that account highly favoured by that prince <sup>k</sup>. Diodorus tells us, that Alexander lodged his last will in the archives of the city of Rhodes, and shewed on all occasions a greater value for the Rhodians, than for any other of the Greek nations. However, they no sooner heard the news of his death, but taking up arms they drove out the Macedonian garison, and once more became a free people <sup>l</sup>. About this time happened a dreadful inundation at Rhodes, which being accompanied with violent storms of rain, and hail-stones of an extraordinary bigness, beat down many houses, and killed great numbers of the inhabitants. As the city of Rhodes was built in the form of an amphitheatre, and no care had been taken to clear the pipes and conduits which conveyed the water into the sea, the lower parts of the city were in an instant laid under water, several houses quite covered, and the inhabitants drowned before they got to the higher places. As the deluge encreased, and the violent showers continued, some of the inhabitants made to their ships, and abandoned the place, while others, attempting to remedy the evil, miserably perished in the waters. The city being thus threatened with utter destruction, the wall all on a sudden burst asunder, and the water discharging itself with a violent current into the sea, unexpectedly delivered the inhabitants from all danger <sup>m</sup>.

THE Rhodians suffered greatly by this unexpected misfortune, but soon repaired their losses by applying themselves more closely than ever to trade and navigation, the only sources of their wealth and power. As the city of Rhodes was at this time very powerful at sea, and, according to Diodorus <sup>n</sup>, the best governed of any city among the Greeks, all the princes, who were then at variance with each other, courted her friendship. But the Rhodians carefully declined favouring one against another, and, by thus observing a strict neutrality in the wars that were kindled in those times, became one of the most opulent states of all Asia; infomuch, that, for the common good of all Greece, they undertook the Piratic war, and at their own charges cleared the seas of the pirates, who had for many years infested the coasts both of Europe and Asia. Though they were thus in amity with all the neighbouring princes, yet their inclination as well as interest secretly attached them to Ptolemy; for the most advantageous branches of their commerce sprung from Egypt. Wherefore when Antigonus, engaged in a war against Ptolemy for the island of Cyprus, demanded succours of them, they earnestly entreated him not to compel them to declare against their ancient friend and ally. But this answer, as prudent as it was, drew upon them the displeasure of Antigonus, who immediately ordered one of his admirals to sail with his fleet to Rhodes, and seize all the ships that made out of the harbour for Egypt. The Rhodians, finding their harbour blocked up by the fleet of Antigonus, equipped a good number of galleys, fell upon the enemy, and obliged him with the loss of many ships to quit his station. Hereupon Antigonus, charging them as the aggressors and beginners of an unjust war, threatened to besiege their city with the strength of his whole army. The Rhodians endeavoured by frequent embassies to appease his wrath, representing to him, that not they, but his admiral had begun hostilities, by seizing their trading vessels, and interrupting their navigation. But all their remonstrances served rather to provoke, than allay, his resentment; and the only terms, upon which he would hearken to any accommodation, were, that the Rhodians should declare war against Ptolemy; that they should admit his fleet into their harbour; and that an hundred of the chief citizens should be delivered up to him as hostages for the performance of these articles. The Rhodians, foreseeing the storm which was then impending, sent ambassadors to all their allies, and to Ptolemy in particular, imploring their assistance, and representing to the latter, that their attachment to his interest had drawn upon them the danger to which they were exposed. The preparations on both sides were immense. As Antigonus was near fourscore years of age at that time, he committed the whole management of the war to his son Demetrius, who appeared before the city of Rhodes with two hundred ships of war, an hundred and seventy transports having on board forty thousand men, and a thousand other vessels, loaded with provisions and all sorts of warlike engines. As Rhodes had enjoyed for many years a profound tranquillity, and been free from all devastations, the expectation of booty in the plunder of so wealthy a city allured multitudes of pirates and mercenaries to join Demetrius in this expedition; insomuch, that the whole sea between the continent and the island was covered with ships, which struck the Rhodians, who had a prospect of this mighty armada from the walls, with great terror and consternation. Demetrius, having landed his troops without the reach of the the enemy's machines, detached several small bodies to lay waste the country round the city, and cut down the trees and groves, employing the timber, and materials of the houses without the walls, to fortify his camp with strong ramparts and a treble palisade; which work, as many hands were employed, was finished in a few days °.

THE Rhodians on their part prepared for a vigorous defence. Many great commanders, who had signalized themselves on other occasions, threw themselves into the city, being desirous to try their skill in military affairs against Demetrius, who was reputed one of the most experienced captains, in the conduct of sieges, that antiquity had produced. The besieged began with dismissing from the city all such persons as were useless; and then taking an account of those, who were capable of bearing arms, they found that the citizens amounted to six thousand, and the foreigners to a thousand. Liberty was promised to all the slaves, who should distinguish themselves by any glorious action, and the public engaged to pay the masters their full ransom. A proclamation was likewise made, declaring, that whoever died in the defence of his country should be buried at the charge of the public; that his parents and children should be maintained out of the treasury; that fortunes should be given to his daughters; and his sons, when they were grown up, should be crowned and presented with a compleat suit of armour, at the great solemnity of Bacchus. This decree kindled an incredible ardour in all ranks of men. The rich came in crowds with money to defray the charges of the war, and the artificers applied themselves with indefatigable industry to the forging of arms, making of engines, and contriving new sorts of warlike machines, which did great execution on the enemy. In a word, every thing was in motion throughout all the quarters of the city, the workmen and artificers striving to out-do each other, and the rich supplying them with materials at their own charge.

THE besieged first sent out three nimble vessels against a small fleet of merchant ships that supplied the enemy with provisions. These falling upon them sunk some, took others, and burnt the greatest part of them, carrying back with them to Rhodes a great number of prisoners. By this first expedition the Rhodians gained a considerable sum of money; for it had been mutually agreed between them and Demetrius, that a thousand drachmas should be paid for the ransom of every freeman, and five hundred for each slave.

Demetrius, having planted all his engines, began to batter with incredible fury the walls on the side of the harbour, but was for eight days successively repulsed by the besieged, who set fire to most of his warlike machines, and thereby obliged him to allow them some respite, which they made good use of in repairing the breaches, and building new walls, where the old ones were either weak or low. When Demetrius had repaired his engines, he ordered a general assault to be made, and caused his troops to advance with loud shouts, thinking by this means to strike terror into the enemy, and drive them from the walls. But the besieged were so far from being intimidated, that they repulsed the aggressors with great slaughter, and performed the most astonishing feats of bravery. Demetrius returned to the assault the next day, but was in the same manner forced to retire, after having lost a great number of men, and some officers of distinction. He had seized at his first landing an eminence at a small distance from the city, and having fortified this advantageous post, he caused several batteries to be erected there with engines, which incessantly discharged against the walls stones of an hundred and fifty pounds weight. The towers being thus furiously battered night and day, began to totter, and several breaches were opened in the walls. Then the Rhodians, unexpectedly sallying out, drove the enemy from their post, overturned their machines, and made a most dreadful havock; insomuch that some of them retired on board their vessels, and were with much ado prevailed upon to come ashore again.

THE ardor of Demetrius was not diminished by this loss, he ordered a scalade by sea and land at the same time, and so employed the besieged, that they were at a loss what place they should chiefly defend. The attack was carried on with the utmost fury on all sides, and the besieged defended themselves with the greatest intrepidity. Such of the enemies as advanced first were thrown down from the ladders, and miserably bruised. Several of the chief officers, having mounted the walls, to encourage the soldiers by their example, were there either killed or taken prisoners. After the combat had lasted many hours with great slaughter on both sides, Demetrius, notwithstanding all his valour, thought it necessary to retire, in order to repair his engines, and give his men some days rest <sup>p</sup>.

Demetrius, being sensible that he could not reduce the city till he was master of the port, after having refreshed his men, returned with new vigour against the fortifications, which defended the entry into the harbour. When he came within the cast of a dart, he caused a vast quantity of burning torches and firebrands to be thrown into the Rhodian ships which were riding there, and at the same time galled, with dreadful showers of darts, arrows, and stones, such as offered to extinguish the flames. However, in spite of their utmost efforts, the Rhodians put a stop to the fire, and having, with great expedition, manned three of their strongest ships, drove with such violence against the vessels, on which the enemy's machines were planted, that they were shattered in pieces, and the engines dismounted and thrown into the sea. Excestus the Rhodian admiral, being encouraged with this success, attacked the enemy's fleet with his three ships, and sunk a great many vessels, but was himself at last taken prisoner; the other two vessels made their escape, and regained the port.

As unfortunate as this last attack had proved to Demetrius, he determined to undertake another; and, in order to succeed in his attempt, he ordered a machine of a new invention to be built, which was thrice the height and breadth of those he had lately lost. When the work was finished, he caused the engine to be placed near the port, which he was resolved at all adventures to force. But as it was upon the point of entering the harbour, a dreadful storm arising, drove it against the shore with the vessels on which it had been reared. The besieged, who were attentive to improve all favourable conjunctures, while the tempest was still raging, made a sally against those who defended the eminence mentioned above, and, though repulsed several times, carried it at last, obliging the Demetrians, to the number of four hundred, to throw down their arms and submit. After this victory, gained by the Rhodians, there arrived to their aid an hundred and fifty Gnossians, and five hundred men sent by Ptolemy from Egypt, most of them being natives of Rhodes, who had served among the king's troops<sup>4</sup>.

Demetrius, being extremely mortified to see all his batteries against the harbour rendered ineffectual, resolved to employ them by land, in hopes of carrying the city by assault, or at least reduce it to the necessity of capitulating. With this view, having got together a vast quantity of timber and other materials, he framed the famous engine called Helepolis, which was by many degrees larger than any that had ever been invented before. Its basis was square, each side being in length near fifty cubits, and made up of square pieces of timber, bound together with plates of iron. In the middle part he placed thick planks, about a cubit distance from each other, and on these the men were to stand who forced the engine forward. The whole was moved upon eight strong and large wheels, whose fellows were strengthened with strong iron plates. In order to facilitate and vary the movements of the Helepolis, casters were placed under it, whereby it was turned in a trice to what side the workmen and engineers pleased. From each of the four angles a large pillar of wood was carried to about the height of an hundred cubits, and inclining to each other, the whole machine consisting of nine stories, whose dimensions gradually lessened in the ascent. The first story was supported by forty three beams, and the last by no more than nine. Three sides of the machine were plated over with iron, to prevent its being damaged by the fire that might be thrown from the city. In the front of each story were windows, of the same size and shape as the engines that were to be discharged from thence. To each window were shutters to draw up for the defence of those who managed the machines, and, to deaden the force of the stones thrown by the enemy, the shutters were covered with skins stuffed with wool. Every story was furnished with two large stair-cases, that whatever was necessary might be brought up by one, while others were going down by the other, and so every thing might be dispatched without tumult or confusion. This huge machine was moved forwards by three thousand of the strongest men of the whole army, but the art with which it was built, greatly facilitated the motion. Demetrius caused likewise to be made several testudos or pent-houses, to cover his men while they advanced to fill up the trenches and ditches, and invented a new sort of galleries, through which those who were employed at the siege might pass and repass, at their pleasure, without the least danger. He employed all his seamen in levelling the ground, over which the machines were to be brought up to the space of four furlongs. The number of workmen, who were employed on this occasion, amounted to thirty thousand men.

In the mean time the Rhodians, observing these formidable preparations, were busy in raising a new wall within that which the enemy intended to batter with the Helepolis. In order to accomplish this work, they pulled down the wall, which surrounded the theatre, some neighbouring houses, and even some temples, after having solemnly promised to build more magnificent structures in honour of the gods, if the city were preserved. At the same time they sent out nine of their best ships to seize such of the enemy's vessels as they could meet with, and thereby distress them for want of provisions. As these ships were commanded by their bravest sea-officers, they soon returned with an immense booty, and a great many prisoners. Among other vessels they took a galley richly laden, on board of which they found great variety of valuable furniture and a royal robe, which Phila herself had wrought, and sent as a present to her husband Demetrius, accompanied with a letter written with her own hand. The Rhodians sent the furniture, the royal robe, and even the letter to Ptolemy, which exasperated Demetrius to a great degree. In this proceeding they did not imitate, as Plutarch observes, the polite conduct of the Athenians, who having once seized one of Philip's couriers, with whom they were then at war, opened all the packets but that of Olympias, which they sent sealed as it was to Philip.

WHILE Demetrius was preparing to attack the city, the Rhodians having assembled the people and magistrates to consult about the measures they should take, some proposed in the assembly the pulling down of the statues of Antigonus and his son Demetrius, which till then had been had in the utmost veneration. But this proposal was generally rejected with indignation, and their prudent conduct greatly allayed the wrath both of Antigonus and Demetrius. However the latter continued to carry on the siege with the utmost vigour, thinking it would reflect no small dishonour on him, were he obliged to quit the place without making himself master of it. He caused the walls to be secretly undermined; but when they were ready to fall, a deserter very opportunely gave notice of the whole to the townsmen, who having with all expedition drawn a deep trench all along the wall, began to countermine, and meeting the enemy under ground, obliged them to abandon the work. While both parties guarded the mines, one Athenagoras a Milesian, who had been sent to the assistance of the Rhodians by Ptolemy with a body of mercenaries, promised to betray the city to the Demetrians, and let them in through the mines in the night-time. But this was only in order to ensnare them; for Alexander, a noble Macedonian, whom Demetrius had sent with a choice body of troops to take possession of a post agreed on, no sooner appeared, but he was taken prisoner by the Rhodians, who were waiting for him under arms. Athenagoras was crowned by the senate with a crown of gold, and presented with five talents of silver.

Demetrius now gave over all thoughts of undermining the walls, and placed all his hopes of reducing the city in the battering engines which he had contrived. Having therefore levelled the ground under the walls, he brought up his Helepolis, with four testudos on each side of it. Two other testudos of an extraordinary size, bearing battering rams, were likewise moved forwards by a thousand men. Each story of the Helepolis was filled with all sorts of engines for discharging of stones, arrows, and darts. When all things were ready, Demetrius ordered the signal to be given, when his men, setting up a shout, assaulted the city on all sides, both by sea and land. But in the heat of the attack, when the walls were ready to fall by the repeated strokes of the battering-rams, ambassadors arrived from Cnidus, earnestly soliciting Demetrius to suspend all further hostilities, and at the same time giving him hopes, that they should prevail upon the Rhodians to submit to an honourable capitulation. A suspension of arms was accordingly agreed on, and ambassadors sent from both sides. But the Rhodians refusing to capitulate on the conditions offered them, the attack was renewed with so much fury, and the machines played off in so brisk a manner, that a large tower, built with square stones, and the wall that flanked it were battered down. The besieged nevertheless fought in the breach with so much courage and resolution, that the enemy, after various unsuccessful attempts, was forced to abandon the enterprize and retire <sup>f</sup>.

IN this conjuncture a fleet, which Ptolemy had freighted with three hundred thousand measures of corn and different kinds of pulse for the Rhodians, arrived very seasonably in the port, notwithstanding the vigilance of the enemy's ships, which cruised on the coasts of the island to surprize them. A few days after came in safe two other fleets, one sent by Cassander with an hundred thousand bushels of barley, the other by Lyfimachus with four hundred thousand bushels of corn and as many of barley. This seasonable and plentiful supply, arriving when the city began to suffer for want of provisions, inspired the besieged with new courage, and raised their drooping spirits. Being thus animated, they formed a design of setting the enemy's engines on fire, and with this view ordered a body of men to sally out the night ensuing, about the second watch, with torches and fire-brands, having first placed on the walls an incredible number of engines to discharge stones, arrows, darts, and fire-balls against those who should attempt to oppose their detachment. The Rhodian troops, pursuant to their orders, all on a sudden sallied out, and advancing in spite of all opposition to the batteries, set them on fire, while the engines from the walls played incessantly on those who endeavoured to extinguish the flames. The Demetrians on this occasion fell in great numbers, being incapable in the darkness of the night either to see the engines, that continually discharged showers of stones and arrows upon them, or to join in one body and repulse the enemy, the conflagration was so great, that several plates of iron falling from the Helepolis, that vast engine would have been entirely consumed, had not the troops, that were stationed in it, with all possible speed quenched the fire with water before prepared, and ready in the apartments of the engine against such accidents. Demetrius, fearing lest all his machines should be consumed, called together by sound of trumpet those whose province it was to move them, and by their help brought them off before they were entirely destroyed. When it was day he commanded all the darts and arrows, that had been shot by the Rhodians, to be carefully gathered, that he might from their number form some judgment of the number of machines in the city. Above eight hundred fire-brands were found on the spot, and no fewer than fifteen hundred darts, all discharged in a very small portion of the night. This struck the prince himself with no small terror, for he never imagined, that they could have been able to bear the charges of such formidable preparations. However, after having caused the slain to be buried, and given directions for the curing of the wounded, he applied himself to the repairing of his machines, which had been dismounted and rendered quite unserviceable.

In the mean time the besieged, improving the respite allowed them by the removal of the machines, built a third wall in the form of a crescent, which took in all that part that was most exposed to the enemy's batteries; and besides drew a deep trench behind the breach to prevent the enemy from entering the city that way. At the same time they detached a squadron of their best ships, under the command of Amyntas, who made over to the continent of Asia, and there meeting with some privateers, who were commissioned by Demetrius, took both the ships and the men, among whom were Timocles, the chief of the pirates, and several officers of distinction belonging to the fleet of Demetrius. On their return they fell in with several vessels laden with corn for the enemy's camp, which they likewise took and brought into the port. These were soon followed by a numerous fleet of similar vessels, loaded with corn and provisions sent them by Demetrius.

together with fifteen hundred men, commanded by Antigonus, a Macedonian of great experience in military affairs. Demetrius, in the mean time having repaired the machines, brought them up anew to the walls, which he incessantly battered, till he opened a great breach, and threw down several towers. But when he came to the assault, the Rhodians under the command of Aminias defended themselves with such resolution and intrepidity, that he was in three successive attacks repulsed with great slaughter, and at last forced to retire. The Rhodians likewise on this occasion lost several officers, and amongst others the brave Aminias their commander.

WHILE the Rhodians were thus signaling themselves in the defence of their country, a second embassy arrived at the camp of Demetrius from Athens and the other cities of Greece, soliciting Demetrius to compose matters, and strike up a peace with the Rhodians. At the request of the ambassadors, who were in all above fifty, a cessation of arms was agreed upon, but the terms offered by Demetrius being again rejected by the Rhodians, the ambassadors returned home without being able to bring the contending parties to an agreement. Hostilities were therefore renewed, and Demetrius, whose imagination was fertile in expedients for succeeding in his projects, formed a detachment of fifteen hundred of his best troops, under the conduct of Alcimus and Mancius, two officers of great resolution and experience, ordering them to enter the breach at midnight, and, forcing the entrenchment behind it, to possess themselves of the posts about the theatre, where it would be no difficult matter to maintain themselves against any efforts of the townsmen. In order to facilitate the execution of so important and dangerous an undertaking, and amuse the enemy with false attacks, he at the same time, upon a signal given, ordered the rest of the army to set up a shout, and attack the city on all sides, both by sea and land. By this means he hoped, that the besieged being alarmed in all parts, his detachment might find an opportunity of forcing the entrenchments which covered the breach, and afterwards of seizing the advantageous posts about the theatre. This feint had all the success the prince could expect; for the troops having set up a shout from all quarters, as if they were advancing to a general assault, the detachment commanded by Alcimus and Mancius entered the breach, and fell upon those, who defended the ditch and the wall that covered it, with such vigour, that, having slain the best part of them and put the rest in confusion, they advanced to the theatre, and seized on the posts adjoining to it. This occasioned a general uproar in the city, as if it had been already taken

But

But the commanding officers dispatched orders to the soldiers on the ramparts not to quit their posts, nor stir from their respective stations. Having thus secured the walls, they put themselves at the head of a chosen body of their own troops and of those who were lately come from Egypt, and with these charged the enemy's detachment. But the darkness of the night prevented them from dislodging the enemy, and regaining the advantageous posts they had seized. But the day no sooner appeared, than they renewed their attack with wonderful bravery. The Demetrians without the walls with loud shouts endeavoured to animate those who had entered the place, and inspire them with a resolution to maintain their ground, till they were relieved with fresh forces. The Rhodians, being sensible, that their fortunes, liberties, and all that was dear to them in the world lay at stake, fought like men in the utmost despair, the enemy defending their posts for several hours without giving ground in the least. At length the Rhodians, encouraging each other to exert themselves in defence of their country, and animated by the example of their leaders, made a last effort, and breaking into the very heart of the enemy's battalion, there killed both their commanders. After their death the rest were easily put in disorder, and all to a man either killed or taken prisoners. The Rhodians likewise on this occasion lost many of their best commanders, and among the rest Damotetis, their chief magistrate, a man of extraordinary valour, who had signalized himself during the whole time of the siege<sup>1</sup>.

Demetrius, not at all discouraged by this check, was making the necessary preparations for a new assault, when he received letters from his father Antigonus, enjoining him to conclude a peace with the Rhodians upon the best terms he could get, lest he should lose his whole army in the siege of a single town. From this time Demetrius wanted only some plausible pretence for breaking up the siege. The Rhodians likewise were now more inclined to come to an agreement than formerly, Ptolemy having acquainted them, that he intended to send them a great quantity of corn, and three thousand men to their assistance, but that he would have them first to try, whether they could make up matters with Demetrius upon reasonable terms. At the same time ambassadors arrived from the Ætolian republic, soliciting the contending parties to put an end to a war, which might involve all the east in endless calamities.

AN accident, which happened to Demetrius in this conjuncture, did not a little contribute towards the wished-for pacification. This prince was preparing to advance his Helepolis against the city, when a Rhodian engineer found means to render it quite useless. He undermined the tract of ground over which the Helepolis was to pass the next day, in order to approach the walls. Demetrius, not suspecting any stratagem of this nature, caused the engine to be moved forward, which, coming to the place that was undermined, sunk so deep into the ground, that it was impossible to draw it out again. This misfortune, if we believe Vegetius and Vitruvius, determined Demetrius to hearken to the Ætolian ambassadors, and at last to strike up a peace upon the following conditions : that the republic of Rhodes should be maintained in the full enjoyment of their antient rights, privileges, and liberties without any foreign garison ; that they should renew their antient alliance with Antigonus, and assist him in his wars against all states and princes, except Ptolemy king of Egypt ; and that, for the effectual performance of the articles stipulated between them, they should deliver an hundred hostages, such as Demetrius should make choice of, except those who bore any public employment<sup>u</sup>.

THUS the siege was raised after it had continued a whole year, and the Rhodians amply rewarded all those, who had distinguished themselves in the defence of their country ; the slaves were set free, and admitted to the rights and privileges of citizens, and many of the freemen crowned with crowns of gold, and honoured with rich presents out of the public treasury. They likewise set up statues to Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lyfimachus, who had greatly contributed to the preservation of the place. But to express their gratitude to Ptolemy above the rest, they sent some of their priests to consult the oracle of Ammon, whether they should worship him as a god, or no ; and being answered, that they might pay him divine honours, they consecrated to him a square grove in the city, enclosing it with a sumptuous portico, which was a furlong in length, and from him called Ptolemeum or Ptolemy's portico ; and in order to perpetuate the memory of their deliverer in this war by another method, they gave him the appellation of Soter, that is, Saviour. By this surname he is distinguished by the historians from the other Ptolemies, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Egypt<sup>w</sup>. Some writers have imagined, that the surname of Soter was given him for having saved Alexander in the city of the Oxydracans * ; but in this particular we choose with the learned Usher to follow Diodorus.

Demetrius, now reconciled with the Rhodians, at his departure presented them with the Helepolis and all the other machines he had employed in the siege, which they selling, erected, with the money accruing from the sale, and with some additional sums of their own, the famous colossus, as we have hinted above. We cannot help taking notice here of one circumstance, which greatly redounds to the honour of Demetrius. Rhodes was, at the time of the siege, the residence of a celebrated painter named Protogenes, who was a native of Cannus a city of Caria. The house, where he lived, was in the suburbs without the city when Demetrius first besieged it. But neither the presence of the enemy, who surrounded him, nor the noise of the arms, that perpetually rung in his ears, could induce him to quit his habitation or interrupt his work. The king, surprized at this, asked him, Why he did not, like the other inhabitants, save himself within the walls ? Protogenes replied, that he was under no apprehension, since he was sensible, that Demetrius had declared war against the Rhodians, and not against the sciences. The prince was so pleased with this answer, that from that time he took him under his protection, and placed a safe-guard round his house to protect him from the insults of the soldiery. The master-piece of Protogenes was the picture of one Ialysus (E), supposed

(E) This Ialysus was but a fabulous hero, the son of Orchimus and grandson of Apollo and the nymph Rhoda. Protogenes is said to have employed seven years in finishing this piece, during which time he condemned himself to a very rigid and abstemious life, eating nothing but lupines, lest the vapours, which a richer food might send up to the brain, should darken his imagination. To make the picture the more lasting, he covered it with four lays of colours, that as time should wear one away, another underneath should still appear fresh. When Apelles first saw it, he was so transported with admiration, that his speech failed him for some time ; and when he began to recover from his astonishment, he cried out, Prodigious work ! a wonderful performance ! However, it has not all those graces which the world admires in my works. One of the figures in this picture was a dog, which had cost the painter immense pains without his being able to express to his own satisfaction the idea he had conceived. He endeavoured to represent the dog in a panting attitude with his mouth foaming, as after a long course, and exerted supposed by the Rhodians to have founded their city. Pliny pretends, that the city was saved by this piece ; it was lodged, as he informs us, in that quarter of the city, by which alone it was possible for Demetrius to storm the place ; but he chose rather to retire from before the city, than to expose so valuable a monument of art to the danger of being consumed in the flames *. This indeed would have been carrying his taste to a surprizing excess ; but we have already intimated the true reasons which obliged Demetrius to raise the siege.

THE Rhodians having finished this war, and concluded a peace upon very honourable and advantageous terms, applied themselves entirely to trade and navigation, by which they not only became masters of the sea, as Polybius styles them †, but the most opulent and flourishing state of all Greece. They

ed all the skill he could, but still was dissatisfied with what he had done. Art, in his opinion, was more visible than it ought to have been, and he wanted to make the foam appear not painted, but actually flowing out of the dog's mouth. He frequently retouched it, but could not express those simple traces of nature of which he had formed the ideas in his mind. At last finding all his attempts unsuccessful, in a violent emotion of rage and despair he darted at the picture the sponge with which he used to wipe off his colours, and chance accomplish'd, to use Pliny's expression, what art had not been able to effect (81). In the same piece was a satyr represented with wonderful art leaning against a column, on the top of which was a thrush so well done, that when the picture was exposed to view, some fowlers with thrushes having stopt to see it, their birds, mistaking the painted thrush for a real one, began to sing as soon as they discovered it (82). This piece Cicero admired above all the pictures he had ever seen ; for in his time it was still in Rhodes. It was afterwards carried to Rome by Cassius, and consecrated in the temple of Peace, where it remained in Pliny's time ; but was in the reign of the emperor Commodus, as Herodianus informs us, consumed with the temple by fire. Protogenes is censured by the ancients for often retouching his pictures without ever being satisfied with what he had done. Of him it was that Apelles said, Nescit manum de tabula tollere, as Pliny expresses it ; a defect to be equally avoided, as Tully observes, by painters and writers ; we ought, says that great orator, to know how far it is proper to expatiate on every subject : for Apelles justly censured some painters, who could never quit the pencil, nor put the last hand to their work (83).

endeavoured to maintain, as much as lay in their power, a strict neutrality in the wars that broke out in the east, especially after the death of Antigonus, but, however, could not help being involved in one with the Byzantines, which lasted but a short time, and did not prove very expensive. The ground of this war is thus related by Polybius; the Byzantines, being obliged to pay a yearly tribute of fourscore talents to the Gauls, in order to raise this sum, came to a resolution of laying a toll on all the ships that traded to the Pontic sea. This resolution provoked the Rhodians, who were a trading nation, above all the rest. Wherefore they immediately dispatched ambassadors to the Byzantines complaining of this new tax; but as the Byzantines had no other means of raising money wherewithal to satisfy the avarice of the Gauls, and redeem their country from the rapines of those barbarians, they persisted in their former resolution. Whereupon the Rhodians declared war against them, and at the same sent to solicit Prusias king of Bithynia to join them, being well assured, that Prusias wanted only a favourable opportunity of venting his resentment upon the Byzantines for having endeavoured to reconcile Attalus and Achæus, who were both declared enemies to the king of Bithynia. The Byzantines likewise dispatched ambassadors to Attalus and Achæus soliciting aid from them. They found Attalus disposed to assist them; but he was not then in a condition to give them a proof of his friendship, having been lately confined by Achæus to the antient limits of his father's kingdom. As for Achæus, who was at this time in possession of all Asia on this side mount Taurus, and had lately assumed the title of king, he readily espoused the cause of the Byzantines, and promised to assist them with the whole power of his kingdom <sup>2</sup>.

In the mean time Prusias, taking the field, possessed himself of Hieron, which town formerly belonged in common to the merchants trading to the Pontic sea, but had been lately purchased by the Byzantines with a great sum of money, by reason of its convenient situation for protecting their trade. He likewise seized on all that portion of Mysia in Asia which they had enjoyed for many ages. At the same time the Rhodians with their fleet ravaged the coasts of the Byzantine territories, and seized all their ships trading to the Pontic sea. But these losses were not sufficient to make them comply with the request of the Rhodians, or to hearken to the terms proposed to them by Xenophon the Rhodian admiral. They chiefly depended upon the promises made them by Achæus, who was both inclined to assist them, and had a powerful army on foot. The Rhodians therefore, to draw Achæus off from the Byzantines, sent ambassadors to Ptolemy king of Egypt, entreating him to deliver up to them Andromachus, the father of Achæus, who was at that time a prisoner in Alexandria. They hoped, that by sending him back to his son without ransom, they should so gain the goodwill of Achæus, as to prevent him at least from sending any succours to their enemies. Ptolemy did not readily yield to the demand of the Rhodians; for Andromachus, being both father to Achæus and brother to Laodice the wife of Seleucus, he proposed to make a better bargain of him for himself; for the disputes between him and Antiochus were not yet composed; and Achæus was become very powerful, extending his conquests far and wide. However, Ptolemy was at length prevailed upon to gratify the Rhodians by delivering up Andromachus to them. The Rhodians immediately restored him without ransom to his son, and, by that grateful office and other honours decreed to Achæus, gained him over to their party, and so deprived the enemy of their chief support. Another misfortune at the same time befel the Byzantines, which proved no less prejudicial to their affairs. They had sent for Tibites, who was then in Macedon, and had as just a claim to the kingdom of Bithynia as Prusias, who was his nephew. Tibites immediately set out from Macedon in hopes of raising disturbances in Bithynia, and making good his title to that kingdom, when supported by the power of the Byzantines. But he died on his journey, and his death so disheartened the Byzantines, that they began to deliberate how they might extricate themselves out of their present difficulties. Cavarus, king of the Thracian Gauls, happened to be at that time in Byzantium, and, being desirous to have the glory of putting an end to the war, offered his mediation, which being readily accepted by the contending parties, a peace was concluded between the Rhodians and Byzantines, upon condition that the Byzantines should forbear exacting toll on ships trading to the Pontic sea; which was all the Rhodians had in view in declaring war. As for king Prusias, the articles of the treaty with him were, that there should be perpetual peace between him and the Byzantines; that Prusias should restore to the Byzantines all the lands, towns, people, &c. which he had taken during the war, and that he should repair all the damages suffered by the Byzantines and Mysians subject to them. Thus a period was put to the war between the Byzantines on one

one side, and king Prusias, surnamed Cholos or the Lame, and the Rhodians on the other <sup>a</sup>.

ABOUT this time happened that dreadful earthquake, which, as we have hinted above, threw down the famous colossus, the arsenal, and great part of the walls of the city of Rhodes; which calamity the Rhodians improved to their advantage, sending ambassadors to all the princes and states of the Greek name, who exaggerating their losses procured immense sums for the repairing of them. Hiero king of Syracuse presented them with an hundred talents, and besides exempted from all taxes and duties such as traded to Rhodes. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, gave them an hundred talents, a million of measures of wheat, materials for building twenty quinqueremes, and the like number of triremes, and besides sent them an hundred architects, three hundred workmen, and materials for repairing their public buildings to a great value, paying them moreover fourteen talents a year for the maintenance of the workmen he sent them. Antigonus gave them an hundred talents of silver with ten thousand pieces of timber, each piece being sixteen cubits long, seven thousand planks, 3000 pounds of iron, as many of pitch and rosin, and a thousand measures of tar. Chryseis, a woman of distinction, sent them an hundred thousand measures of wheat, and three thousand pounds of lead. Antiochus exempted from all taxes and duties the Rhodian ships trading to his dominions, presented them with ten gallies, and two hundred thousand measures of corn, with many other things of great value. Prusias, Mithridates, Lyfanius, Olympicus, Limnæus and all the other princes then reigning in Asia made them proportionable presents. In short all the Greek towns and nations, all the princes of Europe and Asia contributed, according to their ability, to the relief of the Rhodians on that occasion; in-somuch, that their city not only soon rose from its ruins, but attained to a higher pitch of riches and splendor than ever <sup>b</sup>.

A FEW years after the Rhodians could not help engaging in a war against Philip king of Macedon, which cost them immense treasures. Philip, without any provocation, had invaded the territories of Attalus king of Pergamus, and because the Rhodians seemed to favour their antient friend and ally, the king of Macedon sent one Heraclides, by birth a Tarentine, to set fire to their fleet, and at the same time dispatched ambassadors into Crete in order to stir up the Cretans against the Rhodians, and thereby prevent them from lending any assistance to Attalus. These proceedings so provoked the Rhodians, that they entered into an alliance with Attalus, and proclaimed war against Philip <sup>c</sup>. That prince at first gained an inconsiderable advantage over the Rhodians, in a naval engagement fought near the island of Lada, over-against the city of Miletus, having taken two of their quinqueremes and dispersed the rest. The next year he ventured a second battle off the island of Chios against the united fleets of Attalus and the Rhodians; but was defeated with the loss of three thousand Macedonians and six thousand allies; and besides, 2000 Macedonians and seven hundred Egyptians, who served on board his fleet, were taken prisoners, the Rhodians having lost in all but sixty men, and Attalus seventy. Notwithstanding this loss, which was the greatest he had ever sustained to that day, either by sea or land, he gave out, that he had been victorious, because he happened to take the ship which carried Attalus after it had been driven ashore. However, he afterwards carefully avoided coming to a sea engagement either with Attalus or the Rhodians. After this victory the two fleets steered their course towards the island of Ægina, where they came to an anchor, hoping to intercept Philip, as he returned on board his fleet into Macedon. But failing in their attempt, they sailed to Pyræus the port of Athens, and there renewed their alliance with the Athenians, who, having been lately insulted by Philip, paid them extraordinary honours, adding to their ten tribes, each of which bore the name of one of their heroes, an eleventh, which they called Attalis, in honour of Attalus, and presenting the Rhodians with a crown of gold, after having made all the inhabitants of Rhodes free of Athens. The king of Pergamus and the Rhodians, better pleased with the treaty than the honours bestowed upon them, returned on board their gallies and set sail, Attalus to the island of Ægina, and the Rhodians to their own island. In their passage they drew into their confederacy all the Cyclades, except Andros, Paros, and Cythnos, where Philip kept Macedonian garisons. Nevertheless, this separation of Attalus and the Rhodians proved of very bad consequence for the common cause. Had they kept united, and pursued Philip in his retreat, or at least shut up all the entrances into Greece, they would have re-established its liberty, and deprived the Romans of that glory. But while the Rhodians and Attalus were losing time in negotiations with the inhabitants of the Cyclades and Ægina, Philip, who knew how to improve the faults of his enemies to his own advantage, having divided his forces into two bodies, sent one under the command of Philocles to ravage the territory of Athens; the other he put on board his fleet, with orders to sail to Meronea, a city on the north coast of Thrace. As for himself, he marched by land to the same place, attended only by two thousand foot and two hundred horse. The city, being attacked at the same time by sea and land, was taken at the first assault. The city of Ænos, which stood on the same coast, was betrayed to the Macedonians by the governor of the place; and then all the castles along the shore submitted of their own accord to the conqueror, who passed on from thence to the Thracian Chersonesus, where he took Eleus, Alopeconesus, Callipolis, and Madytos. From the Chersonesus the king passed over the Hellepont, and laid siege to Abydos, which city stopped the rapidity of his conquests, but was at last taken by assault, as we shall relate at length in the history of the successors of Alexander <sup>d</sup>.

BEFORE Philip began the siege of Abydos, the Rhodians and Attalus had sent ambassadors to Rome to complain of him, and inform the senate, that he was soliciting several states in Asia to take up arms, with a design to enslave the Greek cities that refused to join him, and then pursue his conquests both in Europe and Asia. The Rhodians had in the very beginning of this war entered into an alliance with Rome, and on that consideration their ambassadors were received with marks of great distinction by the senate, who promised to dispatch ambassadors to Philip, and employ their good offices with that prince, in behalf of the Greeks in Asia and Europe. They were as good as their word, but Philip dismissed their ambassadors without shewing any inclination to treat of a peace. Whereupon the Romans, Attalus, and the Rhodians having renewed their alliance, war was proclaimed at Rome against Philip, and P. Sulpitius the consul sent with an army into Macedon. On his arrival he found Athens besieged by part of the king's troops, and the king himself busy in making the necessary preparations for invading the kingdom of Pergamus. Sulpitius immediately detached a squadron of twenty galleys to the relief of Athens, under the conduct of Claudius Centho, who obliged the Macedonians to raise the siege, and performed such exploits in Greece as were worthy of the con-

ful himself. Sulpitius was not in a condition to undertake any thing else the rest of the year ; he had left Rome too late, and did not arrive in Epirus before the end of Autumn, when the season did not allow him to keep out at sea or take the field <sup>e</sup>.

E A R L Y in the spring, the Rhodians sent twenty gallies, under the command of Agessimbrotus, to join Attalus and Apustius the Roman admiral, and these three fleets struck such terror into the Macedonians, that they durst not venture out of their harbours ; so that the confederates laying siege to Oreos, a strong city subject to Philip on the eastern coast of Eubæa, made themselves masters of that important place, and afterwards laid waste all the neighbouring countries which adhered to Philip. The ensuing year the Rhodians, in conjunction with Attalus and L. Quinctius, brother to Titus Quinctius Flaminius, after having rayaged the country of the Carystii, laid siege to Eretria, a city near the Euripus, which they took by assault ; and then returning to Carystus carried that place likewise. From Carystus they entered the Saronic gulf, and appeared before Cenchrea one of the ports of Corinth, which they likewise reduced. But Corinth itself, being garisoned by some of the choicest of the Macedonian troops and the Roman deserters, the consul, who attacked the place by land, while his brother with the Rhodians invested it by sea, was forced to raise the siege after he had made a breach in the walls <sup>f</sup>.

The Rhodians recover the province of Peræa from Philip.

T H E S E exploits the Rhadians performed in conjunction with the Romans and king Attalus. But the province of Peræa they recovered from Philip with their own forces alone. Peræa was a small province of Caria, separated by the Carpathian sea from the island of Rhodes, to which it had been formerly subject. This province the Rhadians undertook to recover, while Philip's forces were engaged with Attalus and the Romans, committing the whole conduct of this expedition to Pausistratus, who was then their prætor or chief magistrate. Pausistratus put to sea with his fleet, and landed in Caria at the head of two thousand nine hundred men. With this small army he encamped in the plain which led to Stratonice, one of the richest cities in Caria, and antiently peopled, according to Strabo, by a colony from Macedon. The Rhodian general on his landing had the precaution to seize on a strong hold, called Tendeba, where he was reinforced by a thousand Achæans and an hundred horse, sent him by the Achæan republic. Dinocrates, one of the king of Macedon's generals, hearing that the Rhodians had made a descent in Caria, and possessed themselves of Tendeba, immediately hastened thither to recover the place, and oblige the enemy to reembark. But finding them well fortified, he turned towards Astragon, a fortress on the borders of the territory of Stratonice. Under the walls of this castle he strengthened his army with all the Macedonian garisons in that neighbourhood, and then marched to Alubanda, where the Rhodians were encamped, with a design to draw them to a decisive action. The Rhodians were so far from declining a battle, that they came to meet him, and encamped at a small distance from his army. The two generals drew up their troops in battalia. Dinocrates posted five hundred Macedonians on the right, the Argives on the left, and the Carians in the center. Pausistratus placed most of his auxiliaries in the center, and the Cretans and Thracians in the wings. Both armies advanced in good order, and continued some time within reach of each other before they began the attack, being separated by a rivulet. At last Pausistratus, advancing at the head of his mercenaries, charged the Macedonian phalanx with such fury that he put it in disorder; then the rest of his army, forcing their way through the ranks, already broken by the confusion and flight of the Phalangites, spread terror and slaughter every where. Dinocrates in vain endeavoured to rally his disordered troops; the affrighted soldiers would not hearken to the voice of their commander, and the general himself was forced to retire with the small remains of his army to Bargyliæ a city of Caria. The Rhodians spent the rest of the day in pursuing the fugitives, and in the evening returned to their camp. Nothing now prevented them from marching directly to Stratonice, which city they might have made themselves masters of without striking a blow. There was no enemy in the field, and Dinocrates had drawn out the garison to reinforce his army before the battle. But not knowing how to use their victory, they lost a favourable opportunity of extending their conquests all over Caria. They reduced indeed all the castles and towns of Peræa; but in the mean time gave the Macedonian general leisure to supply Stratonice with provisions, and throw himself into it with the remains of his army; so that all the efforts of Pausistratus, in attempting afterwards to reduce it, proved ineffectual<sup>8</sup>.

ABOUT this time Antiochus, surnamed the Great, having reduced in one campaign Cælo-Syria, Phœnice, and Judæa,

The Rhodians give a signal proof of their attachment to the Romans, and of their zeal for the common interest of Greece.

was making vast preparations in order to conquer Cilicia and Caria, and then pass into Europe and join his old ally Philip. With this view having raised a mighty army, he sent it under the command of his two sons, Arduus and Mithridates to wait for him at Sardis, while he with a powerful fleet, consisting of an hundred large ships of war and two hundred other vessels, reduced the cities on the coasts of Caria and Cilicia, which were subject to the king of Egypt. On this occasion the Rhodians gave a signal proof of their attachment to Rome, and zeal for the common interests of Greece. Antiochus had already taken Zephyrium, Soli, Aphrodisias, Selinus, and several other castles along the coast, and was actually besieging Coracesium, an important place in Cilicia, when the Rhodians sent an embassy to him, requiring him not to extend his conquests beyond Nephelis, a famous promontory of Cilicia, and threatening him with war in case he did not comply with their request. The ambassadors were ordered to add, that the Rhodians were not prompted to take up arms against him out of any grudge or hatred to his person; but because they would not suffer him to join Philip, and interrupt the progress of the Romans in restoring Greece to its antient liberty. When the ambassadors were brought into his tent, for he was then encamped before Coracesium, and acquainted him with their business, the proud monarch, who was used to give laws to others, was highly provoked; but, however, had command enough over his temper not to express any resentment. He only answered, that he would take care not to quarrel with the Rhodians or the Romans, with whom he designed always to keep up a good understanding; that he would send ambassadors to renew the antient treaties, which his ancestors had made with Rhodes, and that he had been always desirous to live in amity with the Romans; and, in proof of the friendship then subsisting between him and that republic, he gave them an account of the embassy he had lately sent to Rome, and of the great honours which had been bestowed upon his ambassadors by the senate. Soon after Antiochus sent ambassadors to Rhodes, who upon their arrival there heard the news of the entire defeat of Philip at Cynocephalæ. This news emboldened the Romans, and most of them were for putting a fleet out to sea and engaging Antiochus. But the Rhodians advised them rather to secure the liberty of the cities in alliance with the king of Egypt, which were not yet subdued by Antiochus. Their advice was followed, and the cities of Caunus, Myndus, Halicarnassus, and the island of Samos were by this means preserved from the Syrian yoke. However, Antiochus reduced Coracesium, Coricus, Andriace, † Limyra,

Limyra, Patara, Xanthus, all which cities belonged to Ptolemy, and lastly Ephesus itself <sup>h</sup>.

IN the mean time, a peace being concluded between Philip and the Romans, the Rhodians were, by the articles of the treaty, put in possession of Stratonice and the best part of Caria. This regard shewn them by the Romans encouraged them to assist the republic to the utmost of their power in the war, which was soon after proclaimed at Rome against Antiochus. They sent Pausistratus with thirty ships of war to join Livius the Roman admiral, and act in conjunction with him against Antiochus. But the best part of the fleet was, by the artifice of Polyxenidas Antiochus's admiral, surprized and destroyed. Polyxenidas was himself by birth a Rhodian, but having been banished his country, had gone into the service of the king of Syria, and was now commander in chief of the Syrian fleet. Pausistratus had advanced with his fleet as far as the island of Samos, where he received an express from Polyxenidas, telling him, that being now master of the Syrian fleet, it was in his power to do Pausistratus and his country signal service, provided Pausistratus would engage in the name of his republic to restore him to his native country, and to the honours he enjoyed before his banishment. Pausistratus, thinking that such a proposal ought neither to be implicitly believed, nor absolutely neglected, desired Polyxenidas to explain himself more fully, and promised secrecy. Then the latter sent a second express, acquainting him, that he was ready to deliver up Antiochus's fleet, provided only, he might be permitted to return to his country, and be reinstated in his former condition there. This Pausistratus thought a proposal of too much importance to be rejected, and in order to give Polyxenidas time to follow him, he retired with his squadron to a port of Samos, called Panormus, and there waited to see the conclusion of the affair. From thence he sent an express to Polyxenidas, promising him whatever he demanded; and Polyxenidas on his side sent him a letter written with his own hand, wherein he promised to deliver up the whole Syrian fleet. Upon this open declaration Pausistratus was no longer in suspense. He had it in his power to ruin Polyxenidas; and he could not believe, that a wise man would make a promise, which might cost him his life, without designing to perform it. Nothing therefore remained but to take the proper measures for putting the design in execution. To this end Polyxenidas promised to caution all duty to be neglected on board the Syrian fleet; to separate the soldiers and seamen under several pretences, to send them away from the port of Ephesus, where his fleet was then at anchor, and by that means expose them to be taken without the least difficulty. This method pleased Pausistratus, who affected the same negligence, which he was assured he should find in the enemy's fleet, and quietly waited for notice when he should go and attack them in the port of Ephesus. In the mean time Polyxenidas, the better to cover his real design, sent away some of his gallies, ordered the harbour to be cleansed, and seemed in no haste to put to sea. While Pausistratus was daily expecting to be called to Ephesus, a private person happened to come from that city to Samos, who being examined by Pausistratus concerning the proceedings of Polyxenidas and the condition of his fleet, ingenuously told him, that the port of Ephesus was full of ships, that the soldiers and mariners were all assembled at a place within reach of it, and that the Syrian admiral was making great preparations as if he had some great enterprize in view. Notwithstanding this sincere report of an indifferent person, Pausistratus was so prepossessed with the promise of an artful enemy, that he still continued at Samos, in hopes of being soon sent for to take the Syrian fleet. But Polyxenidas took quite different measures; he sailed from Ephesus with seventy ships of war, steering his course to Pygela, a city on the coast of Ionia, whence the Asiatic fleets generally set out for Greece. But before he weighed anchor, he ordered one Nicaner, commander of a squadron of privateers, to make a descent in the island of Samos, and conceal his men there till the rest of the fleet arrived. From Pygela Polyxenidas set sail for the port of Panormus, where arriving in the night, he found the Rhodians lying on the shore without any apprehension of an enemy. But the noise of a fleet entering the port soon awakened them. As they were all veteran troops, Pausistratus, at last convinced of the treachery of his adversary, thought it more adviseable to make use of them in a fight at land than at sea; and accordingly drew them up in order of battle to the right and left upon two promontories, which formed the mouth of the harbour. They were scarce drawn up when they were, to their great surprize, attacked in the rear by Nicaner, who had therein followed the directions of Polyxenidas. The Rhodians, fearing lest they should be surrounded, retired with precipitation to their ships; but, the mouth of the harbour being stopped up by the Syrian fleet, they found it necessary to force a way through it in order to gain the high seas. The galley, on board of which was Pausistratus, was the first that faced the enemy at the mouth of the port, and broke through their fleet in spite of all opposition ; but, being immediately invested by five quinqueremes commanded by Polyxenidas in person, she was overpowered and sunk. Thus perished Pausistratus, who had on all occasions distinguished himself by his courage and prudent conduct, and was at last overcome by a base stratagem. After the death of the admiral, the Rhodian fleet was soon destroyed ; some of the gallies were taken in sight of the port, others in the port itself, while they attempted to force their way out ; inasmuch, that of this great armament only seven ships escaped, viz. five belonging to Rhodes, and two to the island of Cos. These, in order to force their way through the enemy's fleet, lighted great fires in their prows, and from thence held out long poles with kettles full of burning bitumen, which, by the terror they gave the enemy, favoured their escape. In their flight they were met by some Erythræan gallies, that were coming to their assistance ; and with them they turned towards the Hellepont, where they joined the Roman fleet, which under the command of Livius was carrying on the siege of Abydos <sup>1</sup>.

THE Rhodians, notwithstanding this loss, did not renounce their alliance with Rome, or their engagement to assist her with all their forces. They immediately fitted out twenty new gallies, and gave the command of them to Eudamus, a man indeed less brave and experienced than Pausistratus, but more mistrustful and circumspect. Eudamus having joined the Roman admiral at Samos, the confederates sailed from thence together to Ephesus, where they not only insulted the Syrian fleet under the command of Polyxenidas, but even challenged them to an engagement at land. But the challenge not being accepted, they returned to Samos, whence Livius, after he had resigned his command to his successor Æmilius, was detached with part of the fleet to reduce Patara in Lycia, which place was a great check upon the Rhodians while in the enemy's hands. But Livius failed in his attempt ; whereupon the Roman and Rhodian fleets sailing to Abraham, where Antiochus was encamped, obliged him to retire to Sardis, and then the confederate fleets returned to Samos, where they parted. Eumenes went to the Hellepont to convoy the Scipios, who were appointed to carry on the war against Antiochus, over into Asia. Eudamus returned to Rhodes with his gallies to receive there new reinforcements ; and Æmilius continued at Samos to watch the motions of Polyxenidas who was still shut up in the port of Ephesus <sup>2</sup>.

The Rhodians defeat Hannibal in a sea-fight.
Year of the Flood 2809.
Before Christ 190.

IN the mean time news being brought, that a formidable fleet was coming out of Syria under the command of the famous Hannibal, Eudamus, the Rhodian admiral, having reinforced his squadron with seventeen other ships, went out to meet him, in order to prevent his joining Polyxenidas in the port of Ephesus. Eudamus first advanced to the island of Megiste near the coasts of Lycia, with a design to wait for him there ; but, the heat being excessive and the air there very unwholesome, he sailed from thence to the mouth of the Eurymedon, a river of Pamphylia, where he was informed by the inhabitants of Aspendus, that Hannibal's fleet appeared off Sida a maritime city on the borders of Pamphylia. It consisted of thirty seven large ships, among which were three septiremes, four hexaremes, and ten triremes ; whereas the Rhodian fleet consisted only of thirty two quadriremes, and four triremes. When the Syrian fleet discovered the Rhodians advancing to attack them, they made a large front and faced the enemy. Hannibal commanded the right wing, and Apollonius, one of the king's chief favourites, the left. The Rhodians sailed on in a line, with Eudamus at their head, Chariclitus brought up the rear, and Pamphilidas commanded in the center. When they came to draw up in line of battle, Eudamus sailed out, but did not leave room enough for his galleys to be drawn up with the due distances in one line. This inadvertency caused some disorder in his fleet. However, while they were disentangling themselves in the best manner they could, Eudamus with five galleys only attacked Hannibal's wing, and the experience of the Rhodians soon repaired the fault of their admiral, for the ships widened of themselves, so that each had room enough to turn about and ply their oars. Then the onset began, and not one of the Rhodian galleys attacked Antiochus's ships without success. The largest ship in the royal navy was by a very small Rhodian galley sunk in the very beginning of the engagement, which greatly terrified and disheartened the Syrians in the left wing. But Eudamus was hard pressed by Hannibal in the right wing. The Carthaginian had already surrounded the five Rhodian galleys, which the others observing hastened to his relief, and attacked Hannibal on all sides with such vigour, that he was forced to crowd all the sail he could, and save that part of the squadron by flight. The Rhodians after having pursued him some time and taken one of his hexaremes, returned to Rhodes with the glory indeed of having conquered, but reproaching one another for not having utterly destroyed the Syrian fleet. However, they had at least the advantage of blocking him up in the ports of Pamphylia so close, that it was impossible for him to do the king the least service. Chariclitus lay at anchor with twenty ships of war off Patara and the island of Megiste, in order to intercept him in his passage, if he attempted to join Polyxenidas. As for Eudamus he returned with only seven great ships to join the prætor Æmilius at Samos. While the Rhodians kept Hannibal thus blocked up, Æmilius, being joined by another Rhodian squadron, entirely defeated the fleet of Antiochus off the island of Teos. In this engagement the Syrians lost fifty two of their best ships, and the Romans only two. The news of this defeat so dejected Antiochus, that he raised the siege of Colophon, and retired into Cappadocia to his son-in-law Ariarathes. He was soon after totally defeated by land in the famous battle which was fought near Magnesia, and determined that unhappy prince to accept a peace upon such conditions as it pleased the conqueror to impose. On this occasion king Eumenes went in person to Rome to congratulate the republic on the success of her arms in the Levant, and was received by the senate with all possible marks of honour and gratitude for his services, and pressed to declare what recompence would be most agreeable to him. The king for a long time modestly declined saying any thing in his own praise, or asking any particular reward, referring that matter wholly to the determination of the conscript fathers. But they still insisting that he should give an account of his exploits, and declare what Rome could do to shew her gratitude in the most acceptable manner, he at length comply'd ; and having run over his father's services and his own, and answered the objections he foresaw the Rhodians would make as republicans against the encrease of his territories, and in favour of the Asiatic Greeks, whose liberty and independence they would contend for, he thus concluded : “ As to my desires, since I must declare them, “ they are these. You have confined the king of Syria “ within mount Taurus, and if Rome keeps for herself the “ countries which extend from those parts to the sea, I shall “ lay no claim to them ; it will be both a pleasure to me and “ a security to my dominions to have you for my neigh- “ bours. But if you should despise so distant a conquest, “ and think it will not answer the expence of keeping it, “ I will venture to say, that none of your allies have bet- “ ter deserved it than myself.” The senate received his proposal with approbation, and was disposed to grant him his request, but the Rhodian deputies, when they were admitted to audience, pleaded for the liberty of the Greek cities in Asia, as Eumenes had apprehended. “ Your victories, “ said they to the senate, have made you masters of a great “ many Greek colonies on this side mount Taurus, and “ shall they alone not partake of that general regard for “ liberty, which has made you the deliverers of Greece ? “ Subject as many of the other nations to Eumenes as you “ please ; they do not know the value of liberty ; they have “ been so long accustomed to kingly government, that it “ is scarce any burden to them. But the Greeks have the “ same spirit as the Romans ; they love, nay they adore, “ liberty, and expect to receive from you this inestimable “ present, for which they will be eternally indebted to your “ glorious arms. It may indeed be said, that these Greek “ cities declared for Antiochus. And so likewise did many “ of the Greek cities in Europe, which nevertheless you “ restored to their laws and liberties. And this is all we “ ask for the Asiatic Greeks. Cannot you deny Eumenes “ what you denied yourselves ? This, conscript fathers, is “ our only request. Have not the past services of the “ Rhodians deserved your favour for a people, who came “ originally from Greece as well as themselves ? Besides, to “ grant our desires is to give the highest instance possible “ of that true magnanimity, which is peculiar to Roman “ minds. ”

THIS speech made an impression on the minds of the fathers, who at length determined to send ten commissioners into the Levant to settle all disputes there, but declared before-hand, that Lycaonia, the two Phrygias and Mysia should for the future be subject to Eumenes. Lycia, that part of Caria which was next to Rhodes, and part of Pisidia were bestowed on the Rhodians, as a reward for their eminent services during the war. However, in both these dispositions those cities were excepted which enjoyed their liberty before the war. The disposal of Soli raised a dispute between the Rhodians and the ambassadors of king Antiochus. Soli was a city of Cilicia beyond mount Taurus, and had been founded by a Greek colony from Argi. The Rhodians therefore thought it should be declared free as well as the other Greek cities. But the king's ambassadors claiming it in virtue of the treaty concluded with the Romans, the Rhodians acquiesced, and Soli was allotted to king Antiochus<sup>1</sup>.

THE Rhodians, tho' such zealous assertors of liberty, yet oppressed, in a most cruel manner, the Lycians, who had been subjected to them by the Roman senate. The Lycians, not able to bear the oppressions they groaned under, sent deputies to Rome to complain of their new masters and procure some redress for their calamities. When they were introduced to the senate, they addressed the fathers thus : We were formerly subject to the king of Syria, and found his government very mild in comparison of the oppressions we endure under the Rhodians. We now undergo all the hardships of slavery. All kinds of severity are used, not only against particular persons, but against the whole nation. The honour of our wives and daughters is not safe ; our estates are at the mercy of our masters ; our lands are pillaged ; in short, we are treated like slaves bought in the market. The senate, touched with compassion, wrote a letter to the Rhodians, which was carried by the Lycian envoys themselves, to this effect : We never intended to enslave the countries we gave you. None of those people, who were born free, have been reduced to a state of slavery by us. Remember therefore, that the Lycians are allies of the people of Rome, at the same time that they are your subjects. The Rhodians, taking it very much amiss, that their subjects should dare to have recourse to any foreign power, began to treat them with more severity than ever. Whereupon the Lycians, at the instigation of Eumenes, as is supposed, taking up arms, attempted to shake off the yoke. But the Rhodians soon reduced them, and used them in so cruel a manner, that they were obliged to have recourse anew to Rome, where they found many patrons, the Rhodians having disobliged the Romans, by conveying with their fleet Laodice the daughter of Seleucus, whom Perfes had lately married, into Macedon. The senate therefore appointed new commissioners to compose matters between the Lycians and Rhodians, enjoining them to favour the former as much as they could, without wronging the latter. The commissioners were not received at Rhodes with the usual marks of friendship and affection ; but, however, the Rhodians complied with their injunctions, and treated the Lycians thenceforth more like allies than subjects <sup>m</sup>.

The Rhodians suspected by the Romans.

Philip was making, with a design, as he rightly supposed, to kindle a new war in the east, and recover the countries which had been taken from his father by the Romans. The Rhodians taking it for granted, that Eumenes had included their republic in the informations he had given against the king of Macedon, sent to Rome one of their chief men, named Satyrus, to clear them from all suspicion of favouring Perfes. Satyrus was a man of a violent temper, and therefore being, by the help of his friends and patrons, admitted to an audience of the senate together with Eumenes, he broke out into reproaches against him. It is you, said he, who have stirred up Lycia against the Rhodian government. You have done more mischief in Asia than ever Antiochus the Great did. These invectives were agreeable to the Asiatics, who now began to favour Perfes; but the only effect they had at Rome was to render the Rhodians suspected, and increase the affection of the Romans for Eumenes. As the Romans were then on the point of engaging in a war with Perfes, three commissioners were sent to the coasts of Asia, to watch the motions and inclinations of the Rhodians. Rhodes thought herself injured by the Romans in her disputes with the Lycians, and had given some plain proofs of her affection to Perfes. She actually had at this time a fleet of forty sail in her ports, and it was not known for what expedition they were designed. But when the commissioners arrived at Rhodes, they found the inhabitants better disposed than they expected. Hegesiochus, a man entirely addicted to the Romans, was then prytanis (F), or the chief magistrate. He had no sooner discovered, that Rome intended to carry the war into Macedon, but he assembled the people, and addressed himself to them thus: “The Roman forces are “coming once more to exert themselves in the east; what

(F) The chief magistrate in the city of Rhodes was called Prytanis, which name the Rhodians, in all likelihood, borrowed of the Athenians. The latter chose annually by lot five hundred senators to govern their state; that is, fifty in each of the ten tribes, of which their republic consisted, as each tribe had its turn of pre-cedency. The fifty senators in office were called Prytanes, the place where they used to assemble Prytaneon, and the space of time they continued in office Prytaneia. The Prytanis, among the Rhodians, had much the same power and authority as the Prætor in the other states of Greece, but was chosen every six months, at the end of which his authority expired, unless he was, by a plurality of votes, continued in his office; which, as Polybius tells us, sometimes happened, but seldom, the Rhodians being, to a great degree, jealous of their liberties.

 the Rhodians offered themselves ready to serve them, and en-

Roman admiral; but the greatest number of their ships of war they kept in their own harbours, expecting the issue of the first battle between Perfes and the Romans; for though many of the leading men favoured Rome, yet the people was generally inclined to Perfes. Hence no sooner was news brought of the defeat of the consul Licinius in Theffaly, but the Rhodians entered into negotiations with Perfes, and taking upon them to be mediators between the contending powers, sent ambassadors to Rome, commanding, rather than entreating, the senate to put an end to the war. “If Rome, (said they, addressing the senate) “was formerly victorious “in the east, to what did she owe her success but to our “arms and fleets? The victories you gained over Antiochus “were our victories as much as yours. As for Macedon, it “was then at peace with us, and our entering into engage- “ments with Perfes could be therefore no just offence to “you. But we at last broke with this prince, merely out “of complaisance to Rome. We followed your standards to “the prejudice of our ally, contrary to our own inclinations, “and without any provocation from him. Had he done “any thing which could give us just cause to abandon him? “We have indeed been very justly punished for separating “from him. How many misfortunes have we suffered for “the three years that you made war with him? Our navi- “gation is lost, and our island wants necessaries. We can “no longer sail with safety along the coasts of Asia, and “raise our imposts in the tributary cities there. The Rho- “dian republic therefore, fatigued with your hostilities, “which all recoil upon her, thought herself obliged to en- “treat the Macedonian to make peace with Rome. She sent “ambassadors to require it of him; and now she sends others “to the senate to warn them to put an end to the war with “Perfes, which, if you refuse to do, we shall find proper “means to bring the obstinate to reason<sup>p</sup>.”

It is easy to judge in what manner so vain and presumptuous a speech was received. Some historians tell us, that the only answer the senate returned was, to order a decree to be read in their presence, whereby the Lycians and Carrians were declared free. This was touching them to the quick, and mortifying them in the most sensible part. The intrepid chief of the embassy was so struck with this decree, that he fell into a swoon. Others say, the senate answered in few words, that the disposition of the Rhodians, and their secret intrigues with Perfes, had been long known at Rome; that when they should have conquered Perfes, which, they hoped, would be very soon, they should, in their turn, find means to reward or punish the good or ill offices they had received during the war. They had ordered the ambassadors, however, the usual presents; but the proud Rhodians refused to accept them.

THE ambassadors, upon their return to Rhodes, found there deputies from Perfes and Gentius king of Illyricum, sent, by their respective masters, to conclude an alliance with the Rhodians, and engage them to turn their arms against Rome. The advantages which the Macedonian fleet had lately gained over the allies of Rome, inclined the Rhodians to give a favourable reception to the ambassadors of the confederate kings. They made harangues in the senate and before the people, and were heard with attention. In spite of all the opposition they met with from Thetetes, and a few others, who still adhered to the Romans, the Rhodian senate promised not to lend the Romans ships or men and thereby oblige them to finish the war with Macedon, by a peace which should be advantageous to the east. Pursuant to this engagement they recalled the ships which they had sent to the assistance of the Romans, and soon after sent new ambassadors to Rome in favour of Perfes. But they, unfortunately for the republic of Rhodes, arrived at Rome just when the news of the entire defeat of Perfes was published; and the senate maliciously chose that very time to give them audience. But the chief of the embassy turned the haughty demands he was ordered to make in favour of the king of Macedon into congratulations: “ I came hither, conscript fathers, (said he) “ to represent to you how burdensome the war in the Le- “ vant was to you, and how prejudicial to us; but your “ prosperity has prevented my representations, and left no- “ thing for me to do, but to rejoice with you upon your “ great success. ” The senate ordered such an answer to be given, as was suitable to the suspicions they entertained of the Rhodians: “ Neither the interests of Greece, (said they) “ nor your own safety, brought you hither. It was “ your attachment to the Macedonian party that induced you “ to cross the seas, in order to intimidate us. Had your “ concern been only for Greece or yourselves, you would “ have come and implored the assistance of Rome when “ Perfes entered Thessaly, and threatened both the continent “ and your island with a sudden invasion. On the contra- “ ry, you knew that Paulus Æmilius had opened a way “ into Macedon; your fears were for that kingdom, and “ therefore you came to treat of peace. Go, perfidious

 “ care for the interests of Perses is now out of season.”
 This answer so terrified the Rhodians, that they returned home, and exhorted their countrymen to regain the goodwill of the senate by all sorts of submission <sup>9</sup>.

The Rhodians endeavour to appease the wrath of the senate.

AMBASSADORS were accordingly sent to appease the wrath of the senate, who, on their arrival at Rome, were not only refused audience, but even threatened with war. The senate first decreed, that the Rhodian ambassadors should not be treated with the usual hospitality, nor looked upon as friends. Junius the consul was charged to acquaint them with this decree. As soon as the consul appeared, the ambassadors, who were waiting in the curia for an answer, advancing some paces towards him, assured him, that they were come only to congratulate the Romans on their late victory, and efface the suspicions which the fathers might entertain of their republic. But Junius, putting on a grave air, “ We desire “ no congratulations, said he, from a people whose fidelity
 “ we suspect. Go and condole with Perses. We admit “ none within the walls of Rome, or into the senate, but the “ ambassadors of nations which are our friends; and are you
 “ so? Did you even preserve the appearances of friendship
 “ during the war?” The Rhodians were thunder-struck at these words, fell prostrate with tears in their eyes, and entreated the consul to have more regard to the services they had formerly done Rome, than to the ill conduct into which they had been seduced for some years. Then they changed their habits, and running from house to house, in the attire of criminals, endeavoured to raise the compassion of the Roman citizens. But Juventius Thalna, the prætor, moved the tribes to declare war against Rhodes, and to send one of the present magistrates to begin hostilities. This motion being opposed by some of the tribunes, and the contest growing warm, the senate was at last obliged to admit the Rhodian ambassadors to an audience, and gave them leave to speak in their own vindication. Astymedes, who was at the head of the embassy, made a long harangue, wherein he confessed, that vanity was indeed the vice of his countrymen, and that they were very apt to talk arrogantly; but he hoped, that the Romans would not think any instance of this national weakness such a crime as to be punished with the total ruin of their country. He urged the many important services which Rhodes had formerly rendered the republic, and that tho’ of late she had ceased to assist the Romans, yet she had never committed hostilities against them. He concluded with declaring the entire submission of the Rhodians to the good-will and pleasure of Rome, and their resolution to make no resistance to her arms in case of an attack. As soon as Astymedes had done speaking, the ambassadors and their retinue fell prostrate, and held out branches of olive in their hands, as a token of their suing for peace. Then they withdrew, and the matter was discussed in the senate. Such of the senators as had served in the Macedonian war voted warmly against the Rhodians, and were for engaging Rome in a new war. But Cato put an end to the debate by a speech full of spirit and good sense. He reproached the senators with being blinded by prosperity, since nothing else could have made them deliberate, whether they should destroy a republic, against which the only charge was secret thoughts and proud words. “O! ye immortal gods, said he, shall we then usurp your rights? Shall we search into mens thoughts to find enemies? Have we not open and declared enemies enough? I shall readily grant, that the Rhodians were heartily grieved for the defeat and captivity of Perfes; nay, I shall allow, that compassion for him had not so great a share in their affliction as their own interest; but is it then unlawful to wish for liberty? Rome is a powerful state, and capable of swallowing up all the countries of the east. Macedon, the only bulwark against her, was destroyed. The inundation was drawing near, and hence their fears and alarms. Did the Rhodians hate you? No; but they loved themselves. Are there any among us who would not be uneasy to see a formidable neighbour in possession of lands adjoining to ours? What would we not do to get rid of such a neighbourhood? Any means but violence are lawful. This is the present case. The Rhodians wished that Perfes might not be ruined, and that the barrier, which separated them from us, might not be thrown down; and what is there criminal in this? Besides, are bare wishes punishable? But it is also said, that the Rhodians shewed their pride by words; and indeed one of their ambassadors did drop some very arrogant and haughty expressions; but what can be inferred from thence more than this, that there is a nation in the world more haughty and imperious than ourselves? Is an indiscreet expression so highly criminal, that it ought to be expiated with rivers of blood? What will the consequence of an unjust severity be but insurrections among the timorous nations, and revolts, or at least distrusts, among our allies? Foreign nations will fear us more, but love us less. The Rhodians, after all, have not carried their ingratitude to excess. Per-

Lycia and Caria taken from the Rho-dians.

THE advice and representations of Cato were of such weight with the senate, that war was not declared against the Rhodians, which was the main point. The senate only renewed the decree they had formerly made, whereby the Rhodians were ordered to withdraw their garisons from Lycia and Caria, and restore the inhabitants to their antient liberty. After the publication of this decree, Philocrates, one of the embassadors, returned to Rhodes ; but Astimesdes continued at Rome, to give his republic notice of what was transacted there. The news which Philocrates brought to Rhodes, where they were all in the utmost consternation and under great apprehensions of a war with Rome, was received with inexpressible joy ; insomuch, that the loss of Lycia and Caria seemed to them but a slight punishment. They now made it their whole business to regain the affection of the Romans. The alliance which they had formerly entered into with Rome, was not yet complete. They had reserved to themselves a liberty to make alliances with any king or independent state they pleased, whether in Europe or Asia ; but now the times were changed. Since the conquest of Macedon, there was no power in all the east to be feared or courted, except the Romans ; the Rhodians therefore were desirous to enter into a more strict alliance with Rome, and, in order to gain the affection of the Roman citizens, they commanded a crown of gold to be made at Rhodes of great value (G), which Theodotus, their admiral, was ordered to carry to Rome, and there negotiate this new

(G) Livy (84) fixes the value of this rich crown at twenty thousand of those pieces of gold, which the Romans called aurei ; but Polybius values it only at ten thousand. The aureus among the Romans was worth twenty five Attic drachmæ, or twenty-five denarii, according to Dio Cassius (85). It weighed two drams and an half. Supposing therefore, that, in these ages of the republic, the proportion of gold to silver was as ten to one, which we have reason to infer from several passages, this piece of gold could not be worth less than twenty-five drams.

alliance (H). Nevertheless, as the Rhodians were vain-glorious, they enjoined Theodotus not to offer his petition in writing, lest, in case his request was not granted, it might be conveyed down to posterity, and be a standing monument of reproach to them. The admiral set sail, came to Rome, and made his presents, which were accepted; but as for the alliance, Rome made his republic solicit it a long time, taking pleasure in humbling the Rhodian pride. They were ordered first to evacuate Caria and Lycia, and also to withdraw their garisons from the two cities of Caunus and Stratonice, the first of which they had purchased of one of Ptolemy's generals with two hundred talents, and the second had been given them by Antiochus and Seleucus. However, they not only readily gave up both places, but moreover either put to death, or banished, all those, who, during the course of the war, had favoured Perses; whereupon the senate complied at last with their request, and admitted them into an alliance with Rome.<sup>c</sup>

SOME years after, the Rhodians gave a signal instance of the great deference they paid to Rome. Calynda, a famous city of Caria being besieged by the inhabitants of Caunus, sent ambassadors to the Rhodians, imploring their assistance, and offering to surrender to them. Notwithstanding this advantageous offer, the Rhodians deliberated some time, whether they should relieve the Calyndians or no, without the consent of the Roman senate; but as the siege was pursued with vigour, and an answer from Rome would come too late, they at last sent succours to the besieged city, and forced the Caunians to retire. However, before they took possession of the place, they sent two of their chief citizens, Lydamis and Cleagoras, to Rome, to lay their laurels at the feet of the conscript fathers, and to draw what advantages they could from their submission. Indeed, nothing could be more agreeable to the haughty senators, than to see those Rhodians, who a few years before, pretended to give law to Rome, now reduced so low, as not to dare to take possession of a city without their leave. The deputies were graciously received, and their re-

(H) The negotiating of this new alliance with Rome was, according to Polybius, committed to the care of another ambassador, whom he calls Rhadopho but a little lower he gives him the name of Theetetes. He was eighty years of age, and died at Rome, before he could put the last hand to the negotiation.

ception encouraged them to desire of the fathers, that the private subjects of Rhodes might be restored to the enjoyment of all the lands they had formerly possessed in Caria and Lycia. Their request was granted, and the ambassadors returned as well satisfied with the senate, as the senate was with them. The Rhodians, out of gratitude, desired leave to erect, in the temple of Minerva at Rome, a statue of that goddess, thirty cubits high. Thus, all jealousies between the two republics were removed, and the good understanding, which had long subsisted between them entirely restored.

FROM this time, to the breaking out of the Mithridatic war in Asia, the Rhodians performed nothing, which historians have thought worth transmitting to posterity. They enjoyed their liberties, while all the other states and colonies of Greece were brought under the Roman yoke, and became provinces of that republic. They continued to maintain an inviolable attachment to Rome, and gave a signal instance of their fidelity in the above-mentioned war; for the Rhodians and the little country of Lydia, near mount Sipylus, were the only allies who remained faithful to the Romans on all the coasts of Asia, after Mithridates had proclaimed war with the republic; Rhodes especially served as a sanctuary for all the Romans, whom the Asiatics drove in great numbers out of their countries: and Cassius himself, formerly governor of the province of Pergamus, fled thither for refuge. The King of Pontus therefore resolved to turn all his forces by sea and land against that island; and the inhabitants chose rather to sustain a siege than renounce their alliance with Rome.

They put their ports in a state of defence, and covered their ramparts with all sorts of military machines. The Romans, who had fled thither, made up the best part of the Rhodian army, and the inhabitants, relying upon them and their own skill in maritime affairs, were not at all dismayed at the vast fleets and land-forces, which Mithridates was bringing against them. They posted their fleet before their island, and divided it into three squadrons; one, drawn up in a line, covered the entrance of the port, and the other two were placed, like wings, to hinder the enemy's approach. Mithridates appeared on board a quinquereinis, at the head of a fleet much more numerous than that of the enemy. He divided it into three squadrons, ordering two of them to invest the wings of the Rhodians, whilst he himself attacked the squadron that faced the port. The Rhodians therefore, lest they should be overpowered with numbers, retired by degrees, till they came to the mouth of the harbour, which they entirely stopped up ; and after this, the several engagements that followed, turned to their advantage. Mithridates lost many ships, and narrowly escaped himself being made prisoner in his quinqueremis, which was taken.

DURING these sea-engagements, Mithridates embarked his numerous army on transports, which being dispersed by a violent storm, and driven to the right and left of the island, the Rhodians sent out their fleet, fell on the vessels, which the storm had put in disorder, sunk some, burnt others, and took four hundred men prisoners. Upon this Mithridates resolved to attack the city by sea in the night, and ordered a sambuca, built on two galleys, to advance to the walls. He had been informed, that the wall of the city was but of a moderate height on the side of the temple of Jupiter Atabyrius, and resolved to storm it there. To this end he embarked his troops silently, furnished them with scaling ladders, and ordered them to wait till a signal was given them, by a person hired for that purpose, from the top of the temple. In the mean time the king himself made a false attack on the side of the port, with great shouts, which caused the besieged to kindle many fires in the city. Those who were to wait for the signal before they began the attack on the side of the temple, mistaking these fires for it, were too hasty in the attempt, and miscarried. Early in the morning the Rhodians made a vigorous sally, and drove off the aggressors. The sambuca, after having done some damage, sunk with its own weight ; and Mithridates, disheartened at these disappointments, broke up the siege, after having lost a great many men and the best part of his navy<sup>u</sup>. The behaviour of the Rhodians on this occasion was highly applauded at Rome, and orders were sent to Sylla to return them thanks in the name of the senate, and renew the antient alliance between the two republics. In the war which Pompey made upon the Cilician pirates, the Rhodians assisted him with all their naval forces, and had a great share in all the victories which he gained, though that proud Roman assumed the whole glory of suppressing those robbers to himself<sup>w</sup>.

IN the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey, they assisted the latter with a numerous fleet, under the command of one Euphranor, who distinguished himself above all the commanders of Pompey's navy, and gained very considerable advantages over Cæsar's fleets*. After the death of Pompey, they sided with Cæsar, which drew upon them the resentment of C. Cassius who advanced to the island of Rhodes with a powerful fleet, after having reduced the greatest part of the continent. The Rhodians, terrified at his approach, sent ambassadors, entreating him to make up matters in an amicable manner, and promising to stand neuter, and recal the ships which they had sent to the assistance of the triumviri. Cassius insisted upon their delivering up their fleet to him, and putting him in possession both of their harbour and city. This demand the Rhodians would, by no means, comply with, and therefore began to put themselves in a condition to stand a siege; but first sent Archelaus, who had taught Cassius the Greek tongue, while he studied at Rhodes, to intercede with his disciple in their behalf. Archelaus could not, with all his authority, prevail upon him to moderate his demands; wherefore the Rhodians, having created one Alexander, a bold and enterprising man, their prætor or prytanis, equipped a fleet of three and thirty sail, and sent it out under the command of Mnaseus, an experienced sea-officer, to offer Cassius battle. Both fleets fought with incredible bravery, and the victory was long doubtful; but the Rhodians being at length overpowered with numbers, were forced to return with their fleet to Rhodes, two of their ships being sunk, and the rest very much damaged by the heavy ships of the Romans. This was the first time, as our author observes, that the Rhodians were fairly overcome in a sea-fight†.

Rhodes taken by Cassius, and plundered.

Cassius, who had beheld this fight from a neighbouring hill, having refitted his fleet, which had been no less damaged than that of the Rhodians, repaired to Loryma, a strong hold on the continent belonging to the Rhodians. This castle he took by assault, and from hence conveyed his land-forces, under the conduct of Fanius and Lentulus, over into the island. His fleet consisted of fourscore ships of war and above two hundred transports. The Rhodians no sooner saw this mighty fleet appear, but they went out again to meet the enemy. This second engagement was far more bloody than the first; many ships were sunk, and great numbers of men killed on both sides. But victory anew declared for the Romans, who immediately blocked up the city of Rhodes both by sea and land. As the Rhodians had not had time to furnish the city with sufficient store of provisions, some of the inhabitants fearing, that if it were taken either by assault or by famine, Cassius would put all the inhabitants to the sword, as Brutus had lately done at Xanthus, privately opened the gates to him, and put him in possession of the town, which he nevertheless treated as if it had been taken by assault. He commanded fifty of the chief citizens, who were suspected to favour the adverse party, to be brought before him, and sentenced them all to die; others to the number of twenty-five, who had commanded the fleet or army, because they did not appear when summoned, he proscribed. Having thus punished such as had either acted or spoke against him or his party, he commanded the Rhodians to deliver up to him all their ships, and whatever money they had in the public treasure. He then plundered the temples, stripping them of all their valuable furniture, vessels, and statues. He is said not to have left one statue in the whole city, except that of the sun, bragging, at his departure, that he had stript the Rhodians of all they had, leaving them nothing but the sun. As to private persons, he commanded them, under severe penalties, to bring to him all the gold and silver they had, promising, by a public cryer a tenth part to such as should discover any hidden treasures. The Rhodians at first concealed some part of their wealth, imagining, that Cassius intended by this proclamation only to terrify them; but when they found that it was in earnest, and saw several wealthy citizens put to death for concealing only a small portion of their riches, they desired, that the time prefixed for the bringing in of their gold and silver might be prolonged. Cassius willingly granted them their request, and then, through fear, they dug up what they had hid under ground, and laid at his feet all they were worth in the world. By this means he extorted from private persons above eight thousand talents. He then fined the city in five hundred more, and leaving L. Varus there with a strong garison to exact the fine without any abatement, he returned to the continent<sup>2</sup>.

AFTER the death of Cassius, Marc Anthony restored the Rhodians to their antient rights and privileges, bestowing upon them the islands of Andros, Naxos, Tenos, and the city of Myndus. But these the Rhodians so oppressed and loaded with taxes, that the same Anthony, tho' a great friend to the Rhodian republic, was obliged to divest her of the sovereignty over those places, which he had a little before so liberally bestowed upon her<sup>2</sup>. From this time, to the reign of the emperor Claudius, we find no mention made of the Rhodians. That prince, as Dion informs us<sup>b</sup>, deprived them of their liberty, for having crucified some Roman citizens. However, he soon restored them to their former condition, as we read in Suetonius <sup>c</sup>, and Tacitus <sup>d</sup>. The latter adds, that they had been as often deprived of, as restored to, their liberty, by way of punishment, or reward for their different behaviour, as they had obliged the Romans with their assistance in foreign wars, or provoked them with their seditions at home. Pliny, who wrote in the beginning of Vespasian's reign, styles Rhodes a beautiful and free town. But this liberty they did not long enjoy, the island being soon after reduced by the same Vespasian to a Roman province, and obliged to pay a yearly tribute to their new masters <sup>e</sup>. This province was called the province of the islands. The Roman prætor who governed it, resided at Rhodes, as the chief city under his jurisdiction ; and Rome, notwithstanding the eminent services rendered her by this republic, thenceforth treated the Rhodians not as allies, but vassals.

The History of CRETE.

Names.

THE island of Crete, now called Candia from its capital, was known to the antients by the names of Aeria, Chthonia, Idæa, Curete, Macaris, &c. It is one of the largest islands in the Mediterranean, being, according to Strabo <sup>f</sup>, 287 miles in length ; according to Pliny <sup>g</sup>, 270, and according to Scylax, 312. As to its breadth, it is not, as Pliny observes <sup>h</sup>, above 55, where widest. Whence it was stiled, as Stephanus informs us the Long Island. It lies between the Archipelago to the north ; the African sea to the south ; the Carpathian to the east ; and the Ionian to the west. The name of Crete, which generally prevailed among the antients, some derive from Curetes, who are said to have been the first inhabitants of the island ; others from the nymph Crete daughter of Hesperus, or from Cretus the son of Jupiter, who is supposed to have reigned here (I).

(I) Eusebius, St. Hierom, Marcianus, Isidorus, and Clement derive the name of Crete from Cres, one of the Curetes, who brought up Jupiter.

This island, as lying between the 34th and 35th degrees of Climate, north latitude, was, in antient times, greatly celebrated for soil, &c. its fertility. It abounded in all sorts of grain, its plains being covered with a deep rich soil, and plentifully watered by small rivers. The fruits it produced infinitely surpassed, as Pliny observed, all of the same kind that were produced in other countries<sup>1</sup>. The wines of this island are greatly commended both by the antient and modern writers. Tho' they are, generally speaking, pretty strong, yet Galen met with a sort in this place, which was temperate enough to be given in fevers<sup>k</sup>. The air was antiently deemed most pure and wholesome, and is to this day, tho' great part of the country lies uncultivated; a misfortune too common in such regions as groan under the Mohammedan yoke. From the fruitfulness of its soil, and purity of its air, it had the appellation of Macaris, or the fortunate island.

In former times there were reckoned in this island an hundred cities, ninety before the Trojan war, and ten more after the Dorians settled here; and hence sprung the name of Hecatompolis. Of these hundred cities forty only were remaining in the time of Ptolemy, for so many he enumerates. Those of most note were, Gnossus, antiently called Ceratus, Gnossus. where king Minos is said to have fixed his residence. This city was once the capital of the island, and, according to Strabo<sup>l</sup>, a wealthy and populous place, being thirty furlongs in compass, and full of inhabitants. The said writer places it

Jupiter. Diodorus Siculus says it was called Crete from Crete the daughter of one of the Curetes, whom Jupiter married, giving her name to the island, which before was named Idæa (86). It is at present known by the name of Candia, which Morosini (87) derives from the Latin word Candidus, signifying white, such being the colour of its soil. Others derive the name of Candia from the word Chandax, which, in the language of the Saracens, signifies, as Scylitzas informs us (88), an intrenchment. The Saracens built a town, as we read in the same author in the place, where, by the advice of a Greek monk, they had intrenched themselves in the time of the emperor Michael surnamed the Stammerer. The town they called Chandax, that is, intrenchment. In process of time the name of Chandax was changed into that of Candia, which became common to the city and island.

twenty furlongs off the Ægean, or Archipelago, and ninety from the African sea. Some of our modern travellers think it stood near the present town of Castel Pediada; while others pretend to discover some of its ruins at a small distance from the village of Cynofa. From this city Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, so much celebrated by the poets, had the name of Gnossis. The river Ceratus washed its walls; whence it is by some antient writers called by the same name. Cydonia stood, according to Strabo<sup>m</sup>, Pliny<sup>n</sup>, and Diodorus Siculus<sup>o</sup>, on the coast opposite to the Lacedemonian territories in Peloponnesus, and was the most powerful and wealthy city of all Crete, since, in the civil wars of that island, it withstood the united forces of Gnossus and Gortyna, after they had reduced the greater part of the island. Cydonia was deemed the strongest place in the whole island. It had been often besieged, but never taken till the time of Metellus, to whom that glory was reserved, Cydonia opening its gates to him after the defeat of Lasthenes and Panares<sup>p</sup>. This city was the most antient in the whole Island, most of the others having been built and peopled by Cydonian colonies; and on this account it was commonly called by the Greeks, the mother of cities. From Cydonia the quince tree was first brought into Italy, and thence the fruit called by the Latins, malum Cydonium, or the Cydonian apple. Gortyna or Gortyn, an inland city, being, according to Strabo<sup>q</sup>, near ninety furlongs distant from the African sea. The origin of Gortyna is as obscure as that of most of the antient cities, some telling us that it was founded by Gortyn the son of Radamanthus, and others ascribing that glory to Taurus, who carried off Europa<sup>r</sup>. Be that as it will, Gortyna in process of time, eclipsed all the other cities of Crete, especially after the island was reduced by the Romans, who made it their chief business to humble Gnossus, and raise, as it were upon her ruins, her rival Gortyna<sup>s</sup>. We may judge of the antient splendor and greatness of this city from its ruins, which are still to be seen about six miles from mount Ida, at the entrance of the plain of Messaria, which is properly the granary of the island. Among these ruins Tournefort<sup>t</sup> observed one of the gates, which is an arch finely turned, still remaining, with part of the wall joining to it, which he takes to be the wall that Ptolemy Philopater is said by Strabo<sup>u</sup> to have built. Not far from the gate are two pillars of granate eighteen foot long, and near them divers pedestals ranged two by two, on the same line, for supporting the columns of the frontispiece of some temple. Among the many columns still remaining, there are some of granate, fluted spirally, and wonderfully beautiful. Many of them have been carried away by the Turks. Our author observed at a village, not far distant from these ruins, two columns of an extraordinary beauty, with a hurdle between them, serving as a gate to a garden. The inhabitants are unacquainted with the value of these remains of antiquity. Few statues are to be met with, the Venetians, who were long masters of the island, having transported the best part of them to Venice. The statue, which stands on the fountain of Candia, and is deemed a master-piece, was found among these ruins; but is at present without a head, the Turks having a superstitious abhorrence to the representation of the heads of living creatures, except upon coins, of which no people are more fond. Gortyna was in antient times famous for the temples of Apollo, Diana, and Jupiter Hecatombæus, so called, if we believe Ptolemæus Hephæstion as quoted by Phocius <sup>w</sup>, because Menelaus there sacrificed to Jupiter an hundred oxen, when news was brought him of Helena's flight. At the further end of the ruins between the north and west, near a brook, without all doubt the river Lethe, which, as Strabo informs us, washed the walls of Gortyna <sup>x</sup>, are to be seen some curious ruins with a piece of painting half effaced, but quite of the Gothic taste. These ruins are the remains of some antient church, which the modern Greeks would make us believe to have been built by Titus, to whom St. Paul wrote one of his epistles, and who was the first bishop of Crete. Theophrastus <sup>y</sup>, Varro <sup>z</sup>, and Pliny <sup>a</sup> speak of a plane-tree near Gortyna which never shed its old leaves till new ones sprouted forth. This seemed so strange to the antient Greeks, that they feigned the first conversation between Jupiter and Europa to have happened under this ever-green plane-tree; and this fabulous adventure probably gave occasion to the inhabitants of Gortyna to represent on a medal Europa sitting melancholy and thoughtful on a plane-tree, and turning her back to an eagle hovering about her. On the reverse is Europa, sitting on a bull, encompassed with a border of bay-leaves <sup>b</sup>. Pliny <sup>c</sup> tells us, that endeavours were used to multiply in the island this species of plane-tree, but to no effect, since they shed their leaves, when transplanted, in winter like the common plane-trees. Lychus was in antient times a city of no small note, and originally a colony of the Lacedemonians, as Polybius informs us <sup>d</sup>. It was an inland town, and is supposed to have stood where we now find Paleo Castro. Some place it near the present town of Agustini, and others pretend to discover some of its ruins near Girapietra. Hierapytna, called also Cyrrha, Pytna, and Camynos, is supposed to be the same place that Ptolemy calls Hiera Petra, or the sacred rock. Strabo tells us, that it stood on a hill, which he calls Pytna, and supposes to have been a part of mount Ida. The ruins of this city are still to be seen on the coast over-against the rocks called by the antients the Isles of Assas <sup>e</sup>. Hierapytna was one of the strongest places in the island, when Metellus undertook the conquest of Crete, but is at present only a village, known by the name of Girapietra. Eleuthera, called also Saorus and Aorus, was an inland city, and in the Roman times a place well peopled and of great strength. Rithymna, Heraclea, Præsos, Apteron, and Arcadia were in antient times cities of no small note. Rithymna, now Retimo, is still a place well peopled, and had formerly a very convenient haven, which is now utterly neglected. Heraclea stood, according to Pliny <sup>f</sup>, opposite to the island of Via, or, as others will have it, Dia. It was the sea-port of the Gnossians, and is supposed to have stood on the same spot where the town of Candia, which gave name to the whole island, was built in after ages. Præsos was the capital of the Eteocrates, mentioned by Homer, and famous for a temple consecrated to Jupiter Dictæus. In the civil wars of the island it was razed by the inhabitants of Hierapytna. Apteron was in Ptolemy's time a very considerable place, and stood on a steep rock, at the foot of which, between the town and the sea, lay that famous field, where the Syrens, being overcome by the Muses in a trial of skill in music, forfeited their wings. From this fable some writers tell us <sup>g</sup>, that the city took its name, the word Apteron signifying without wings. Eusebius says it was so called from one Apteras king of Crete, whom he supposes to have been the founder of it <sup>h</sup>. There are some ruins of this antient city still to be seen, but nothing that deserves particular notice. Arcadia is mentioned by Ptolemy, Theophrastus, Seneca, Pliny, &c. They all tell us, that this town being once destroyed, all the springs in that neighbourhood dried up, and began again to run as soon as the city was rebuilt. These were the most considerable cities of Crete in antient times.

THE chief mountains of Crete are, Ida, so much spoke of Moun- by the poets, and by many degrees the highest of the whole tains. island. From the top of this mountain both seas are clearly discern'd; in all other respects it is inferior to the other hills of the country, being for the greatest part of the year covered with snow, and so barren, that it produces nothing except the Tragacantha, a shrub so prickly, that the Greeks gave it the name of Goats Thorn. Theophrastus<sup>i</sup> and Pliny<sup>k</sup> speak of a sort of vine growing here naturally; but our modern travellers have not been able to discover any such thing. Theophrastus advances many things upon the report of others, and Pliny frequently copies, or rather translates, what he finds in Theophrastus, without troubling himself with any further enquiries. It was called Ida from the fine prospect it affords, the word Idein, signifying in the Greek tongue to see<sup>l</sup>. Nay, Suidas tells us, that all places, whence a great extent of country could be seen, were called Idæ. Jupiter is said to have been secretly nursed here, and thence called Idæus. Some of the antients tell us, that the forests on this mountain being burnt by lightning, about seventy three years after the deluge of Deucalion, the art of melting iron was first discovered on that occasion by the Dætyli<sup>m</sup>. Ida is now known by the name of Psiloriti. Diète, now called Sethia, and also Lasthi, is next in height to mount Ida, and covered great part of the year with snow, whence it is called by Strabo, Pliny, and Ptolemy, the white mountain. However, cypress trees, as the same writers assure us, grew there antiently amidst the snow, and throve as well as in the vallies. This mountain was called Diète from Diëtynna, a nymph of Crete, who is supposed to have first found out hunting-nets, and to have had the name of Diëtynna from thence, having been called before Britomartis. Leuci, a long chain of mountains, so called from their whiteness, being like the others covered great part of the year with snow. They are now known by the names of Madura and Spacia.

RIVERS of note in this island are but very few; the Nilopotamus, the Scafirus, and the Epiciidus are spoke of by the antients, but none of them are at present navigable. This defect is sufficiently supplied by a great many creeks and bays, and some capacious and safe harbours. Near mount Ida the present inhabitants pretend to shew some remains of the antient labyrinth made by Dædalus; but Bellonius takes this labyrinth to be nothing but an antient quarry, out of which were dug the stones that served to build the towns of Gortyna and Gnossus. And indeed Pliny tells us, that in his time no footsteps of the antient labyrinth were to be seen in the island.

Idæi Daëtyli.

THE first inhabitants of Crete, according to Diodorus Siculus, were the Idæi Daëtyli who inhabited mount Ida: they were, as some authors write, a hundred in number; according to others only ten, being called Daëtyli, as they suppose, from the ten fingers, to which they were equal in number. The Idæi Daëtyli were, if we believe Ephorus as quoted by Diodorus, originally from mount Ida in Phrygia, and passed from thence over into Europe with king Minos. They settled first in Samothrace, where they taught the inhabitants sacred and religious rites, instituted sacrifices, and introduced a set form of religious worship. Orpheus, who was naturally inclined to music and poetry, is thought to have been their disciple, and the first who carried sacred rites and ceremonies over into Greece. The Daëtyli are likewise said to have first found out the use of fire, and to have discovered the nature of iron and brass to the inhabitants of the country adjoining to mount Berecynthus, and to have taught them the way of working them. For this and many other useful discoveries they were after their death worshipped as gods. One of them, they say, was called Hercules, who instituted the Olympic games, which were by posterity thought to have been appointed by Hercules the son of Alcmena.

Curetes.

NEXT to the Idæi Daëtyli were the nine Curetes, some of them supposed to have sprung from the earth, and others to be descended from the Idæi Daëtyli: These dwelt on the mountains, under the shade of thick trees, and in caves and other places, which naturally afforded them a shelter and covering, the building of houses not being then found out. They were very ingenious, and invented many things that proved very useful to mankind: they first taught how to manage flocks, to gather honey, to tame horses, to hunt, to cast darts, &c. They brought men into societies and communities, and shewed them by their example the happiness of a peaceable and orderly life. They are likewise said to have invented swords and helmets, and dancing in armour, and by the noise they made to have prevented Saturn from hearing hearing the cries of Jupiter when he was an infant, and by that means to have saved him from being destroy'd by his father.

THE Titans were contemporary with the Curetes, and dwelt in the country where the city of Gnossus was built many ages after. The Titans were in number six men and five women, the offspring, as some say, of Uranus and Terra; according to others, of one of the Curetes and Titæa, being called Titans after the name of their mother. The sons were Cronus or Saturn, Hyperion, Cæus, Iapetus, Crius, and Oceanus; the daughters Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phæbe, and Thetis. Each of these invented something of great use to mankind, and were on that account placed among the gods. Saturn the eldest obtained the kingdom of Crete, and brought his subjects from a wild and barbarous to a more polite course of life, persuading them to live according to the strictest rules of honesty, which gave occasion to the many fables of the poets concerning the golden age. Hyperion was the first who found out the motions of the sun and moon and other stars, measuring by them the seasons of the year; and hence he was called the father of the planets. Latona was the daughter of Cæus and Phæbe; and Prometheus, so famous among the poets, the son of Iapetus: he is said to have found out the way of striking fire out of flint, which gave occasion to the poets to feign that he stole fire from the gods, and bestowed it upon men. Mnemosyne invented many things conducing to the help of man's memory, whence she had her name, Mnemosyne signifying in Greek memory. Themis taught the art of divination, instructed men in holy rites, and prescribed laws for the worship of the gods, and for the preservation of peace and good government amongst men. Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto are supposed to have been the children of Saturn and Rhea. Vesta invented the building of houses, Ceres the use of corn, Neptune the art of navigation, and Pluto funeral solemnities. Hence the latter was stiled king of the infernal shades, and the former prince of the sea <sup>a</sup>.

THE Curetes, mentioned here by Diodorus, were, according to Herodotus <sup>o</sup> and Strabo <sup>p</sup>, originally Phœnicians, and accompanied Cadmus out of Phœnicia, some of them settling in Phrygia, where they were called Corybantes, some in Crete, where they were known by the name of Idæi

Daëtyli, some in Rhodes, where they bore the name of Telchines, &c. Clemens Alexandrinus calls the Idæi Daëtyli barbarians, that is strangers, and tells us, that they were the first who brought letters into Greece, Phrygia, and Crete; and adds, that by their assistance king Minos built a fleet, and gained the sovereignty of the sea <sup>9</sup>. According to these authors the Curetes and Idæi Daëtyli were one and the same people, and did not settle in Crete till the time of Minos. Bochart brings the Curetes from Palestine, induced thereunto by the likeness there is between their name and that of the Crethim or Cerethites, a people among the Philistines <sup>1</sup>. The Philistines indeed conquered Sidon, and it is not unlikely, that some of them, mixed with the Phœnicians, attended Cadmus into Crete and Greece. But long before they settled in Crete, a colony of Pelasgians had peopled the eastern coast of the island. After the Pelasgians, Teutamus, the grandfather of Minos, carried thither a colony of Dorians from Laconia and the territory of Olympia in Peloponnesus. These several colonies spoke different languages, and lived quietly in caves and huts on the spontaneous product of the earth, till the invention of tools in the reign of Asterius the son of Teutamus. They were at last reduced into one kingdom, and became one people in the reign of Minos, who was their first law-giver, built many towns, and introduced plowing and sowing. According to this account, which is vouched by Strabo, Lucian and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, the two first kings of Crete, who reigned after the coming of the Curetes, were Asterius and Minos: Europa was wife to Asterius and mother of Minos, and the Idæi Daëtyli came with her and her brother Alymnus into Crete, where they dwelt in the Idæan cave, and there educated Jupiter; so that Asterius, Europa, and Minos must be the Saturn, Rhea, and Jupiter of the Cretans. Minos is usually called the son of Jupiter; but the Phœnicians, as Sir Isaac Newton observes <sup>2</sup>, upon their first coming into Greece, gave the name of Japater or Jupiter to all kings; and thus both Minos and his father Asterius were Jupiters, that is, kings. Minos, according to Echemenes as quoted by Athenæus <sup>3</sup>, was the Jupiter who became so famous among the Greeks for justice and equity, being the greatest king of Greece in those days, and the only legislator. Plutarch tells us <sup>4</sup>, that the inhabitants of Naxos pretended, that there were two Minoses and two Ariadnes, and that the first Ariadne married Bacchus, and the last was carried away by Theseus. But Homer, Hesiod, Thucydides, Herodotus, and Strabo knew but of one Minos, whom Homer calls the son of Jupiter and Europa, the brother of Rhadamanthus and Sarpedon, the father of Deucalion the Argonaut, and grandfather of Idomeneus, who went to the siege of Troy. Herodotus <sup>w</sup> makes Minos and Rhadamanthus the sons of Europa, and contemporary with Ægeus. Apollodorus <sup>x</sup> and Hyginus <sup>y</sup> tell us, that Minos, the father of Androgeus, Ariadne, and Phædra, was the son of Jupiter and Europa, and brother to Rhadamanthus and Sarpedon.

In the reign of Minos, Rhadamanthus the king's brother carried several colonies into the neighbouring islands, which he bestowed upon the commanders of his army : The island of Lemnos he gave to one Thoas or Theias, who, as he was a disciple of the Idæi Daëtyli, and consequently a worker in metals, is supposed, by Apollodorus, Suidas, and Apollonius Rhodius, to be the Vulcan of the Greeks. The islands of Carpathus, Syme, and most of the Cyclades were peopled by colonies from Crete, Rhadamanthus having rewarded the services of his officers, as Diodorus informs us <sup>z</sup>, by vesting them with the sovereignty of the neighbouring islands, which gave rise to innumerable petty kingdoms. The Cretans did not only people the neighbouring islands, but sent colonies into Greece, Italy, Sicily, Troas, &c. The cities of Delphos in Phocis, Miletus in Ionia, and many in Iapygia having been founded by them. The Trojans, if we believe the most antient writers, were originally Cretans ; as were also the Messapii in Italy, and the inhabitants of some of the islands of Arabia, &c.

As to the government of the Cretans, it is agreed on all hands that it was at first monarchical ; but there is a great disagreement among authors about the beginning of the Cretan kingdom. Diodorus Siculus supposes Tectamus to have been the first who reigned in that island. But Eusebius speaks of one Cretes, who gave his name to the island, and reigned, according to him, four hundred years before Tectamus. From Cretes to Cydon he reckons three hundred years, from Cydon to Apteras sixty three, and from Apteras to Lapithas forty. This opinion, which is also followed by Clemens Alexandrinus and most of the antient chronologers, is agreeable to what we read in Pausanias who mentions several king<sup>s</sup> reigning before Tectamus, and among the rest Cretes, Vulcan, and Rhadamanthus. Laëtantius and Berosus add to these Milinus and Melisseus, whom they suppose to have reigned before the arrival of the Pelasgians or Dorians. (K) As we have followed chiefly Eusebius and Laëtantius in this series, we shall insert here a succinct account of the Cretan kings, according to the order we find them placed in by other writers. The first who reigned in Crete, according to Diodorus Siculus, was Jupiter, the first of that name. He married one Idea, who imparted her name to the whole island, and had by her a son named Cres, who was one of the Curetes, and succeeded his father in the kingdom (89). The Curetes were, according to Euripides (90), all sons of this Jupiter, whence they are stiled by him Diogenitores, or the children of Jupiter. Cres, who reigned after his father Jupiter, was according to Eusebius contemporary with Abraham and his son Isaac (91). From him, if we believe Isidorus (92), the island was called Crete. Cres was succeeded by Ammon, who had married his daughter Crete. Ammon first reigned in Lybia, where he married Rhea, the daughter of Cælus and sister of Saturn. Rhea, falling out with her husband, abandoned him, and married her brother Saturn, who, with the other Titans his brothers, made war upon Ammon, but were by him overthrown in battle. Afterwards Ammon leaving Libya, where he was greatly straitened for want of corn, passed over into Crete, and there married the daughter of Cres, and in right of his wife, after the death of his father-in-law, took possession of the island, changing the name of Idea

IT were in vain to expect an exact chronology of this kingdom, considering the uncertainty of its beginning; and of

into that of Crete, which was the name of his wife. The Titans pursued him into Crete, and there, tho' formerly conquered, renewed the war. But in the mean time Bacchus, returning victorious from India, joined Ammon, and with the assistance of some Egyptian forces utterly defeated and entirely abolished the race of the Titans (93). Melisseus, according to Hyginus, succeeded Ammon. Jupiter, surnamed the great, was born in his reign, and brought up by his two daughters Amalthea and Melissa, who nourished him with goats milk and honey. Upon the death of Ammon and Bacchus, Jupiter made himself master of the island of Crete, and by degrees extended his dominions to the confines of the world. Cydon reigned many years after; the names of the intermediate kings, who according to Diodorus were many, have not reached us. Cydon, as Atbenæus informs us, had a daughter, by name Eulimine, famous for her beauty, and courted by all the chief men of the island; but her father was commanded by the oracle to sacrifice her to the manes of the deceased heroes of the island, which he did accordingly. Pausanias (94) and Stephanus make mention of another king bearing this name, who was the son of Mercury and Acacallis, and reigned many years after. Cydon was succeeded by Apterus or Apteras, to whom Eulimene had been betrothed. Eusebius says, that he began his reign in the eighth year of Moses, and sixty years after Cydon had begun his Lapes, called by Eusebius Lapithas, began to reign, according to that writer, about the ninth year of Joshua. He was succeeded, as Diodorus tells us, by Teutamus the son of Dorus, who arriving in Crete with a colony of Æolians and Pelasgians settled there, and was for his eminent qualities raised to the throne (95). Asterius, the son of Lapes, came to the throne, vacant by the death of his father. He married Europa the daughter of Agenor, whom Jupiter had carried over from Sarepta, a city of Phœnice, into Crete. Asterius, having no children by her, adopted the three sons of Jupiter, viz. Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon. Minos succeeded him in the kingdom, and had by his wife Iphone, the daughter of Lycæus, a son called Lycastes who, upon the death of his father, was raised to the throne. Lycastes built the city of Lycastos, and dying left the kingdom to Minos, the second of that name, whom he had by Ida, the daughter of Corybas. Minos, being assumed to the throne, equipped a mighty fleet, and made himself master of the Cyclades, which he bestowed upon his brothers, after having driven out the Carians, who then held most of those islands. This is the Minos, according to Dio-

of these things there is scarce any thing upon record worth mentioning.

Reigns of the Cretan kings. Cres was, according to Eusebius<sup>a</sup>, the first who reigned in Crete. He is also mentioned by Clemens<sup>b</sup>, Cedrenus<sup>c</sup>, and Eustathius<sup>d</sup>. The latter supposes him to be the son of Jupiter; wherein he is contradicted by all the antient as well as modern writers. Talus and Vulcan are only mentioned by Pausanias as reigning in Crete. This cannot be the Vulcan whom other writers suppose to have reigned in Sicily or the island of Lemnos, and whose skill in discovering mines, and preparing metals, gave rise to the fables of the poets. Rhadamanthus, mentioned by Strabo<sup>e</sup> as the first legislator of the Cretans, is supposed by Apollodorus to have succeeded Vulcan, and to have been famous for his justice. Aristotle likewise speaks of him as the first who made laws for the Cretans<sup>f</sup>.

dorus and Thucydides, who made war upon the Athenians, for having put to death his son Androgeus (96). Minos had by his wife Pasiphae four sons, Deucalion, Catreus, Androgeus, and Glauclus. Deucalion succeeded his father, and was succeeded by his brother Catreus, whom Eusebius names Creteus. Deucalion lived some time in Attica, and is supposed to have died there; for Pausanias (97) tells us, that his tomb was still to be seen in his time at Athens, near the temple of Jupiter Olympius. Catreus was killed thro' mistake by his own son Althemenes, who, thereupon laying violent hands on himself, left the kingdom to Idomeneus the son of Deucalion, and Meriones the son of Molus. Aiolus was, according to Apollodorus the son of Deucalion, according to Diodorus, the son of Minos and brother of Deucalion. Idomeneus and Meriones assisted the Greeks in the Trojan war with a squadron of fourscore ships. The former is mentioned by Homer, and commended as very expert at the bow (98). They were both after their death worshipped by the Cretans as heroes or demi-gods. Virgil says (99), that Idomeneus was driven out of his kingdom after his return from Troy, but does not tell us by whom or on what account. Such is the succession of the Cretan kings according to Apollodorus and Diodorus Siculus; but the accounts, which they give us of these princes, are so interwoven with fables, that it is almost beneath the dignity of history to take notice of them.

Milinus, according to Berosus, reigned in Crete, and obtained the sovereignty of the sea, but was at last killed by the Libyan Hercules. Melisseus, if we believe Lactantius, was the first who introduced into the island of Crete the worship of the gods and religious ceremonies. The same author adds, that his daughters Amalthea and Melissa nourished Jupiter, when he was an infant, with goats milk, which gave rise to the poetical fables on this subject. His daughter Melissa he appointed priestess of Cybele the great mother of the gods; and as she was the first who was employed in this ministry, all the priestesses of that goddess were afterwards called Melissa. This Jupiter, as Lactantius observes, was different from the famous Jupiter of the Greeks and Latins, though most authors confound them. Cydon succeeded his father Melisseus, and reigned, as we read in the chronology of Eusebius<sup>2</sup>, about the time of Cecrops I. king of Athens. Apteras succeeded Cydon, and is said by the same Eusebius to have built a town. Lapithas, according to some writers, surnamed Taurus and Jupiter, carried away Europa, the daughter of Agenor king of Sidon, which gave rise to the fable of Jupiter's transforming himself into a bull<sup>3</sup>. Eustathius and Cedrenus<sup>4</sup> tell us, that Lapithas built the city of Gortyna, that he took the city of Tyre, and, after having performed great feats both at home and abroad, died in Crete, where his monument was to be seen even in the time of Eusebius. Solinus<sup>5</sup>, Theophilus Antiochenus<sup>6</sup>, and St. Jerom<sup>7</sup>, speak of Jupiter's sepulchre in Crete, which was, in all likelihood, the sepulchre of Lapithas surnamed Jupiter and Taurus, as we have observed above. Asterius, according to Apollodorus<sup>8</sup> and Eusebius<sup>9</sup>, was brother to Lapithas, succeeded him in the kingdom, and married his widow Europa. Asterius is also mentioned by Manetho, who makes him contemporary with Pandion king of Athens. Lapithas had by Europa three sons, Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon. As Asterius died without issue male, the three sons of Lapithas raised great disturbances in the kingdom, each of them aspiring to the crown, and forming parties against one another. At last Minos prevailed and banished his brothers. Rhadamanthus fled first into Lycia, and thence into Boeotia, where he married Alcmena the mother of Hercules, and settled at Haliartus <sup>r</sup>. Strabo and Pausanias distinguish two Rhadamanthuses, and likewise two Minoses. The famous Rhadamanthus, who was, according to the poets, judge of the infernal regions, was brother to Minos II. But the accounts which the antients give us of these princes are so perplexed, and interwoven with fables, that it is impossible to come at the truth. Sarpedon, being defeated by his brother Minos, and driven out of the island, with all those who sided with him, settled in Mylias; for that was the antient name of the country, which was afterwards called Lycia. He was there raised to the throne, and kindly entertained Lycus the son of Pandion, when he was obliged by his brother Ægeus to quit Athens. From Lycus the inhabitants of the country, called before his arrival Solyimi, had the name of Lycians <sup>q</sup>.

Evander. Minos had one son, by name Evander, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and married Deidamia the daughter of Bel-lerophon, by whom he had a son named Sarpedon. Evander was succeeded by his son, who went to assist the Trojans, and distinguished himself in that war, but was killed at last by Patroclus. Most authors confound this Sarpedon king of Crete with the king of Lycia bearing the same name <sup>r</sup>. Sarpedon was succeeded by Lycastes, the natural son of Minos by Itone. Lycastes had by his wife Ida Minos II. the greatest king who had reigned in Crete, and much spoke of by the antients, especially the poets. Diodorus, as we have hinted above, differs in his account of the Cretan kings from Pausanias, Pliny, Eusebius, Clemens Alexandrinus, and most of the antient as well as modern historians and chronologers. According to him, Teetamus, the son of Dorus and grandson of Deucalion, arriving in Crete with the Æolians and Pelasgians, reigned there as king, and marrying the daughter of Cretheus had by her Asterius, in whose reign Jupiter carried away Europa, and had by her three sons, Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon. Asterius afterwards married Europa, but having no children by her, adopted the sons of Jupiter, and left the kingdom to them. Rhadamanthus gave laws to the Cretans, and Minos took upon him the government of the kingdom, married Itone the daughter of Lyctius, and had by her Lycastes, who, coming to the crown, married Ida the daughter of Corybantus, by whom he had a son called also Minos. This Minos was the first of the Grecians who equipped a fleet, and gained the dominion of the sea. He married Pasiphae the daughter of Sol and *Crete*s, and had by her Deucalion, Astræa, Androgeus, Ariadne, and several other children. Androgeus, in the reign of Ægeus king of Athens, went to that city to see the Panathenean solemnities, and on that occasion contracted such an intimacy with Pallas the king's brother and his fifty sons, as raised no small jealousy in Ægeus, who began to fear, lest Pallas, with the assistance of the Cretan king, should deprive him of the crown, and place it on his own head. He therefore caused Androgeus to be privately murdered, which Minos no sooner heard, than he proclaimed war against the Athenians. But finding all the attempts to revenge the death of his son prove unsuccessful, he had recourse to the gods, committing the revenge of such an unjust and treacherous murder to them. Hereupon the Athenians were grievously afflicted with a pestilence, famine, and several other plagues, and told by the oracle of Delphos, that they must not expect any relief till they were reconciled to Minos. The Cretan king, resolved to make them pay dear for their deliverance, imposed upon them a yearly tribute of seven boys, and as many girls, whom he condemned to be devoured by the Minotaur, during the space of seven, or, according to others, of nine years. Minos had already, for three years successively, exacted this bloody tribute, when Theseus, after having performed many glorious exploits, willingly offered himself to be one of the unhappy victims; and accordingly sailing with the rest to Crete, there killed the Minotaur, and delivered his country from the bloody Cretan tribute, as we have related at length elsewhere<sup>c</sup>. The Minotaur is feigned by the poets to have been half man half bull, and begot by a bull upon Pasiphae<sup>ta ii.</sup> the wife of Minos, by the contrivance of Dædalus. But Servius† tells us, that Pasiphae, falling in love with one Taurus, secretary to Minos, and privately carrying on with him a criminal conversation in the house of Dædalus, was brought to bed of two twin-brothers, one of which resembled Minos and the other Taurus, and that this gave birth to the fable of the Minotaur. But of this fabulous monster, so famous among the poets, and some credulous historians, we have spoke already, in the history of the antient kingdom of Athens, to which we refer the reader<sup>u</sup>. Minos, highly incensed against Dædalus for being assistant to his queen Pasiphae in her unlawful amours, and hearing that he was fled into Sicily, and there entertained by Cocalus king of the Siculi, proclaimed war against that island, rigged out a mighty fleet, and setting sail arrived on the coasts of Agrigentum. The place where he landed his men was from him called Minoa, which name it retained to the time of Diodorus the historian<sup>w</sup>. Minos, on his arrival, sent messengers to Cocalus, entreating him to deliver up Dædalus to justice, rather than to draw a war upon himself and his country. Hereupon Minos and Cocalus came to an interview, wherein Cocalus having promised to do all Minos required of him, the latter, trusting to the fair promises of that treacherous prince, was prevailed upon to go to his house without guards, where he was privately stifled in a bath. Cocalus delivered the body of the king to the Cretans, who had attended him in that expedition, giving out, that his death had been occasioned by his slipping accidentally into the hot and scalding baths. His soldiers buried him with great pomp, and erected a magnificent monument to his memory, building near it a temple in honour of Venus, which was much resorted to for many ages. In after-times, when Agrigentum was built, the bones of Minos were discovered, and sent by Thero into Crete. The Cretans, who had followed Minos into Sicily, upon his death settled in that island, and built the city of Minoa, so called from Minos. In process of time they possessed themselves of some places in the heart of the country, and built the city of Engyum. From Engyum they made frequent inroads into the neighbouring countries, and being reinforced with a new colony of Cretans, who were driven upon the coasts of Sicily, as they were returning home under the conduct of Merion, after the destruction of Troy, they subdued many of the bordering states, and formed themselves into a republic, which was the most considerable in that part of the island<sup>x</sup>.

SOME writers, as we have observed above, acknowledged but one Minos; but others maintain, that there were two, and add, that they were both no less famous for the wise laws they published, than for the conquests they made. Be that as it will, the Minos we are here speaking of was the father of Deucalion the Argonaut, the grandfather of Idomeneus, and contemporary with Ægeus king of Athens; and this Minos was, according to Plato<sup>y</sup> and Aristotle<sup>z</sup>, the author of the laws which are so highly commended by them, and which it will not be improper to give some account of in this place.

The laws of Minos.

The main scope which Minos aimed at in the forming of his laws was, as Strabo informs us<sup>a</sup>, to procure happiness for his subjects, by rendering them virtuous. To attain this end, he first banished idleness and luxury, the sources, as he calls them, of all vice, from his dominions. He found means to keep all his subjects employed either at home or abroad, not suffering any, however distinguished above the rest, to lead an idle and indolent life; but obliging them either to serve in the army, or apply themselves to agriculture, which he brought into great reputation. In order to establish a kind of equality among his subjects, he decreed, that in each city the children should be brought up together, and early taught the same maxims, exercises, and arts. They were accustomed from their tender years to bear hunger and thirst, to suffer heat and cold, to walk over steep and rugged places, to skirmish with each other in small parties, and to exercise themselves in a kind of dance with their armour, which was afterwards called the Pyrric<sup>b</sup>. As Crete was a mountainous and uneven country, the youth were not taught here, as elsewhere, to ride or wear heavy armour, but to use their bow dexterously; and in this they far excelled all other nations in the world. One of Minos's institutions, which Aristotle greatly admires, was, that all his subjects should use the same diet, and frequently take their repasts together, without any distinction between the poor and the rich. This, as Aristotle observes<sup>c</sup>, introduced a kind of equality among all ranks of people, accustomed them to a frugal and sober life, and cemented friendship and unity between them, by the usual gaiety and mirth of the table. The public defrayed the charges of these meals, one part of the revenues of the state being applied to the uses of religion, and the salaries of the magistrates, and the rest allotted for the public meals. After their repast, the old men discoursed of the actions and virtues of their ancestors, and of such as had distinguished themselves, either by their valour in war, or their wisdom in peace; and the youth, who were present at these entertainments, were exhorted to propose these great persons to themselves, as their models for the forming of their manners and the regulation of their conduct. Another of Minos's institutions, which Plato admires the most<sup>d</sup>, was, to inspire early into the youth a high respect for the maxims, customs, and laws of their own country, not suffering them to dispute or call in question the wisdom of their constitution, but commanding them to look upon their laws as dictated by the gods themselves. He had the same regard to the magistrates and aged persons, whom he enjoined every one to honour in a peculiar manner ; and that nothing might lessen the respect due to their age, he ordained, that if any defects were observed in them, they should never be mentioned in the presence of the youth. A custom established by Minos in Crete, and, in after-ages, adopted by the Romans, gives us reason to believe, that even the slaves were better treated in Crete than any where else ; for in the feasts of Mercury the masters waited on the slaves at table, and performed about them the same offices, which they received from them the rest of the year. This was to put men in mind of the primitive world, in which all men were equal, and to signify to the masters, that their servants were of the same condition with themselves. The laws of Minos were antiently in so great repute, that Lycurgus passed a considerable time in Crete, employing himself in the study of the Cretan constitution, and forming his laws upon the model of those that then obtained in that island. Plato tells us, that Crete, under the government of so wise a prince, became the abode of virtue, probity, and justice, and that the laws which he established were so well founded in justice and equity, that they subsisted in their full vigour even in his time, that is, above nine hundred years after they had been first published. It is true, the Cretans degenerated by degrees from their antient probity, and at length, by an entire change of manners, became the most vicious nation that was known either to the Greeks or Latins. Polybius writes <sup>f</sup>, that the Cretans in his time were avaritious and self-interested to such a degree, as to think no lucre sordid. Suidas and Callimachus <sup>g</sup> give them the character of lyars and impostors ; and St. Paul quotes against them, as truth, the testimony of one of their own poets, perhaps Epimenides, who paints them in very disgraceful colours. The impurity of their amours are but too well known, from the accounts given us of them by Strabo <sup>h</sup>, Servius <sup>i</sup>, and Athenæus <sup>k</sup>. But this change of manners, in whatever time it happened, does not effect the probity of the antient Cretans, nor lessen the glory of their legislator. We cannot help adding here, that when we reflect on the justice, equity, and humanity, of king Minos, and the high commendations which the most eminent and judicious writers among the antients have bestowed upon him, we are inclined to believe those authors mistaken, who ascribe to him the imposing of that cruel tribute on the Athenians. Plato, Apollodorus, Strabo, Plutarch, Diodorus

Siculus, &c. are indeed of that opinion<sup>1</sup>; but a learned modern proves with a great deal of erudition, that they were mistaken, and confounded the legislator we are speaking of with another Minos, who, to avenge the death of his son, made war upon the Athenians, and imposed that bloody tribute, to which Theseus put an end, by killing Taurus the king's general, and entirely defeating the troops under his command<sup>1</sup>.

Minos was succeeded by his eldest son Deucalion, who, renewing the antient alliance between the Cretans and Athenians, gave his sister Phædra in marriage to Theseus, by whom he had Acamantes and Demophon. Phædra is said to have fallen passionately in love with her son-in-law Hippolytus, and, because he would not comply with her unlawful demands, to have accused him to her husband, as if he had attempted to ravish her. Hereupon Theseus, suspecting the truth of what she said, summoned Hippolytus to answer the accusation. But Phædra, fearing she should be discovered upon the trial of the cause, laid violent hands on herself<sup>m</sup>. Deucalion was, according to Hyginus, one of the Argonauts. Plutarch tells us out of Clidemus, that he was killed by Theseus at Gnosus in Crete<sup>n</sup>. After Deucalion reigned Creteus, or, as Diodorus and Pausanias call him, Catreus. He was brother to Deucalion, and son of Minos by Pasiphae, or, as others will have it, by Merope. Being told by the oracle, that he should be killed by his son Althemenes, he banished him his dominions. But, after some years, hearing that he had settled in the island of Rhodes, and being desirous to see him before he died, he put to sea, and arriving with a few ships in the night, was taken by the inhabitants for a pirate, and, in the scuffle, accidentally killed by his own son<sup>o</sup>. Upon the death of Creteus, the kingdom fell to Idomeneus the son of Deucalion by Cleopatra. He assisted the Greeks at the siege of Troy with fourscore ships, and distinguished himself there, if we may believe the poets, in several single combats. After the destruction of that city, his ships being in great danger by a violent storm, he vowed to sacrifice, if he got safe home, the first person he met. It happened, that his eldest son came first out to meet him, whom he, pursuant to his vow, either did, or attempted to, sacrifice. Hereupon, his subjects refusing to receive him, he sailed into Italy, and built there the city of Potilia near Salentinum, a cape of Calabria<sup>2</sup> (L). The famous historian Diety, surnamed Cretensis, was his secretary, as Eustathius informs us<sup>1</sup>. This author is said by Septimius, Cedrenus, Suidas, and Isaacius Porphyrogenitus, to have wrote the history of the Trojan war in Greek, but with Phœnician letters. The book which now goes under the name of Diety Cretensis is a spurious piece. Upon the death or banishment of Idomeneus, Meriones, the son of Molus by Melphis and grandson of Minos, was raised to the throne. He had attended Idomeneus to the Trojan war, and there signalized himself, as we read in Homer, Virgil, and the other antient poets. He died after a short reign, and was buried in Crete, with great pomp, near the tomb of Idomeneus. The monuments of both these princes were still to be seen in the time of Diodorus Siculus, not far from the city of Gnoſſus. On that of Idomeneus was the following inscription, Idomeneus, who was born in Gnoſſus, lies in this tomb, and had by him J. Merion the son of Molus. They were both adored by the Cretans as demigods, and invoked in all the wars they undertook<sup>3</sup>. Many years after the death of Meriones or Merion, we find Etearchus reigning in Crete, and residing, not at Gnoſſus the seat of the former kings, but at Oaxes. The seats, and even the names, of the intermediate kings, are buried in oblivion. However, it is not improbable, that Etearchus was descended from Minos, and consequently of the same family with the princes whose reigns we have hitherto described; since Suidas tells us, that the race of Minos enjoyed the sovereignty of Crete to the destruction of that kingdom, that is, till monarchy gave way to a republican government. The family of Minos, tho' deprived of the sovereign power, continued, even after that change, in great splendor, as Tzetzes informs us<sup>f</sup>; and Suetonius tells us, that the emperor Sergius Galba pretended to be descended from Minos by the mother's side<sup>g</sup>. All we know of Etearchus, the last king of Crete, is, that, by the wicked contrivances and groundless calumnies of his queen, he was so estranged from Phronima his daughter by his first wife, that he delivered her up to one Themison a merchant of Thera, enjoining him to drown her in the sea. Themison, though he had bound himself by an oath to do whatever Etearchus should command him, yet could not prevail upon himself to put this barbarous command in execution; having therefore, to comply with the obligation of his oath, let her down into the sea by a rope, he drew her up again unhurt, and carried her to Thera, his native country, where she was admitted among the concubines of Polymnestus, by whom she had Battus the founder of Cyrene<sup>h</sup>.

(L) Joannes Tzetzes relates this in a quite different manner; for he tells us, that Idomeneus, on his departure for Troy, appointed one Leucos to govern the kingdom in his absence, promising to give him, on his return, his daughter Clisibere in marriage, and make him his heir. Leucos governed for some time with great justice and equity; but at last was prevailed upon by Nauplius king of Endora to put to death Meda the wife, and Clisibere the daughter of Idomeneus, and seize the kingdom for himself. Idomeneus, finding, on his return, Leucos in possession of the crown, attempted to drive out the usurper, but was himself obliged to withdraw from the island, which was entirely addicted to Leucos, and seek a new settlement for himself and those who had attended him to Troy.

MONARCHICAL government being abolished, in what manner, or on what account, we find no where recorded, the chief power was lodged in the senate, which was composed of thirty senators, and is called by Aristotle<sup>w</sup> the public council of the nation. In that assembly affairs of the greatest consequence were examined, and resolutions taken, which, however, were of no force till the people had confirmed them by their suffrages. Next in authority to the senate were the Cosmi, so called from the Greek word Cosmos, signifying order; these magistrates being appointed for the maintaining of good order in the state. They had much the same power as the Ephori at Sparta, were ten in number, and chosen, like the Ephori, out of the body of the people, the meanest of the populace having an equal right to this dignity with the most illustrious families of the republic. They were, in a certain manner, the balance between the people and the senate, and a check upon both; for, without their approbation, no decree was of any force. Out of their body the senators were chosen, none being admitted into the senate, who had not before given some proofs of their prudence, equity, and disinterestedness in the college of the Cosmi. In time of war they commanded the armies of the republic with an absolute and unbounded power; but were afterwards liable to be called to an account; whereas the senators were not accountable to any for their administration. In this condition on continued the island of Crete for many ages. The inhabitants were ever at war among themselves, each city aspiring to the sovereignty of the whole island; but as the authors, who wrote the history of Crete, have not reached us, we are quite in the dark as to the particulars of those civil commotions. All we know is, that in the time of Philip the father of Perses, the Gnossians and Gortynians had reduced all the other cities of the island, and divided their conquests; so that the Cretans were no longer free, but subject to one of these cities, and obliged to acknowledge their subjection by an annual tribute *. These domestic troubles raged in Crete for many ages, and gave the inhabitants an opportunity of perfecting themselves in all the arts of war; whence they were in such repute among other nations, that most of the states and princes then at war took care to have always in their armies some bodies of Cretan bowmen and slingers, the Cretans having been in all ages, as Pausanias observes †, remarkable for their skill and experience at the sling and bow. They were a great help, as Xenophon informs us, in the retreat of the ten thousand ‡. Many of Alexander's victories, if we believe Arrian, were owing to the Cretan auxiliaries †. Livy has not forgot the advantages which Eumenes and the consul Manlius gained by means of the archers and slingers of Crete, the one over Antiochus, the other over the Gauls, in the famous battle fought near mount Olympus *. After the Romans once became acquainted with Crete, they employed the inhabitants in all their expeditions, keeping constantly in their pay numerous bodies of Cretan auxiliaries, which, generally speaking, behaved with great gallantry. In the war of Antiochus, they entered into an alliance with Rome, having been induced thereunto by Eumenes king of Pergamus. But notwithstanding the treaty of friendship subsisting between the two republics, the Cretans entered into measures with other potentates, without consulting the Roman senate. In the war which the Romans carried on against Mithridates, they were said to maintain a private correspondence with that prince, and likewise to have assisted the pirates, who infested the Mediterranean, and committed great ravages on the coasts of Italy itself. This gave the Romans a specious pretence of enslaving an island, which had, to that time, been free from all foreign subjection; but the true motive that prompted them to undertake this war was, as Florus informs us †, a desire of conquering that island. The Romans, who were so fond of their own liberties, made it their chief business to deprive all other nations of theirs. This expedition being resolved on, it fell to the lot of Q. Hortensius to command the troops that were to be employed in it; but as he had spent his whole life in peaceable employments, and was altogether unqualified for military expeditions, he readily resigned the command of the troops to his colleague Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who postponed setting sail till the time of his consulship was expired. In the mean time the Cretans sent an embassy to Rome, consisting of thirty of the most illustrious men of the island, who, by their earnest solicitations and humble supplications, moved the senate to compassion; insomuch, that they were ready to renew with them their antient treaties. But P. Lentulus Spinther alone opposed the good-will of the senate towards the Cretans, by representing, that Rome could never be mistress of the seas, nor keep them clear of pirates, till Crete was reduced to the state of a province. His opposition made the fathers change their minds, and so many and hard conditions were then demanded of the suppliants, that they chose rather to maintain a war than comply with them. The ambassadors being dismissed, Metellus set sail with three legions, and, arriving on the coast of Crete, landed his men without opposition. The Cretan republic was then governed by two chiefs, Lasthenes and Panares. The former had greatly contributed to the victory which the pirates had gained the year before over Antonius, and therefore not doubting but the Romans would make it a preliminary, that he should be given up to their vengeance, encouraged the people to take up arms, and raised forces in all parts of the island. In a short time four and twenty thousand men were armed and brought into the field. Metellus, in order to draw them to a battle, advanced towards Cydonia, at that time the capital of the island, as if he designed to besiege it. Lasthenes to prevent the siege met the Roman general on his march, gave him battle, but was entirely defeated, and obliged to save himself by flight to Gnossus. Metellus, being master of the field, laid siege to Cydonia, which Panares after a faint defence delivered up to the conqueror, upon a promise that both he and the inhabitants should be spared. From thence Metellus advanced to Gnossus, where Lasthenes had shut himself up. But the cowardly general, instead of putting the city into a condition to hold out a siege, set fire to it and retired. The city of Lychus,

though well fortified, surrendered as soon as the Roman army approached the walls. Thus Metellus in one campaign possessed himself of the best part of the island, though defended by the Cilician pirates as well as by its own inhabitants <sup>a</sup>.

THE next year early in the spring Metellus took the field, and having defeated the united forces of the Cretans and Cilician pirates, drove the latter from the castles which they had built on the rocks near the sea, and the former from most of their strong holds in the centre of the country. But as he treated both the inhabitants and the pirates with the utmost severity, they sent an embassy to Pompey, who had been lately appointed proconsul of the seas with an unbounded authority, entreating him to come and put the last hand to the reduction of Crete, and offering to surrender to him, without making the least resistance. Pompey, who was always ready to undertake the work of other generals, heard the ambassadors with pleasure, and promised to come and conclude an advantageous peace with them. Accordingly, having received hostages, he sent from Pamphylia, where he then resided, L. Octavius, one of his lieutenants, with orders to proclaim all over the island, that Pompey had the sole right of making treaties in all the places of his proconsulate; and that Metellus had no right to assume the title of general in a country which was within the province the senate had given to Pompey <sup>b</sup>. This shameful claim of Pompey caused a kind of civil war in the island, the Romans disputing with one another who should give the last stroke to the Cretans. Octavius joined the pirates and people of the island to oppose Metellus's conquests; and he, on the other hand, not fearing the additional forces which Pompey had sent against him, pursued his conquests with resolution. He besieged Eleuthera, and having gained over one of the chief citizens, who for several nights together poured down upon one of the towers so many barrels of vinegar as softened it, made himself master of the town by beating it down. From Eleuthera he turned towards Lappa, a strong city, which Octavius in person undertook to defend. But though Octavius made a vigorous defence, yet the place was at last taken by assault, and all the Cretans and Cilicians found in it put to the sword. As for Octavius and the Romans, Metellus dismissed them without their arms amidst the hisses of his soldiers. Pompey therefore sent new supplies to Octavius, and ordered

Sisenna to sail from the coast of Achaia to Crete. But Sisenna dying soon after his arrival, Octavius took upon him the command of his troops, and in conjunction with the pirates and Cretans endeavoured to stop the career of Metellus's conquests. But that brave commander having taken Hierapytna, the strongest place then in the island, obliged Octavius to save himself on board his ships, and abandon the island. Upon his departure Lasthenes and Panares laid down their arms, and all the inhabitants of the island submitted to the yoke. Metellus changed their form of government, obliged them to live according to the laws of Rome, imposed an annual tribute upon the whole island, and thereby reduced it to a Roman province, after it had enjoyed its liberties for a series of many ages<sup>c</sup>. Orosius tells us, that Metellus reduced the island in two years time<sup>d</sup>. But Velleius Paterculus<sup>e</sup>, Eutropius <sup>f</sup>, and others write, that the Romans spent three whole years in that undertaking, having to do with men no less brave than themselves. Metellus was honoured with a triumph, and the surname of Creticus or the Cretan, which Plutarch gives to Antonius the father of the famous Mark Anthony, who began indeed this expedition, but lost in it both his fleet and his life.

The History of Cyprus.

THE island which we are now to write of, was known Names. to the antients by the following names; Acamis, Cerastis, Aspalia, Amathus, Macaria, Cryptos, Colinia, Sphacia Paphia, Salaminia, Ærofa, and finally Cyprus. It was called Acamis from one of its promontories; Amathus, Paphia, and Salaminia from three of its antient cities; Macaria from the fruitfulness of its soil; Ærofa from its copper mines; Colinia or Collinia from its many hills; Sphacia from its antient inhabitants the Sphaces; Cerastis from the many promontories which, like so many horns, as the Greek word intimates, shoot into the sea. Whence it borrowed the name of Aspalia we know not; some etymologists have changed the name of Aspalia into that of Asperia, and pretend, that the island was so called from the unevenness of its ground: were we allowed in this manner to throw out, put in, and change, letters as we please, it would be no difficult matter to give etymologies. As to the name which it is now generally known by, some authors derive it from the Greek word Cryptos, signifying hidden, this island being often hid, say they, by the waves from the eye of the sailor; others will have it called Cyprus from Cyrus, who is said to have founded here the city of Aphrodisia. But this etymology is still worse than the former, the island having been known by the name of Cyprus in Homer's time, that is, six hundred years before the birth of Cyrus. Isidorus thinks it was called Cyprus from a city of that name <sup>b</sup>. But the most common opinion is, that it borrowed its name from a shrub, called by the Greeks Cypros, which, though very scarce in other countries, grew here in great plenty. What kind of shrub this was is still matter of dispute among authors. With the flower of this shrub the antient inhabitants made a very sweet oil, which is much commended by Pliny <sup>c</sup>. The name of Cerastis, as we have observed above, was given it from the great number of its promontories; and this appellation is founded on truth, no island that we know of, having more promontories than Cyprus. On the west it has the promontories of Acamas, now Capo S. Pifano, Drepanum, now Trepano, Zephyrum, now Capo Calidoni or Punta Malota; on the south, Phrurium, now Capo Bianco, Curias, or Capo delle Gatte, Gades, or Capo Chiti, Throni, or Capo Pila; on the east, Pendalium, now Capo di Greco, Clides, now Capo di S. Andrea; on the north, Coronyon, now Capo Cronochiette, and besides a great many others of less note. Androcles, as quoted by Tzetzes, tells us, that the island was antiently called Cerastis, because inhabited by men with horns; which opinion has been followed by the poets, namely by Ovid <sup>d</sup>.

THE cities of most note in Cyprus were, according to Ptolemy and Strabo <sup>e</sup> on the north side of the island; Arsinoe, so called from a queen of Egypt, the island of Cyprus having been long subject to the kings of that country. Solæ or Soli, which borrowed its name from Solon the famous lawgiver of the Athenians, who, during his banishment having visited the petty king of Epea, advised him to remove his city from a mountainous and barren country into a fruitful and pleasant plain. The king followed his advice, and was so pleased with the new situation of his metropolis, that out of gratitude to Solon, who had given him such good advice, he called it Solæ or Soli from his name <sup>f</sup>. Strabo

This city was in former times of so great note, that it gave the name of Lapithia to the neighbouring country. The two cities of Aphrodisias and Carpasia are likewise placed by Strabo and Ptolemy on the same coast, and mentioned by most of the antient geographers. Here also stood the cities of Cerines and Tremitus. Cerines, in former ages called Ceurania, is said to have been built by Cerines. Cyrus the Great, when he first subdued the nine kings of this island, and united the whole country to the crown of Persia, Tremitus is often mentioned by Sozomenus in the account he gives us of the miracles, which he supposes to have been wrought by the bishop Spiridion, a native of that city <sup>n</sup>. On the eastern coast stood the following cities: Salamis, built by Tencer the son of Telamon, who being, on his return from the siege of Troy, banished by his father Telamon, for not revenging on Ulysses the death of his brother Ajax, retired to Cyprus, and there built a city which he called Salamis after the name of his whole country <sup>o</sup>. This city was in after-ages called Constantia, and some are of opinion that Famagosta, the present metropolis of the island, was built on its ruins (M). On this side of the island, over-against the promontory called by Pliny Dinaretum, are the small islands named Clides, two in number according to Strabo, and three, according to Pliny. On the south coast the antients place Throni, a town so called from the promontory on which it stood; Citium, the birth-place of Zeno the famous stoic. Here Cimon the Athenian died, after having reduced great part of the island <sup>p</sup>. Plu-

(M) This city is stiled by Diodorus (100) the first of all the Cyprian cities, and said to have once excelled most of the Greek cities in power and riches. Tacitus (1) speaks of a magnificent temple built here in honour of Jupiter Salaminus, and Ammianus Marcellinus of three other temples dedicated to Pallas, Agraulos, and Diomedes. In that of Agraulos was yearly offered an human sacrifice, till that cruel ceremony was abolished by Diphilus king of Cyprus (2). Salamis in Cyprus is called by Lucan, Seneca, and Manilius, the other Salamis, to distinguish it from another city of the same name in an island adjacent to Elcusis called also Salamis.

tarch tells us, that he died at the siege of this place <sup>q</sup>; and Diodorus, that he took it before his death <sup>r</sup>. Josephus is of opinion, that this city was built by Cittim the son of Javan, and from him called Citium, or, as Pliny will have it, Cetium. Malum. Malum, which was likewise taken by Cimon, as Diodorus informs us <sup>s</sup>. Ptolemæus Lagi ruined this city and transplanted the inhabitants to Paphus <sup>t</sup>. Amathus so called from its founder Amathus the son of Aerias. Tacitus tells us, that Cyprus was famous for three temples; one, and the most antient of all, was dedicated to Venus Paphia by Aerias, the next in point of antiquity was consecrated to Venus Amathusia by Amathus the son of Aerias, and the third to Jupiter Salaminus by Teucer the son of Telamon <sup>u</sup>. The city of Amathus, as most others in this island was consecrated to Venus, as appears from Virgil <sup>w</sup> and the other antient poets. Ovid speaks of copper mines in the neighbourhood of this city <sup>x</sup>, and Pausanias mentions a famous temple here consecrated to Venus and Adonis <sup>y</sup>. On the west side of the island were the cities, Palæpaphos or Old Paphos, about ten furlongs from the shore. Here Venus is said to have first appeared after she was formed out of the froth of the sea; and hence the city was in a peculiar manner sacred to that goddess. The young women here used to prostitute themselves to such strangers as came ashore in order to raise money for their portions. About sixty furlongs from Palæpaphos stood Neapaphos or New Paphos, built, according to Strabo <sup>z</sup>, by Agapenor nephew to Lycurgus, and famous for its harbour and a stately temple dedicated to Venus. For both these cities were under the peculiar protection of Venus, whence they are often confounded by the antient writers, especially the poets. New Paphos was utterly ruined by an earthquake, but rebuilt by Augustus and thence called Augusta, a name which it did not long retain <sup>a</sup>. As to the inland towns, Ptolemy mentions only three, viz. Chybrus, Trimethus, and Tamassus or Tamascus, to which Strabo adds a fourth, viz. Limenia; but these were places of small note, though Ovid calls the territory of Tamascus, the most fruitful spot in Cyprus <sup>b</sup>. The copper, that was found in the mines adjoining to this city, was deemed the best in the world. The following cities are mentioned by Pliny, Diodorus Siculus, Pausanias, Stephanus, and others. But we are quite at a loss as to their situation, Cingria, Marium, Golgi, Epida-rum, Cresium, Erysthea, Lacedemonia, Tegessus, Mefina, Hyle, Tembro, Ledrum, or Leuteon. Diodorus tells us, that Marium was governed by a king of its own. Golgi was a small but very antient town, for the Cyprians, as Pausanias informs us <sup>d</sup>, worshipped Venus in the small town of Golgi, before Agapenor settled with his colony at Paphus. This city is mentioned by Catullus <sup>e</sup>, Lycophron <sup>f</sup>, and Theocritus <sup>g</sup>, who speak of it as a place consecrated in a special manner to Venus.

BESIDES the cities we have mentioned, Meursius places in Cyprus those of Berytus, Cnidus, and Cythera <sup>h</sup>, being led into this mistake by misunderstanding the antient writers, whom he quotes. To prove that Berytus stood in Cyprus, he produces a passage out of Strabo <sup>i</sup>, wherein that author, after having spoke of Citium, and told us, that it was the birth-place of Zeno, adds, that it is fifteen hundred furlongs, that is a hundred and eighty seven miles and a half distant from Berytus; and hence Meursius, in other respects a most accurate writer, concludes, that Berytus is reckoned by Strabo among the cities of Cyprus. But he ought to have inferred from these very words of Strabo, that Berytus could not stand in Cyprus, since no two places in the whole island, if we stand to the measures laid down by that geographer, can be at so great a distance from each other, the island being, according to him, but fourteen hundred furlongs long. Besides, it is very plain from the context, that Strabo in the abovementioned passage speaks of Berytus in Syria; and not of any city bearing that name in Cyprus. The city of Cnidus Meursius places in Cyprus, being induced thereunto by a passage in Joannes Tzetzes, where that writer, speaking of the country of Ctesias the historian, tells us, that he was a native of the Cyprian Cnidus, from which epithet our author concludes that Cnidus stood in Cyprus. But it is very plain both from Pliny <sup>k</sup> and Pausanias <sup>l</sup>, that the epithet of Cyprian was given to the city of Cnidus, because Venus, the Cyprian goddess as she is stiled by the poets, was the tutelary deity of the place, and no less religiously worshipped there than in Cyprus. But granting Tzetzes to have placed Cnidus in Cyprus, the authority of Strabo ought to have been of more weight with Meursi-

us than that of the writer he quotes; that antient geographer tells us in express words, that Ctesias, the physician and historian, was born in Cnidus a city of Caria <sup>m</sup>; wherein he is followed by all the writers both antient and modern who speak of that historian. As to Cythera, our author, in reckoning it among the cities of Cyprus, quotes in favour of his opinion two passages out of Virgil; in the first that poet joins together Cythera and the Idalian forest, which was without all doubt in Cyprus <sup>n</sup>; in the other he joins the city of Cythera with Amathus and Paphos, both cities of great note in this island <sup>o</sup>. But Venus, whom Virgil introduces in both places speaking of the cities that were consecrated to her, does not confine herself to the cities of Cyprus alone. She mentions, as is evident from the context, such places as were peculiarly addicted to her worship, whether in Cyprus or elsewhere. Now the island of Cythera and its metropolis, bearing the same name, were both consecrated to Venus, who had there a famous temple much resorted to by all the nations of Greece, as we read in Pausanias <sup>p</sup>. 'Tis true, the scholiast of Hesiod places Cythera in Cyprus; but herein he contradicts, which is often the case, the author whom he pretends to explain. For that poet speaking of the froth from which Venus is supposed to have sprung says, that it was first carried to Cythera, and from thence to the island of Cyprus <sup>q</sup>. From these words it is manifest, that Cythera was not, according to Hesiod a city of Cyprus.

Division.

Cyprus was by the antient geographers divided into four districts or provinces, viz. Paphia to the west, Amathusia to the south, Lapytha to the north, and Salaminia to the east. In after-ages it was divided into twelve provinces by the princes of the Lusignan family, who were put in possession of it by Richard I. of England, and held it for seventeen generations. The names of these twelve divisions were, Nicosia, Famagusta, Paphia, Audima, Limissa, Masorum, Salines, Mesforia, Crusocus, Pentalia, Carpassus, and Gerines. These were so denominated from the chief cities of each district; besides which cities and several others of less note, there were no fewer than eight hundred villages. This island, even under the tyrannical yoke of the Turks, is so considerable as to be governed by a beglerbeg, who has seven sangi-acks under him.

about an hundred and eighty miles, being but forty-five broad. It lies between the 34th and 35th degrees of north latitude, and was antiently deemed one of the most fruitful islands of the Mediterranean; but is at present in great part uncultivated, and the air in most places very unwholesome by reason of the fens and marshes. The honey of Cyprus is much commended by the antients, and likewise the wine, oil, wool, &c. but above all the copper, of which we have spoke already. Among the rarities of Cyprus we may reckon a certain kind of insects, which, as Aristotle<sup>1</sup> informs us, were produced and lived in the fire, but died when taken out of the flames. This, in our opinion, is no less improbable than what Pliny tells us of the earth of Cyprus, which never failed, if that author may be credited, to throw up in the night the dead bodies that were committed to it in the day-time<sup>2</sup>.

THIS island was first discovered by the Phœnicians, as Inhabi- Eratosthenes informs us<sup>3</sup>, about two or three generations, according to Sir Isaac Newton's computation<sup>4</sup>, before the days of Asterius and Minos kings of Crete, that is, about one thousand and six years before the christian æra. It was, says Eratosthenes, when first discovered, so overgrown with wood, that it could not be tilled, and the Phœnicians first cut down the wood for the melting of copper; and afterwards when they began to sail without fear on the Mediterranean, (that is presently after the Trojan war) they made use of that wood to build ships and even great navies. But not being able thus to destroy the wood, they gave every man leave to cut down what trees he pleased, and to possess all the ground he could clear. Thus far Eratosthenes. Herodotus likewise supposes the Phœnicians to have been the first who peopled the island.
 But Josephus tells us, that the descendants of Cittim, the son of Javan and grandson of Japhet, were the original inhabitants of Cyprus. According to his account Cittim, seeing his brother Tarshish settled in Cilicia, where he built the city of Tarsus, settled with his followers in this opposite island, and either he or his descendants laid the foundations of the city of Citium, which, according to Ptolemy, was the most anti-ent in the island. As Cyprus was too narrow to contain the great numbers of those who attended him and their descendants, he left here so many as might serve in time to plant the country, and with the rest passed over into Macedon, as we shall relate in the history of that antient kingdom. In process of time other nations, invited by the fertility of the soil, came and settled here, namely Phœnicians, Athenians, Salaminians, Arcadians, and Æthiopians; for Herodotus <sup>a</sup> says, that Cyprus was inhabited by colonies from these different countries.

Government and Kings.

THE government of Cyprus was without all doubt monarchical; for we find kings reigning here in the earliest ages. The first king we read of in history is Cinyras, the grandson of Pygmalion and father of Adonis. He was the son of Paphus, who is supposed to have been the first that introduced into the island the worship of Venus, and is said to have built the city which bears his name <sup>w</sup>. He had Adonis by his own daughter Myrrha. His father Paphus is feigned by the poets to have been the son of Pygmalion, by a woman who had been before an ivory statue. Pygmalion, say they, coming into the island of Cyprus, and seeing all the women living there very licentiously, resolved never to marry. Afterwards, as he was a famous statuary, he made an ivory statue of such perfection, that falling in love with it, he prayed the goddess Venus to procure him a wife as beautiful as the statue he had made. The goddess heard his prayer, and changed the statue into a fair damsel, by whom he had Paphus, the father of Cinyras and first king of Cyprus <sup>x</sup>. Cinyras is said to have possessed immense riches, insomuch, that the wealth of Cinyras became a proverb <sup>y</sup>, to express an overgrown estate. As the worship of Venus was first established in Cyprus by Paphus, the father of Cinyras, both he and his descendants were buried in the temple of Venus, at Paphus, an honour which was granted to no other family. The priesthood of Venus was likewise entailed, we may say, on their race, a dignity which they maintained for many ages after the throne was seized by others; nay, we read of one of this family, by name Sostratus, enjoying the priesthood of Venus in the reign of Vespasian, and greatly favoured by that prince and his son Titus, who often consulted him about future events <sup>z</sup>. Belus one of the successors of Cinyras, is said to have reigned in Cyprus at the arrival of Teucer the son of Telamon, and to have assisted him in laying the foundations of Salamis, which in process of time became the metropolis of the whole island. Cinyras and his successors, whose names have not reached us, were not kings of the whole country, but only of Paphos and the adjoining province. Besides the kingdom of Paphos we find eight other kingdoms mentioned by the antients. Of the kings of Salamis we shall have occasion to speak at length hereafter. The names of the others that have been transmitted to us are ; Philecyprus king of Solr, contemporary with Solon, as Plutarch informs us<sup>a</sup> ; Aristocyprus son of the former, mentioned by Herodotus b ; Pascerates or Pasicyprus, said by Athenæus to have succeeded Aristocyprus c. Timonax, Pygmalion, Praxippus, Stasioecus, Idomeneus, Moschion, Diphilus, Solon, and Themison are spoke of by the antients as reigning in Cyprus, but what kingdoms they held is what we find no where recorded. The kingdom of Salamis was by far the most powerful in Cyprus, the Salaminian princes having in process of time subdued the whole island, as we shall see in the sequel of this history.

THE island of Cyprus was parcelled out, as we have observ- History of ing with an uncontrolled authority till the time of Cyrus the Great, who subdued them by his lieutenants, but left them at the same time in possession of their respective kingdoms, obliging them only to pay an annual tribute to him and his successors, and to send supplies of men, money, and ships, when required. The Cyprian princes lived thus subject to the Persians till the reign of Darius the son of Hystaspes, when they attempted to shake off the yoke, being encouraged thereunto by Onesilus king of Salamis. But as from this period the history of Cyprus, as transmitted to us, is no other than that of the kingdom of Salamis ; before we relate the event of this war we shall give an account of that kingdom and of the princes, who reigned there before the accession of Onesilus to the throne.

THE first king of Salamis and founder of that kingdom Kings of was Teucer the son of Telamon, who signalized himself at the Salamis siege of Troy, if we may believe the poets. Upon his return and history being banished his country he retired to Cyprus, where he of that Euclthon.

Ætius<sup>f</sup> tells us, that Teucer introduced into the island of Cyprus the barbarous custom of offering human sacrifices to Jupiter, which continued till the reign of the emperor Adrian. Ajax, the son of Teucer, is said to have built a stately temple at Olbus in Cilicia, and to have transmitted the priesthood to his posterity, a dignity greatly valued in antient times, the chief priest of Olbus being lord of that part of Cilicia, which was known to the Greeks by the name of Tracheotis. After the descendants of Ajax were deprived both of the priesthood and the sovereignty annexed to it, the name of Ajax was still retained, and given to all those who enjoyed that dignity though no-ways related to the Teucrian family. As to the immediate successors of Teucer in the kingdom of Salamis we are quite in the dark. Many years after him reigned Nicocreon; but did nothing which authors have thought worth transmitting to posterity. His daughter Arfinoe is mentioned by Ovid<sup>g</sup>. The next king we find reigning in Salamis is Euclthon, who as we read in Herodotus<sup>h</sup>, first submitted to the Egyptians, and afterwards to the Persians, assisting Cambyses in his expeditions with men, money, and ships. In his reign Pheretima, queen of the Cyrenæans, being driven out of her kingdom with her son Arcefilaus, fled to Salamis, and being there kindly entertained, solicited Euclthon to assist her with an army, in order to re-establish her family in Cyrene. But the king, not caring to engage in a war, made her rich presents, hoping to content her by that means and redeem himself from her importunities. The queen accepted the presents, and seemed to be highly pleased with them, but always added, that though they were very valuable, yet an army would be far more acceptable to her. At length Euclthon presented her with a reel and distaff of gold, and finding she repeated her acknowledgment in the same terms, told her plainly, that these were more proper presents for women than armies<sup>i</sup>. He sent a censer of great value and most curious workmanship to the temple of Delphos, which was to be seen in Herodotus's time in the treasury of the Corinthians<sup>k</sup>.

Siromus and Cherfis are mentioned by Herodotus as reigning at Salamis<sup>l</sup>; but performed nothing which that writer has thought worth relating. The latter left three sons, Gorgus, Onesilus, and Philaon. Gorgus succeeded his father, but was soon driven out by his brother Onesilus in the following manner. Onesilus, having often solicited the king to shake off the Persian yoke, and finding that he could not prevail upon him to revolt, resolved to possess himself of the crown, not doubting, but, as he was a declared enemy to the Persians, all the Cyprians would join him; the island being then grievously oppressed by the Persian governors. He had scarce taken this resolution when news was brought him of the Ionian revolt. Whereupon he renewed his instances with greater earnestness than ever, and did all that lay in his power to persuade his brother to join the rebels; but finding him inviolably attached to the Persian interest, he gained a considerable party among the Salaminiens, and with their assistance, while Gorgus was one day out of the city, he seized on the gates and caused himself to be proclaimed king. Gorgus, being thus excluded, fled to the Persians, and Onesilus, sending ambassadors to all the cities and princes of the island, prevailed upon them to take up arms and drive out the Persian garisons. The city of Amathus alone refused to come into his measures; whereupon he closely besieged it; but the inhabitants making a vigorous defence, before he could reduce the place, the Persians, having drawn together all the forces they had in Cilicia and the neighbouring provinces, passed over into Cyprus, and having landed their men marched strait to Salamis. Onesilus, not finding himself in a condition to make head against so numerous an army, sent messengers to the Ionians soliciting their assistance, and inviting them to join against the common enemy. The Ionians with all possible expedition equipped a fleet and set sail for Cyprus. Upon their arrival the Cyprian kings, having summoned a council of war, invited to it all the commanders of the Ionian fleet, and spoke to them thus:

“Men of Ionis, we give you the choice either to engage the Persians by land, or the Phœnicians, who are cruising with their fleet off the island, by sea. If you chuse to fight the Persians, bring your men ashore, that we may go on board your ships and fight the Phœnicians. But if you had rather try your strength against the Phœnicians, do as you think best, for we are ready either to engage the Persians by land, or the Phœnicians by sea, being determined at all events to preserve the liberties of Cyprus and Ionis.” The Ionians answered, “that they were sent by the general council of Ionis to defend the island by sea, and not to deliver their ships to the Cyprians in order to fight the Persians by land; and that they would endeavour to do their duty according to the instructions they had received.” The council was scarce dismissed dismissed, when the Persian army appeared in the plains of Salamis ; upon which the confederate kings of Cyprus, drawing up their forces in order of battle, placed the flower of their army, consisting of Salaminians and Solians, against the front of the Persians, and the rest of the Cyprians against the enemy's auxiliaries. Onesilus took upon him to engage Artybius commander in chief of the Persian forces, who was mounted on a horse, as our historian tells us, that had been taught to stand upright and tread under his feet the person he was pushed against. Onesilus therefore charged one of his officers, a man of great boldness and well experienced in military affairs, to mind nothing but the general's horse, and to prevent him from doing any mischief in the time of the engagement. As the armies drew near, the king of Salamis advanced against Artybius, whose horse beginning to rear, the officer struck him with a scythe and cut off both his feet at one blow ; Onesilus having at the same time wounded Artybius, both the horse and the rider fell to the ground. But the Persians, not at all disheartened at the death of their leader, charged the Cyprians with incredible vigour ; and the Cyprians on the other hand exerting themselves in imitation of their general, the victory was long doubtful, many falling on both sides. But at length, Stesenor king of Curium revolting to the enemy with all the forces under his command, and the Salaminians, who fought in chariots, soon after following his example, the Cyprians were put to flight with great slaughter. Among others Onesilus, who had been the occasion of this war, was killed in the flight, and with him Aristocyprus king of Soli, and son of that Philocyprus, whom Solon commended above all other kings in the verses he made during his stay in Cyprus. The Amathusians, to be revenged on Onesilus for having besieged their city, cut off his head and placed it over one of the gates of Amathus, where a swarm of bees having filled the scull with honey, the Amathusians, consulting on that occasion the oracle, were told, that if they interred the head and sacrificed yearly to Onesilus, as a hero, their affairs should prosper. The Amathusians obeyed the oracle, and continued to offer sacrifices to Onesilus to the time of our historian. The Persians, having thus gained a complete victory over the Cyprians, soon reduced all the cities that had revolted, except Soli, which held out for six months against the whole power of Persia, but at last, the walls being undermined by the enemy, was obliged to surrender. The Salaminians no sooner heard of the death of Onesilus, but they recalled Gorgus and placed him again on the throne.

Thus the Cyprians, having enjoyed their liberty during the space of one year, were reduced to their former state of slavery <sup>m</sup>.

Gorgus was succeeded in the kingdom of Salamis by his eldest son Nicocrates, and he by his brother Timarchus. But all we know of them is, that the former made a curious collection of books, which he purchased at a great rate, as Athenæus informs us <sup>n</sup>; and that the latter had, as we read in Pliny <sup>o</sup>, a double row of teeth. This writer seems to insinuate, that Timarchus was not only king of Salamis, but also of Paphos. In the reign of one of these princes, of which precisely we cannot tell, the Greeks, having settled their affairs at home, resolved to drive the Persians out of all the Greek cities of Asia and the neighbouring islands. With this view they equipped a powerful fleet, which sailing to Cyprus under the command of Pausanias admiral of the Lacedæmonians and Aristides the Athenian, drove from many cities in that island the Persian garisons, and restored the inhabitants to their former liberty <sup>p</sup>.

Timarchus was succeeded by Evagoras I. the son of Nicocrates, in whose reign the Athenians having equipped a fleet of two hundred sail, gave the command of it to Cimon, enjoining him to drive the Persians from the island of Cyprus. Cimon pursuant to his orders landed his men in Cyprus, took Malum and several other cities of that island, and from thence, to make a diversion, sent sixty sail to the assistance of the Egyptians, who had revolted from the Persians. As Artabazus, commander in chief of the Persian forces in those parts, lay off of Cyprus with a fleet of three hundred ships, Cimon, as soon as his squadron returned from Egypt, fell upon him, took a hundred of his ships, destroyed many others, and pursued the rest to the coasts of Phœnicia. Being flushed with this success, on his return he landed his men in Cilicia, where he found Megabyzus with an army of three hundred thousand men, marched against him, and having cut in pieces a numberless multitude of his men, returned to Cyprus with a double triumph, and laid siege to Citium, the strongest city in the whole island.

Evagoras, notwithstanding the great advantages gained by Cimon, still adhered to the Persians, and, having raised a considerable army and prevailed upon several other petty princes of Cyprus to join him, marched to the relief of Citium, but was worsted by the Athenians, and obliged to retire to Salamis. Hereupon Artaxerxes, tired with a war in which he had sustained so great losses, resolved to put an end to so many calamities by coming to an accommodation with the enemy. Accordingly he sent orders to his generals, who were charged with the management of the Cyprian war, to conclude a peace with the Athenians on the best terms they could. Hereupon Megabyzus and Artabazus sent ambassadors to Athens to propose an accommodation, which was agreed upon by the deputies of both sides on the following conditions: 1. That all the Greek cities of Asia should be made free, and allowed to live according to their own laws; 2. That no Persian ships of war should enter those seas that lie between the Cyanean and Chelidonian islands, that is from the Euxine sea to the coasts of Pamphylia; 3. That no Persian general should come by land within three days march of those seas; 4. That the Athenians should not commit any hostilities in the territories of the king of Persia. Pursuant to these articles, the Persians withdrew all their garisons from Cyprus, leaving the several kings, among whom the island was parcelled out, to govern their respective kingdoms without any dependence on the kings of Persia<sup>9</sup>. Not long after the conclusion of this peace Evagoras died, if we believe Diodorus Siculus, in banishment, having been driven out of his kingdom by his nephew Protagoras<sup>r</sup>, who held it for some years, but performed nothing worth relating. The island of Cyprus continued free from any foreign yoke from the conclusion of the peace we have spoke of till the 18th year of the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon king of Persia, when by the famous treaty concluded by Antalcidas the Lacedemonian, with Tiribazus general of the Persian forces in Asia Minor, that island was again subjected to the Persians with all the Greek cities in Asia. At this time reigned at Salamis Nicocreon son of the usurper Protagoras, famous for his cruelty, of which the following instance is related by Laertius, Philo, Valerius Maximus, and Pliny. Taking offence at a satirical saying of the philosopher Anaxarchus, he caused him to be put into a great mortar made for that purpose, and to be pounded to death with iron pestles<sup>s</sup>. Upon the death of Nicocreon, Nicocles the son of Timarchus was raised to the throne. During his reign a stranger from Phœnicia, called by some authors Abdymon, coming to Sa- lamis, and being kindly entertained by Nicocles, requited the favours he received at the king's hands by driving him, with the assistance of the Persians, from the throne. Under this tyrant Evagoras II. was born, a prince of great merit and extraordinary virtue. He was the son of Nicocles, and, being brought up by his parents with great care, gave early proofs of those virtues, which, if Isocrates may be credited, made him the perfect model of a good king<sup>1</sup>. He was distinguished, as the same author tells us, among the youth by the beauty of his aspect, the vigour of his body, and most of all by the modesty and innocence of his behaviour, which are the greatest ornaments of that age. He came into the world with the most happy dispositions; a great fund of genius, an easy conception, a most lively penetration, which nothing escaped, &c. qualities, which might have exempted him from all study and application; and nevertheless he spent great part of his time in improving his mind by reading, as if he had been quite destitute of talents, and obliged to supply by study what nature had denied him. As he advanced in years his virtues became so conspicuous as to give no small jealousy to the tyrant then on the throne, who was well apprized that so shining a merit could not continue in the obscurity of a private life. And indeed Evagoras, after the death of his father, waited only for an opportunity of recovering the crown which was due to him by his birth. But in the mean time, one of the principal citizens, having murdered the tyrant, seized on it for himself, and being supported by the Persians put all to the sword who attempted to oppose him. On this occasion Evagoras was obliged to save himself by abandoning the island and retiring to the continent. Having spent some time at Soli in Cilicia, and hearing there that his countrymen were grievously oppressed by the new usurper, he resolved at all events to rescue them from the calamities they groaned under; and accordingly, being attended only by fifty followers, he passed over into Cyprus, and expelled the usurper, the Persians not being able to make head against the Cyprians, who joined him all to a man. Being thus, by his own valour and the affection of his subjects, restored to the throne of his ancestors, he soon rendered his small kingdom the most flourishing of the whole island. Artaxerxes, king of Persia, attempted to drive him out, and place anew on the throne the usurper, who was greatly attached to the Persians; but that prince being diverted by the Greek war, and finding Evagoras determined to hold out to the last, put off the enterprize to a more proper season. In the mean time, Conon by means of Ctesias the Cnidian, who was chief physician to Artaxerxes, made up all differences between Evagoras and that prince, the latter promising not to molest him in the possession of his small kingdom. Conon after his defeat at Ægospotamos had taken refuge with Evagoras, and being kindly entertained by him had ever after sought for all opportunities of requiting the favours, which he and his countrymen the Athenians had received at the king's hands in their distress. But Evagoras, who was every way qualified for great undertakings, could not content himself with the kingdom of Salamis alone. He extended his dominions, and by degrees made himself master almost of the whole island. The Amathusians, the Solians, and the Citians, alone of all those islanders, held out against him. These had recourse to the king of Persia, who, being alarmed at the rapid progress of Evagoras, promised them an immediate and powerful support, which, however, he could not afford them so soon as he expected, being employed elsewhere in more important affairs. But having at last concluded a peace with the Greeks, he bent all his force against Evagoras, being determined to drive him quite out of the island. The Athenians notwithstanding their alliance with the Persians, and the many favours they had lately received from the king of Persia, could not deny their assistance to Evagoras, who had befriended them on all occasions, especially after their overthrow at Ægospotamos. Having therefore with the utmost expedition equipped ten ships of war, they sent them under the command of Philocrates to his assistance. But a fleet which the Lacedæmonians had at sea, commanded by Teleutias the brother of Agésilas, falling in with them near the island of Rhodes, surrounded them so that not one ship could escape *. The Athenians, determined to assist their old ally at all adventures, sent Chabrias with another fleet and a considerable number of land-forces on board to join him. This new supply arrived safe, and in a short time the whole island was obliged to submit to Evagoras, which greatly redounded to the honour of Chabrias and the Athenian arms. But the Athenians being forced by a new treaty of peace, concluded between Artaxerxes and the states of Greece, to recal Chabrias, the Persians attacked with all their forces the island of Cyprus, not doubting but they should soon reduce it, since no new supplies could be sent thither from Greece. The Persian army consisted of three hundred thousand men, and the fleet of three hundred ships of war, besides a great number of transports. The land-forces were commanded by Orontes son-in-law to Artaxerxes, and the fleet by Gaus the son of Tamus. Tiribazus was commander in chief both of the sea and land-forces. Evagoras, seeing himself threatened with so dreadful a war, had recourse to all those princes, who were at enmity with the Persians, receiving supplies of men and money from the Egyptians, Libyans, Arabians, Tyrians, and other nations. Besides, as he was a wealthy prince, he hired a great many mercenaries of various nations, equipped a fleet of fourscore and ten galleys, and armed a great number of small vessels, which by intercepting the enemy's convoys reduced them, after they had landed in the island, to such straits, that they began to mutiny and killed several of their officers. But the whole Persian fleet putting to sea, the army was again plentifully supplied with provisions from the continent. At the same time Evagoras likewise received a great supply of corn and fifty ships from Egypt. Upon the arrival of the Egyptian squadron he resolved to attack the Persians at the same time by sea and land. His land-forces falling upon a great detachment of the Persian army put them to flight with great slaughter. But the sea-fight was not attended with the like success. At first he had the advantage, and took or sunk a great many of the enemy's ships. But the Persians, being animated by the example and warm remonstrances of Gaus their admiral, resumed courage, and returned to the charge with such vigour, that Evagoras, after a most obstinate resistance, was obliged to retire into the harbour of Salamis, where he was closely besieged both by sea and land. After this victory Tiribazus went in person to acquaint the king with the success that attended his arms in Cyprus, and having obtained two thousand talents for the use of the army, he returned with that new supply to carry on the war more vigorously than ever. During his absence, Evagoras, leaving the defence of the city to his son Pythagoras, got through the enemy's fleet, in the dead of the night with ten ships, and sailed for Egypt, in hopes of engaging Achoris king of that country to join him with all his forces. But not obtaining from him the aid he expected, and finding on his return the city reduced to the utmost extremity, he was obliged to capitulate. The terms offered him were, that he should abandon all the cities of Cyprus, except Salamis, and that he should hold this city of the king of Persia, as a servant of his lord, and pay an annual tribute. The extremity to which he was reduced, obliged him to comply with the first article, hard as it was ; but he could not by any means be brought to consent to the second, declaring, that he would hold his kingdom no otherwise than as a king under a king. Tiribazus, who commanded in chief, would not make the least alteration, nor abate any thing of his pretensions ; whereupon Evagoras, being determined to die sword in hand rather than to yield to such terms, broke off the conference, and applied himself entirely to the defence of the city <sup>w</sup>.

IN the mean time Orontes, who commanded the land-forces, not being able to brook the superiority which Tiribazus had over him, as being intrusted with the whole management of the war, and jealous of the success that attended him, wrote secretly to court, accusing him of holding a private correspondence with the Lacedæmonians, and spinning out the siege of Salamis, in order to bring about some change in the government with the assistance of Evagoras, a sworn enemy to the Persians. Upon the receipt of this letter, Artaxerxes immediately dispatched letters to Orontes, enjoining him to seize Tiribazus, and send him prisoner to court. Orontes, without delay, put the king's orders in execution, and was rewarded for his supposed zeal with the chief command of all the Persian forces in Cyprus ; but the army being greatly dissatisfied with the change, some left the service, and others refused to obey their new commander. This obliged Orontes to resume the negotiations of peace with Evagoras, and to conclude them upon the very terms which Tiribazus had rejected ; for he consented that Evagoras should hold Salamis as king of that city, paying only a small tribute to the king of Persia. Thus the siege was raised, and an end put to the war, after it had cost the Persians 50,000 talents, that is, near ten millions of our money <sup>x</sup>.

Niccles II. NOT long after the conclusion of this peace, Evagoras was murdered by one of his eunuchs, named Thrasidæus, and succeeded in the kingdom of Salamis by his son Niccles. Diodorus, confounding the name of his son who succeeded him with that of the eunuch by whom he was murdered, tells us, that he was treacherously put to death by the eunuch Niccles, and that, upon his death, the eunuch seized on the kingdom <sup>y</sup>. That he was murdered by an eunuch, we are told also by Aristotle<sup>a</sup>; but the eunuch's name was Thrasidæus, as we read in Theopompus, who adds, that Nicocles the son of Evagoras, upon the death of his father, took quiet possession of the kingdom of Salamis<sup>a</sup>. Nicocles celebrated the funeral of his father with the utmost pomp and magnificence. The discourse, intitled Evagoras, served for his funeral oration. It was composed by Isocrates, to inspire the young king with a desire of treading in the steps of his father. The same philosopher wrote two other orations addressed to Nicocles, whose name they still bear. In the first of these Isocrates shews the duty of a king to his subjects; and, in the second, the duty of subjects to their king. Nicocles rewarded the author with twenty talents, as Plutarch informs us in the life of that philosopher<sup>b</sup>. Nicocles seems to have reigned but a few years; for we find his son Evagoras in possession of the throne before the revolt of Cyprus, which happened in the very beginning of the reign of Ochus, who succeeded Artaxerxes Mnemon. It is surprizing that most authors should confound this Nicocles with another of the same name who reigned at Salamis in the time of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, and revolted from him to Antigonus. Nicocles, the son of that Evagoras, of whom we have spoke above, was succeeded by his son named also Evagoras, which has occasioned great confusion among those who have wrote of the affairs of Cyprus. Evagoras II. was, according to Evagoras the learned bishop Usher<sup>c</sup>, succeeded by his son Nicocles, and Nicocles again by his son Evagoras, who was driven out by his uncle Protagoras. While the latter was in possession of the throne, the Cyprians, being ill used by their Persian governors, attempted to shake off the yoke, by joining the Egyptians and Phœnicians, who had already revolted. Hereupon Ochus dispatched his orders to Idrieus king of Caria, enjoining him to invade the island of Cyprus, and make war upon the inhabitants. Idrieus, in compliance with his command, having equipped a fleet, sent it with eight thousand Greek mercenaries, under the conduct of Phocion the Athenian, and Evagoras, to make a descent in the island. This Evagoras was the son of Nicocles, as we have hinted above, and having been driven out by his uncle Protagoras, he gladly joined the Persians, in hopes of recovering his crown. His knowledge of the country, and the party he might still have in the island, made him a very proper person to command in this expedition. Cyprus had still nine kings, but subject and tributary to the king of Persia. They all joined in this confederacy, with a design to shake off the Persian yoke, and make themselves each independent in his own city. The troops under the command of Phocion and Evagoras landed in Cyprus without any opposition, and being reinforced with numerous bodies of volunteers from Syria and Cilicia, enticed hither with the hopes of enriching themselves with the spoils of so wealthy an island, they began with the siege of Salamis, which they invested by sea and land. But Protagoras making a vigorous defence, Ochus, who was entirely bent on the reduction of Egypt, compounded with him and the other Cyprian princes, redressing all their grievances, and confirming them in the government of their respective territories<sup>d</sup>. The greatest difficulty which Ochus met with in bringing about this accommodation, was the contenting of Evagoras, who laid claim to the kingdom of Salamis; but he being convicted before Ochus of having committed the most flagrant oppressions during his reign, Protagoras was confirmed in the kingdom of Salamis, and amends was made Evagoras, by conferring on him the government of another place; but he, being guilty there of the same misdemeanours, was obliged to save himself by flight into the island of Cyprus, where he was seized, and put to death by Protagoras.

falls to Antigonus, but taken from him by Ptolemy.

FROM this time, to the reign of Ptolemy, the first of that name who reigned in Egypt, we find no mention made of the Cyprian kings. They submitted, without all doubt, to Alexander, upon the same terms which had been granted them by the Persian monarchs, as Arrian seems to insinuate<sup>e</sup>. Upon the death of that conqueror, his generals divided the conquests he had made among them, in which division Cyprus fell to Antigonus. But while that prince was engaged in Asia Minor with Cassander, Ptolemy the son of Lagus, having invaded Cyprus with a powerful fleet, reduced most part of the island, and obliged the kings who reigned there to do him homage. Among these Nicocles, king of Paphos, being accused of holding underhand a correspondence with Antigonus, Ptolemy sent two of his intimate friends, Argaus and Pallistrates, into Cyprus, with instructions to dispatch Nicocles, lest, by his insinuations, the other princes should revolt and join Antigonus. These arriving in Cyprus, unexpectedly surrounded the house of Nicocles with a body of men sent them for that purpose by Menelaus, who commanded in Cyprus for

Ptolemy. Nicocles finding no means to escape, attempted first to clear himself of what was laid to his charge; but seeing no one hearkened to what he said, he drew his sword, and slew himself on the spot. Axiothea, his wife, hearing of her husband's death, first killed all her daughters, lest they should fall into the enemy's hands, and then laid violent hands on herself. The news of such a dreadful massacre so affected the brothers of Nicocles, that, retiring each of them to their own habitations, they set fire to their houses, and perished with their whole families in the flames<sup>f</sup>. This Nicocles is supposed to have been the last of the Teucrian family, and to have possessed not only the kingdom of Paphos, but that also of Salamis. Be that as it will, the kings of Cyprus from this time deserve rather the title of governors than kings, being subjects and mere vassals to the kings of Egypt.

Ptolemy had not been long in possession of Cyprus, when Demetrius Antigonus, bent upon the recovery of that rich and fruitful island, ordered his son Demetrius to transport thither what forces he could, in order to drive out Ptolemy's generals. Demetrius, in compliance with his father's commands, left Greece, where he then was, and sailed over into Caria, whence he sent ambassadors to Rhodes, inviting the Rhodians to join him against Ptolemy. But the Rhodians, refusing to comply with his request, and protesting that they would maintain a strict neutrality, he passed into Cilicia, highly dissatisfied with their conduct, and determined to make them feel in due time the effects of his resentment. In Cilicia he raised an army of fifteen thousand foot and four hundred horse, which he embarked on a great number of transports, and conveyed over into Cyprus, under the convoy of one hundred and sixty three ships of war. Being landed without the least opposition, he encamped near the shore, in the neighbourhood of Carpasia, where he drew his ships to land, and surrounded them with a deep ditch and a double rampart. Having thus secured his navy, he advanced first to the cities of Urania and Carpasia, which he took by storm, and then, leaving a sufficient guard to defend his trenches, he marched to Salamis, with a design to lay siege to that important place<sup>g</sup>. Menelaus, Ptolemy's brother, who was then in Salamis, upon intelligence of the enemy's approach, drew out of the neighbouring garisons a body of twelve thousand foot and eight hundred horse, with a design to divert him from besieging the city ; but Demetrius falling upon him, put his army to flight, and, pursuing him to the very gates of the city, took three thousand of his men prisoners, and killed about a thousand in the flight and the pursuit. The prisoners he treated with great humanity, and incorporated them among his own troops ; but finding they were ready on all occasions to abandon him, and fly over to Menelaus, he put them on board his transports, and sent them all to his father Antigonus <sup>h</sup>.

Menelaus being fully persuaded that Demetrius, elated with his success, would lay siege to Salamis, made the due preparations on his side for a vigorous defence, and at the same time dispatched three messengers to Ptolemy, acquainting him with the state of affairs in Cyprus, and soliciting him to send what succours he could with all possible expedition. In the mean time Demetrius, having viewed the situation and fortifications of the place, began to prepare the necessary engines for the reduction of it, which, he foresaw, would cost him dear, the garison being very numerous, and Menelaus resolved to hold out to the last extremity. Having sent for workmen out of Asia, and brought from thence a great quantity of iron, timber, and other materials, he made an immense number of warlike engines of an extraordinary bigness, and, amongst others, the famous Helepolis, of which we have spoke in the history of Rhodes. When the engines were ready, Demetrius began to batter the walls with such fury, that in a few days several breaches were opened ; but when he thought himself already master of the place, Menelaus found means to set fire to his engines, which was so violent, that, notwithstanding the endeavours of Demetrius's men to extinguish the flames, they consumed in a short time all the machines, together with the Helepolis, and the men that were in it. This obliged Demetrius to suspend his attacks ; and in the mean time Ptolemy, upon the intelligence he received of his brother's ill success in the action against Demetrius, set sail from Egypt with a fleet of an hundred and forty ships of war, and two hundred transports, carrying ten thousand men for the land-service. With this fleet he arrived at Citium, about two hundred furlongs from Salamis, and from thence dispatched messengers by land to Menelaus, desiring him to send the ships, which, to the number of sixty, were in the port of Salamis, to join the fleet. But Demetrius, foreseeing that Ptolemy's design was to venture an engagement by sea, had the precaution to leave ten of his ships in the mouth of the harbour, which was very narrow, to prevent Menelaus's Squadron from sailing out. The rest he drew up in line of battle, and having commanded the cavalry to keep near the sea-side, that they might be ready, in case of any misfortune, to assist those who should swim to land, he advanced towards the enemy with an hundred and eight sail. The two fleets engaged with the utmost fury and resolution; that of Demetrius, consisting mostly of Phœnicians, Samians, and Athenians, soon put Ptolemy's left wing in confusion, and drove most of the ships ashore. On the other hand, Ptolemy, who commanded in the right wing, gained the like advantage over the enemy's left, took several of their best gallies, and obliged the rest to save themselves by flight; but having pursued them too eagerly, he was attacked on his return, while his men were tired, by Demetrius, and, after an obstinate resistance, put to flight. Demetrius chased him with his ships in line of battle, and took seventy of his gallies, with all his transports, on board of which were all his provisions, arms, money, military engines, and eight thousand land-forces. After this overthrow Ptolemy returned to Egypt, with eight gallies only, the rest of his numerous fleet being either broken or destroyed. Upon his retreat the whole island of Cyprus, with all the forces, shipping, and magazines, which Ptolemy had there, fell into the hands of Demetrius. The prisoners at land amounted to about seventeen thousand men, besides the mariners taken on board the fleet. Menelaus the brother, and Lentius the son, of Ptolemy, were among the captives; but Demetrius sent them both home with their friends and dependants, without ransom, to requite the like kindness shewn him by Ptolemy after the battle of Gaza. All the rest he incorporated into his own forces, and thereby greatly reinforced both his fleet and army *.

Demetrius, immediately after this victory, dispatched Aristodemus the Milesian with the news of it to his father Antigonus. When he arrived at court, and was brought in to Antigonus, he stood silent for some time, keeping him in suspense, and then, as in a transport of joy, he uttered aloud these words, Prosperity and happiness to king Antigonus; we have overthrown king Ptolemy at sea; Cyprus is ours; we have taken sixteen thousand eight hundred men prisoners. Antigonus answered, Prosperity and happiness to thee too; nevertheless, because thou hast kept me so long in suspense, thou shalt in some degree be punished, and wait in thy turn for thy reward<sup>l</sup>. Antigonus was so elated with this victory, that thenceforth he assumed the title of king, and gave it likewise to his son Demetrius; which the Egyptians hearing of, honoured Ptolemy with the same title, that he might, though defeated, be upon the same level with the conqueror. This example was followed by Lyfimachus, Cassander, and Seleucus, who, from that time, in all their letters, orders, decrees, and other writings, stiled themselves kings.<sup>k</sup> Antigonus, and, after his death, Demetrius, held the island of Cyprus for the space of eleven years, at the end of which Ptolemy recovered it, while Demetrius was engaged against the Athenians and Lacedemonians. He equipped a numerous fleet, and, landing in Cyprus, over-ran the whole island before Demetrius had the least notice of his design. The city of Salamis alone held out some time against him, but was at length obliged to surrender, and open its gates to the conqueror. In this city he found the mother, wife, and children of Demetrius, whom he generously set at liberty, with all their friends and domestics, loading them with rich presents, and appointing a squadron of his best ships to convey them, with whatever belonged to them, into Greece, where Demetrius then was<sup>l</sup>.

FROM this time Cyprus, according to what we read in profane writers, continued subject to the kings of Egypt, till they were, with the utmost injustice, deprived of it by the Romans; but from the book of the Maccabees<sup>m</sup>, where Ptolemeus Macron and Nicanor are mentioned as governing that island under Antiochus Epiphanes, it is plain, that Cyprus was again, at least for some time, brought under subjection to the kings of Syria. Be that as it will, the seizing of it by the Romans is reckoned the most flagrant piece of injustice their republic was ever guilty of. We shall, in a few words, give a distinct account of this memorable event, which will for ever reflect ignominy and disgrace on the Roman name. Ptolemy Lathurus, king of Egypt, left two sons, who divided their father's dominions between them. One known by the name of Ptolemy Sultes, that is, the Flute-player, had for his share the kingdom of Egypt. The other called Ptolemy, without any surname, had the island of Cyprus. While the latter reigned in Cyprus, Publius Clodius, a young Roman nobleman, of a very bold and enterprizing genius, being taken by the pyrates on the coasts of Cilicia, sent to Ptolemy king of Cyprus, entreating him to send him a sum of money wherewithal to pay his ransom. As Ptolemy was a prince of a sordid and covetous temper, he sent him only two talents, which the pyrates despising, they chose rather to release him without ransom than to accept of so small a sum. Some years after Clodius being adopted by a plebeian, and chosen tribune of the people, he employed all his power and authority, which were very great, against the king of Cyprus, representing him as a most wicked man, and one who was unworthy to wear a crown. He was indeed a vicious prince, but what right had Rome to reform the manners of independent kings? However, as Ptolemy possessed immense riches, the people were easily prevailed upon to concur with the revengeful Clodius to his ruin, and pass a decree, declaring, that Ptolemy had forfeited his throne by his ill conduct, and that his dominions were fallen to the Roman people<sup>n</sup>. The senate did not oppose this unjust decree, for they had long sought for some pretence to strip that wealthy prince of his treasures, and the only shew of justice they could find for it was, that Alexander the late king of Egypt, dying at Tyre, had left the Roman people his heirs, and, that therefore the kingdom of Egypt, and with it Cyprus, which was then deemed a part of the kingdom of Egypt, had in virtue of that donation, passed to the Romans. This will had been insisted on at Rome soon after the death of Alexander, and motions had been there made for the seizing both of Egypt and Cyprus; but as they had some years before taken possession of Bithynia, by virtue of the will of Nicomedes, and of Cyrene and Libya, by the like will of Apion, and reduced them to Roman provinces, the senate thought it would bring them under the imputation of being too desirous of grasping all foreign dominions, should they, on this pretence, make themselves masters likewise of Egypt and Cyprus; wherefore, dropping at that time their claim to the deceased king's dominions, they only sent to Tyre, for the effects he had left there at his death<sup>o</sup>. But now this claim as to Cyprus was revived, and, to gratify the revenge of Clodius, and the insatiable avarice of the people of Rome, a decree passed for the seizing of Cyprus, tho' the king then on the throne had been declared a friend and ally of Rome, and had never done any thing to incur the displeasure of that haughty and imperious republic <sup>P</sup>.

THE decree for the dispossessing of Ptolemy being passed, Clodius's next care was to find out a proper person to put it in execution. Cato was then using his utmost endeavours to guard the republic against the attempts of Clodius; so that his presence was not at all agreeable to the factious tribune, who therefore resolved to get rid of so troublesome a censor, by sending him out of the way on this expedition. He paid him a visit, and acquainted him, that the people had honoured him with a commission, which was very reputable for him, and necessary for the good of the public. Vice reigns, said he, in Cyprus, and the throne is debased by it. Rome has therefore made choice of a man of spotless probity to establish virtue there. Go then, Cato, and make the purity of the Roman laws be revered in an island, which is infamous for its vices. Cato, who was well apprized of the snare, replied, That he could not leave his country, when it was threatened with far greater and nearer dangers. Well then, replied Clodius, I will compel you to do what you refuse to the request of your friends; and accordingly having assembled the comitia, he procured an order for Cato to set out without delay for Cyprus, and dethrone the king. Thus the virtuous Romans, by the most unjust, and iniquitous decree possible, ordered a friend and ally of theirs to be deprived of his dominions; and the rigid Cato had so little sense of justice as to obey and execute those wicked orders. The tribune, after the decree was passed, pressed Cato to depart immediately, but did not provide so much as a ship to carry him to Cyprus. He was commissioned to drive the king from his throne, but was not allowed either men or money to execute the enterprize, or even a guard to protect him against the insults of a provoked enemy. He therefore went on board the first ship he met with bound for Cyprus, and, being attended only with a few domestics, arrived at Rhodes, whence he sent one Canidius into Cyprus, charging him, to try whether he could prevail upon Ptolemy, by fair means, to give up his dominions to the republic. Canidius offered him, in Cato's name, the high-priesthood of Venus at Paphos, on the revenues of which he might have lived in a state of plenty and honour. This offer Ptolemy rejected; but, on the other hand, not having courage enough to engage in a war with Rome, he resolved to put an end to his life and reign at the same time. Accordingly having put his beloved treasures, which he had been accumulating for many years, on board one of his largest ships, he sailed out of the harbour, with a design to sink the vessel, and perish together with his riches; but when he came to the execution of his design, he could not find in his heart to destroy his treasure, tho' he persisted in the resolution of destroying himself; he therefore returned ashore, and having laid up all his wealth again in the treasury, poisoned himself, not being able to survive his disgrace, tho' he could not bear that his wealth should be lost. Upon the king's death, Cato, without opposition, took possession of the island in the name of the republic, and seized the treasures, which had been the chief cause of that unfortunate prince's ruin. They amounted to 7000 talents, that is, 1,356,250 l. Sterl. and were the next year carried to Rome by Cato, and lodged there in the public treasury<sup>9</sup>. This wicked and unjust proceeding of the Romans is generally ascribed to the tribune Clodius; but the senate was no less to blame than the tribune, for they not only approved of the decree, depriving Ptolemy of his kingdom, but conferred extraordinary honours upon Cato, for having put it in execution. Cato himself, notwithstanding his boasted virtue, shewed no more integrity on this occasion, than the wicked Clodius; for he not only accepted of that commission, but, after his return, gave a plain instance of his approving whatever had been done. As soon as Clodius ended his tribuneship, Cicero accused him before the senate, and endeavoured to persuade the fathers to annul all the laws he had made during his authority. But on this occasion Cato declared in favour of his greatest enemy, against his best friend, saying, that if the acts of Clodius were annulled, the treasures brought from Cyprus ought to be restored to the inhabitants of that island; and to prevent this, the virtuous Cato prevailed upon the senate to confirm such acts of Clodius, as regarded the deposing of the king, and the seizing of his moveable riches and dominions<sup>r</sup>.

The History of SAMOS.

Name.

THE name of Samos was in antient times common to three islands, viz. Cephalenia, Samothracia, and this which we are now to write of. Cephalenia had the name of Samos from its metropolis Sama, as Thucydides informs us <sup>f</sup>, and Samothracia from a colony of Samians, who, being driven out of their own island by their domestic tyrants, settled in that <sup>t</sup>. The island still known by the name of Samos was in former ages distinguished from the other two by the epithet of Ionian, being inhabited chiefly by the Iones, to whose confederacy it belonged. It had also the following names, Parthenia, according to Aristotle the most antient of all <sup>u</sup>, Dryusa, Anthemusa, Melamphyllus, Cyparissia, Parthenoarusa, Stephane <sup>w</sup>, Anthemus, and Parthenias <sup>x</sup>. Whence it had the name of Samos, which in process of time prevailed over all the rest, is uncertain: Some writers, quoted by Strabo <sup>y</sup>, are of opinion, that it was so called from the Sææ, a people of Thrace, who settled in the island; but Strabo himself seems to insinuate, that it borrowed this name from some hero, a native of the country. As this island is full of eminences and precipices, it is not unlikely, that the name of Samos was given it on that account, since the word Samos was used by the antient Greeks, as Constantine Porphyrogenitus informs us, to signify any high place or eminence.

Situation.

Samos lies between the continent of Asia, and the island of Icaria, being divided from the former by a streight, according to Strabo 875, but in reality above a thousand paces broad, and from the latter by another which is eight miles over. The streight, which parts Samos from the continent of Asia, is called by the Turks the little Bogazi, that word signifying in their language a canal or streight, and the other which separates it from the island of Icaria, the great Bogazi: As all the vessels, trading from Constantinople to Syria and Egypt, pass through one of these streights, the course by Mycone and Naxia being too long, they are still frequented by pyrates as they were in Strabo's time. In the middle of the little streight stands a rock, between which and the island of Samos lies the small island of Nartecis mentioned by Strabo<sup>a</sup>, who places it over-against the cape Posidium in Samos, famous for a stately temple built there by the Samians in honour of Neptune, whence it had the name of Posidium, or Neptune's cape. The island of Samos lies between the 38th and 39th degrees of north latitude, and is about eighty-seven miles in circumference.

THE metropolis of Samos, and the only city in the country mentioned by the antients, bore the same name as the island. It stood on the south coast, partly in the plain and partly on the hills, being divided into the upper and lower town. The former took up the hills about the present city of Cora, which is near three miles from the sea, and the latter the plain which extends from the present port of Tigani to the cape of Juno<sup>a</sup>. Strabo tells us, that this city was built by Tembrio and Procles, or, as some read it, Patrocles, who settled here with a colony of Ionians. But Vitruvius<sup>b</sup> is of opinion, that Samos and the twelve towns of the Ionian confederacy were all built by Ion the Athenian, who gave his name to the country of Ionian. The city of Samos was in the flourishing times of Greece very populous, wealthy, and well fortified. We may judge of the antient splendor and greatness of this city, from the ruins of it, which are still to be seen, and are fully described by a modern traveller<sup>c</sup>. Herodotus<sup>d</sup> takes notice of three things very remarkable at Samos; the first was a way opened through a mountain, seven furlongs in length, eight foot in height, and as many in breadth. A canal twenty cubits deep, and three foot broad was carried along the side of the aperture, and served to convey, through various pipes, the water of a plentiful spring into the city. Eupalinus of Megara, the son of Naustrophus, was the contriver and director of this work. A modern traveller is of opinion, that the spring, which tempted the Samians to undertake so great a work, was that which is still to be seen at Metelinous; for that spring is by far the best of the island, and the bored mountain stands between the small town of Metelinous and the ruins of antient Samos<sup>e</sup>. The entrance of the opening, which was carried quite through the mountain, is to be seen to this day, but the other parts have been long since filled up. The second thing, which Herodotus observed at Samos, was a mole or pier, a hundred and twenty foot high, which formed the harbour and advanced above two furlongs into the sea. Such an extraordinary work in those early times shews, that the Samians were among the first of the Greeks, who applied themselves to navigation; and indeed we find them employing Aminocles, the Corinthian, the ablest ship-builder of his time, near three hundred years before the Peloponnesian war <sup>f</sup>. The third thing, counted by Herodotus among the wonders of Samos, was the famous temple of Juno, the most spacious, as that historian affirms, which he ever saw <sup>g</sup>. The ruins of this edifice are still to be seen about half a mile from the sea, and the like distance from the river Imbrasus. A modern traveller gives us a distinct account of them, which it would be too long to insert here <sup>h</sup>. Menodorus the Samian, who wrote a treatise on the curiosities of that island, tells us, that this temple was built by Caricus, and certain nymphs <sup>i</sup>; for he supposes the island to have been first possessed by the Carians, so called, from Caricus their leader. Pausanias writes, that it was the work of the Argonauts, who brought from Argos to Samos a statue of the goddess, and placed it in a magnificent temple built by them in this island, which was in a peculiar manner sacred to Juno, who was supposed to have been born here on the banks of the river Imbrasus, under one of those trees which we call Agnus Castus. The stump of this tree was shewn, as the same author informs us, for many ages in the temple, and no less honoured than Juno herself <sup>k</sup>. The statue of the goddess, as the same Pausanias tells us, was the work of Smilis, a famous sculptor of Ægina, and contemporary with Dædalus. Clemenes Alexandrinus <sup>l</sup> speaks of this temple, as one of the most stately buildings of antiquity, and adds out of Æthilius, a very antient author, that the Samians at first worshipped only the stump of a tree, which was afterwards formed into a statue. The Tyrrhenian pirates, if we believe Menodotus <sup>m</sup>, having attempted to carry away this statue, and put it already on board one of their ships, were kept in the harbour with contrary winds till they carried it back to the temple; the fame of this pretended miracle drew crowds of votaries from all parts, and greatly increased the worship which was paid to the Samian Juno.

THE Heræan games which were instituted by the Greeks in honour of Juno, whom they called Here, were celebrated in this island with the utmost magnificence. The fabulous opinion, which prevailed in Samos, that Juno had lived there from her earliest infancy, till she became marriageable, and that Jupiter had married her there, gave rise to the solemnity which they annually celebrated in honour of that goddess. The Samians then renewed the nuptial rejoycings in her temple, where was amongst other statues one of this their tutelary goddess, under the figure of a new-married woman, to perpetuate the memory of her marriage with Jupiter. We have still remaining, in the antient monuments, several traces of the zealous worship the Samians paid to Juno. Most of the Samian medals are stamped with the figure of this goddess, holding a sceptre in her hand, to shew her dominion over the island, and have on the reverse a peacock her favourite bird. The temple of Juno, where the Heræan solemnities were performed, was one of the most antient of Greece, having been built, if we believe Herodotus<sup>n</sup>, by one Rhæcus the son of Phileus, a native of Samos, soon after the Ionians settled in the island. This antient temple was burnt down to the ground by the Persians, but soon after rebuilt, and so enriched with gifts that there was no room for statues and pictures<sup>o</sup>. Verres on his return from Asia, notwithstanding the miracle which had saved the goddess from the Tyrrhenians, did not scruple to rifle the temple, and strip it of all its rich immoveables, as appears from Tully, who upbraids him with this piety<sup>p</sup>. The pirates shewed no more respect to the goddess and her temple in Pompey's time. In a court adjoining to the temple was an immense number of statues, done by the most famous statuaries of Greece, and amongst others three of a colossean size, all on the same base, representing Jupiter, Minerva, and Hercules. They were the work of Myron, who made the brazen cow so much celebrated by the Greek wits of those days in their epigrams, which have been translated by Ausonius into Latin. Mark Anthony carried these three statues to Rome; but Augustus restored those of Minerva and Hercules to the Samians; that of Jupiter he kept at Rome, and placed it in a little temple which he caused to be built on the capitol. The amours of Jupiter and Juno were painted on the cieling of the temple, and represented so naturally, that Origen reproaches the gentiles with exposing them to the eyes of the multitude<sup>q</sup>.

THE fruitfulness of its soil is highly commended by the Soll. antients, namely by Strabo, who seems to prefer it in this respect to the most fertile countries in Asia. Here the trees, if we believe Æthlius as quoted by Athenæus,† yielded fruit twice a year†. Pliny takes notice of the pomgranates of Samos, some of which had red grains, others white†. The only thing which Strabo did not admire in Samos was the wine, which was but very indifferent in his time, though all the neighbouring islands were famous on account of their excellent wines.

Arts, &c.

THE Samians applied themselves very early to trade and navigation; for Herodotus speaks of them as trading to Egypt, Thera, and Spain, before any of the other Greeks, except Sostratus of Ægina, were acquainted with those countries. They are said by Pliny to have been the first contrivers of vessels fit for the transporting of cavalry†. Samos was in former ages famed for earthen ware, which, if we believe Gellius‡, was first made in this island, and in great request among the antients, who used the Samian earthen ware in their most splendid entertainments<sup>w</sup>. The earth about the present village of Bavonda is still deemed very proper for potter's ware; but no-body in the island now follows that profession, the inhabitants being supplied with that ware from Ancona and Scio.

THE island of Samos was first peopled, according to Strabo<sup>x</sup> and other antient writers, by the Carians, and afterwards by colonies from Ithaca and Cephalenia. Some ages after the Ionians, having seized part of Caria, passed over into the island of Samos, and settling there under the conduct of Tembrio and Procles, united the city of Samos to the Ionian confederacy. This happened, as Eusebius informs us<sup>y</sup>, in the twelfth year of the reign of Rehoboam king of Hierusalem. Heraclides<sup>z</sup> tells us, that this island lay desolate till the time of Macareus, the son of Æolus, who, having killed the wild beasts that infested it, settled there, and continued in possession of the island till the arrival of the Carians. But whoever were the first inhabitants, it is certain, that the city of Samos in after-ages held a considerable rank among the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy, being celebrated by the antients, as no-way inferior either to Miletus or Ephesus, which were the chief cities of the Ionians.

THE Samians were first governed by kings; for Herodotus<sup>a</sup> names one Amphicrates reigning at Samos; but how long this kind of government continued, or on what account it was abolished, is what we find no-where recorded. From the kings the administration passed into the hands of the Geomori, who formed a kind of senate and had much the same power as the ephori of Sparta. This form of government gave room to a democracy, and the democracy to an oligarchy. The Samians continued for many ages free from all foreign subjection, but were often reduced to a state of slavery by their domestic tyrants, as we shall relate in their history.

THE first enterprize of the Samians, mentioned in history, History of is their sailing to Egypt, and planting a colony there in the Samos. city of Oasis, which, as Herodotus informs us <sup>b</sup>, was inhabited by Samians of the Æschrionian tribe. But as to the time of this expedition we are quite in the dark, as also of their first voyage to Tartessus in Spain, which is related by Herodotus thus : A Samian vessel, bound homeward from Egypt, under the command of one Colæus, was by streis of weather driven into the harbour of Platea, an island of Libya. From thence Colæus set sail with a design to recover the coasts of Egypt, but had scarce left the island, when a violent easterly wind arising carried him, in spite of all his endeavours, beyond the pillars of Hercules, nor did it ever cease or abate till he arrived at Tartessus. As no foreign traders had ever before touched at that port, the inhabitants flocking to the shore bought their commodities at such prices as they were pleased to set upon them ; whence the profits they made were so considerable, that upon their return to Samos they made with the tenth part of their gain, amounting to six talents, a bason of brass, surrounded with the heads of griffins inclining to each other, and placed it in the temple of Juno, supported by three statues of brass in a kneeling posture seven foot high <sup>c</sup>. In the reign of their king Amphicrates they made war upon the inhabitants of Ægina ; but all we know of this expedition is, that it reduced both parties to great extremities <sup>d</sup>. This war happened before the reign of Cambyfes king of Persia, for in his time the Æginates, entering into an alliance with the Cretans, revenged themselves on the Samians for the evils they had suffered on this occasion, as we shall see anon. The Samians, as the same Herodotus informs us <sup>e</sup>, maintained their liberties both against Cræsus and Cyrus, after those princes had reduced the other Ionian states on the continent. They were expert mariners, and had a considerable fleet, which protected them against any foreign invasion. However, they were very early brought under subjection by their own tyrants. Among these we may reckon the Geomori, that is, the nobility of Samos, so called from their dividing the lands among themselves, after they had entirely suppressed the popular faction. During the usurpation of the Geomori, the inhabitants of Megara having attacked the city of Perinthus, which the Samians had built and peopled, a war was kindled between these two nations. The Geomori, who then governed with an absolute sway, commanded thirty ships of war to be equipped, and committed the management of the war to nine commanders, each of which had an equal power. These falling upon the Megarenses routed them with great slaughter, and took six hundred prisoners. Being elated with this victory they resolved to try whether they should be attended with the same success against their domestic enemies; for these commanders were all of the popular faction. Accordingly having armed the six hundred Megarenses, whom they had taken prisoners, on their return they attacked the Geomori while they were assembled in council, put most of them to the sword, and restored the democracy. Not long after a war breaking out between the Samians and Æolians, the former chose one Syloson to command their forces, who, as he was an ambitious man, instead of attacking the enemy, remained at Samos under various pretences, till such time, as he had gained both the officers and soldiers over to his party, and then made himself master of the city in the following manner. The Samians used annually to perform with great solemnity certain ceremonies in honour of Juno in the temple of that goddess, which stood without the walls of the city. As they were then ready to engage in a war, Syloson under pretence of piety prevailed upon the citizens to march all at once in procession from the market-place to the temple. This procession he led himself, but stealing away as soon as the crowd got into the temple, he returned to the city, and, by means of the soldiers he had left on board the fleet in the harbour, possessed himself of all the important posts; so that the citizens on their returning home were forced to submit to their new tyrant, having neither courage nor arms to oppose him <sup>g</sup>.

ABOUT this time the Samians, by disobliging the Corinthians, sowed the seeds of those animosities, which broke out between the two nations in the following age. The matter is thus related by Herodotus <sup>h</sup>: Periander tyrant of Corinth, to revenge the death of his son on the Corcyraeans, by whom he had been murdered, seized three hundred youths of the chief families of Corcyra, and put them on board certain Corinthian ships in order to send them to Sardis, where they were to be made eunuchs, and as such serve Alyattes king of Lydia. But the ships that transported them touching at Samos, the Samians advised the Corcyraean youths to take sanctuary in the temple of Diana, and would not suffer the Corinthians to remove them from thence, saying, that they were under the protection of the goddess. The Corinthians beset the temple in order to prevent any provisions from being conveyed to them, and by that means oblige them to abandon their asylum. But the Samians assembling their youth of both sexes, under colour of celebrating a festival in honour of Diana, ordered them to dance round the temple with cakes of flour and honey in their hands, to the end that the Corcyraeans might snatch them from them, and by that means sustain themselves. This practice they continued till the Corinthians, after having waited a long time, thought fit to leave the island; when the Samians, putting the youths of Corcyra on board their ships of war, conveyed them safe to their native country. This the Corinthians remembered, and many years after joined the Lacedemonians in the war which they made upon the Samians, as we shall relate in the sequel of this history.

THE Samians after the death of Syloson enjoyed their liberty for some time, but were again brought under subjection by one of their chief citizens named Æaces, of whom mention is made by Herodotus<sup>1</sup>. Æaces had three sons, Polycrates, Pantagnotus, and Syloson. Polycrates in his father's life-time formed a design of seizing on the government, but could not put it in execution till some years after his death, the Samians guarding themselves with great care against any attempts of that nature. However, he at length compassed his design in the following manner. As his father had left an immense treasure, he gained the affection of the populace by living in a most splendid and elegant manner. He made frequent entertainments, inviting to them even those of the lowest rank among the people. He provided at a vast expence the richest furniture that had ever been seen till his time in the island, and was ever willing to lend his silver and gold plate or stately beds to such as were to solemnize marriages or make entertainments. Being by this means become the darling of the people, he imparted his design of making himself absolute to his brothers, promising to share with them the island and such other acquisitions as he might make. They readily came into his measures ; whereupon it was agreed, that they should fall upon the people with a body of armed men, whom Polycrates had gained with large promises, while they were celebrating a feast in honour of Juno, and that Polycrates should at the same time possess himself of the city. The antients tell us, that Polycrates in this undertaking was assisted by fifteen men only, not venturing to admit others into the conspiracy for fear of being betrayed ; so universally did the love of liberty prevail among the Samians *. With this small body he made himself master of the most important places of the city, reduced the citadel called Astipalæa, and maintained himself in it against the utmost efforts of the Samians, till he was relieved by a body of Naxians, sent him by Lygdamis tyrant of Naxus. With this reinforcement he settled himself on the throne, after having either banished or put to death all those who had declared against him. Having thus got rid of his enemies, he amply rewarded his friends by conferring upon them the chief employments of his new kingdom ; he divided the island, pursuant to his promise, with his two brothers ; but soon after repenting of what he had done caused Pantagnotus to be put to death, and banished Syloson. By this means being master of the whole island, he began to entertain thoughts of enlarging his dominions, and that he might not be diverted by the king of Egypt, he entered into an alliance with Amasis, who then reigned there. The friendship between these two princes was cultivated with mutual presents : amongst others Amasis sent to Samos two statues of himself curiously carved in wood, which were still to be seen in the time of Herodotus, standing behind the gates of the temple of Juno. Having nothing to fear on the side of Egypt, which was then a powerful kingdom, he equipped a fleet of an hundred gallies, and putting on board a thousand chosen archers and other land-forces, he fell upon the neighbouring islands, being in all his enterprizes attended with such success, that he attacked no place without mastering it. He did not spare even his friends and allies, saying that they would be more obliged to him if he restored to them what he had taken, than if he had left them in the quiet possession of their lands and dominions. After he had reduced most of the islands he landed his forces on the continent of Asia, and made himself master of many cities on the coast ; insomuch, that ambassadors were sent to him from all the neighbouring states, offering to submit upon what terms he was pleased to impose.

The Lesbians alone opposed him, but were entirely defeated in a sea-fight, in which he took a great many prisoners, and condemning them all to the chain employed them in surrounding the city of Samos with a deep and wide ditch. When news was brought to Amasis of the success that attended him in all his expeditions, he is said to have wrote to him in the following terms. Amasis to Polycrates: I have heard with pleasure the fortunate successes that attend the enterprizes of a friend and ally. But the unusual greatness of your prosperity alarms me, being well apprised that the gods are envious. As for me, I would rather chuse that my affairs and those of my friends should be alternately attended with good and bad fortune through the whole course of my life, than be always accompanied with an uninterrupted felicity. For I do not remember to have ever heard of a man, who having been always happy did not at last perish by some signal calamity. Be advised therefore by me, and guard yourself against the bad consequences of good fortune in this manner: consider what you value most, and would be greatly concerned to lose, and of that, be it what it will, deprive yourself. If your prosperity still continues without any vicissitude, repeat the same remedy. Polycrates, having read the letter, approved of the advice given him by his friend, and after deliberating with himself what thing he would be most unwilling to part with, came at last to this resolution. He had a seal cut in an emerald, and set in gold by one Theodorus a Samian. This he valued above all his treasures, and therefore to counterbalance his good fortune, going on board a galley of fifty oars, and advancing far into the deep, in the presence of all those who attended him, he threw the emerald into the sea. He then commanded them to sail back, and on his return was greatly grieved for the loss of such an inestimable treasure. But a few days after a fisherman having taken a fish of an extraordinary size, and thinking it a present worthy of Polycrates, carried it to the palace. Polycrates was highly pleased with it, and, having invited the fisherman to dine with him, ordered it to be dressed that very day. When the servants opened the belly of the fish they found, to their great surprize, the emerald lodged there, and immediately carried it to Polycrates, who being persuaded, that such an extraordinary event could not be imputed to chance, but to a particular providence of the gods, acquainted Amasis with his throwing the signet into the sea, and the manner in which he had recovered it. Amasis, having read his letter, and not doubting but some great misfortune would soon or late befall him, immediately dispatched an herald to Samos, enjoining him to renounce in his name the friendship of Polycrates, and dissolve all the obligations of hospitality, that had been contracted between them; lest the calamities, which threatened Polycrates, should affect him with that grief which a friend owes to the misfortunes of a friend<sup>1</sup>.

Polycrates, being no longer under any engagements with the king of Egypt, sent ambassadors to Cambyfes king of Persia, enjoining them to conclude an alliance with that prince, and offer him what forces he required for the expedition he was meditating against Egypt. Cambyfes readily accepted of the offer made him by the ambassadors, and at the same time acquainted Polycrates that he stood in no need of land-forces, but wanted a fleet to convey his troops into Egypt. Hereupon Polycrates having equipped forty gallies sent them to Cambyfes, with all those Samians on board, whom he suspected of seditious designs, requesting him not to suffer them ever to return to their native country. Some writers affirm that these Samians never arrived in Egypt, but in their passage having called a council of war resolved not to proceed farther than the Carpathian sea. Others tell us, that they arrived in Egypt, but finding themselves there carefully watched by the Persians, laid hold of the first opportunity to make their escape, and on their return to Samos met the fleet of Polycrates, which they defeated, and landed safe in their own country, where they fought an unsuccessful battle at land, and afterwards set sail for Lacedæmon. Some writers say, that in this action too they carried the day; but this opinion, as Herodotus rightly observes, is quite groundless; for they would not have been obliged to implore the assistance of the Lacedæmonians, if they had found themselves in a condition to make head against the forces of the tyrant. Besides, it is very improbable, that one, who had a numerous army of mercenaries, and a chosen body of Samian bowmen in constant pay, should be overcome by so unequal a number as those were who returned from Egypt, especially if we consider, that Polycrates, as Herodotus informs us, to prevent any treachery had shut up the wives and children of all the Samians in the arsenal, resolving to burn them together with the naval stores, if he found himself betrayed to the exiles<sup>2</sup>.

THESE Samians, thus expelled by Polycrates, had recourse to the Lacedæmonians, by whom they were at first received but very indifferently ; for having made a long speech setting forth the calamities they had suffered, the Lacedæmonians gave them no other answer, than that they had forgot the first part of their speech, and therefore did not understand the last. The Samians being a second time admitted into the assembly brought with them an empty basket, and shewing it, only said, It is empty, signifying thereby that they wanted bread. The Lacedæmonians answered, that the basket alone sufficiently declared their wants, and immediately decreed to assist them. The Samian writers, quoted by Herodotus, tell us, that the Lacedæmonians undertook the defence of the exiles, in requital of the assistance they had formerly received from them in a war with the Messenians ; but the Lacedæmonians say, that they espoused their cause not out of any good will to the exiles, but to be revenged on the Samians for having formerly intercepted a curious bason, which they had sent as a present to Cræsus king of Lydia, and robbed them the year before of a rich present, which the king of Egypt had sent them. But whatever was the motive that prompted them to assist the banished Samians, they equipped a powerful fleet, and being joined by the Corinthians, whom the Samians had formerly disobliged as we have related above, set sail for Samos and laid siege to the capital of the island. Polycrates made a vigorous defence, and frequently sallying out cut great numbers of the aggressors in pieces. In one of these sallies the Samians being entirely routed were pursued with great slaughter to the very gates of their city, which the Lacedæmonians would have taken had they followed the example of their leaders Archias and Lycopes. For these two entered the city together with the flying Samians, and finding their retreat cut off, died valiantly fighting within the walls. The Lacedæmonians continued before the place for the space of forty days ; but finding they could not master it, raised the siege and returned to Lacedæmon. Some writers tell us that Polycrates, having agreed to pay them on their departure a large sum of money, caused a great many pieces of led to be coined and gilt, and with these purchased a peace, without lessening his treasures or enriching the enemy<sup>n</sup>.

AFTER their departure, those Samians, who had brought the war upon Polycrates, finding themselves abandoned, set sail for the island of Siphnus, which is one of the Cyclades. The affairs of the Siphnians were then in a flourishing condition, and their riches immense ; that island to be mining in mines of gold and silver, that the tenth of the money they coined being sent yearly to Delphos equalled the greatest treasure there ; for they divided once a year the riches which they drew from their mines, sending the tenth part of the whole as a present to Apollo. One year, after having made the usual offering, they consulted the oracle to know whether their prosperity should continue long and received this answer from the Pythian. When the public structures shall be cloathed in white, let the wise men beware of a wooden force and red embassadors. The prytanean court and porticoes at Siphnus were then adorned with white Parian marble ; and yet the Siphnians did not understand the meaning of the oracle even upon the landing of the Samians, though they sent immediately one of their ships, which according to the Samian fashion was painted red, with embassadors to the city of Siphnus. The Samians, being admitted to an audience, desired a loan of ten talents ; but receiving a denial returned to their companions and ravaged the territories of Siphnus. Whereupon the Siphnians drawing together all their forces engaged the Samians, but were defeated and many of them taken prisoners, for whose ransom the Samians received an hundred talents. With this supply they repaired their ships and sailed to Hermione, the inhabitants of which place, through fear of being treated by them as the Siphnians had been, gave them the island of Thyrea, situate near Peloponnesus, which they committed to the care of the Træzenians, and pursued their course to the island of Crete, where they founded the city of Cydonia, after having driven out of that part of the island the Zacynthians. They continued in this settlement five years, and built the temple of Dietyrna with several others, which were still standing in the time of our historian. But in the sixth year they were entirely defeated together with the Cretans in a sea-fight by the inhabitants of Ægina, who took off the prows of their ships and placed them in the temple of Minerva. Thus the Æginates revenged themselves on the Samians, for having formerly made war upon them without any provocation, under the conduct of their king Amphicrates, as we have hinted above *. The Samians, being driven from Crete, sailed, if we believe Eusebius †, to Italy, and there founded the city of Dicæarchia, called afterwards Putcoli, and at present Puzzoli.

BUT to return to Polycrates ; upon the departure of the Lacedæmonians and Samian exiles, he began to entertain thoughts of subduing all Ionia, together with the Asiatic islands, an enterprize, as Herodotus observes, which no one before him had ever attempted. He raised a numerous army, equipped the greatest fleet that had been seen in those seas till that time, and made all the other necessary preparations for so difficult an undertaking. But before he could accomplish his design, he was cut off by an untimely death, which is thus related by Herodotus. Oroetes a Persian, who had been appointed governor of Sardis by Cyrus, and another of the same nation, by name Mitrobates governor of Dascylium, falling one day out, Mitrobates upbraided Oroetes for not having reduced the island of Samos, which lay so near his government, and had been brought under subjection by Polycrates, with the assistance only of fifteen men. This reproach left a deep impression on the mind of Oroetes, who from that time watched all opportunities of being revenged, not on Mitrobates, who had affronted him, but on Polycrates, as the cause of the affront, though he had never seen him or been any ways injured by him. Other antient writers say, that Oroetes sent a messenger to Polycrates about some private affairs, and that Polycrates happening on the arrival of the messenger to be lying on a couch, Anacreon of Tees, the famous lyric poet, sitting by him, he did not condescend to give the messenger any answer, or even to look at him, continuing the whole time he delivered his message with his face towards the wall. This, they say, was what provoked the haughty Persian, and prompted him to put Polycrates treacherously to death. Oroetes resided at that time in the city of Magnesia, whence he sent one Myrsus the son of Gyges, a Lydian, to Samos, enjoining him to acquaint Polycrates, that he had heard what great things he had in view, but had been at the same time informed that he wanted money to put his projects in execution. Wherefore he designed to assist him with great treasures, provided he would engage to protect him against Cambyses, who was determined, according to the private intelligence he had received, to take away his life. The messenger was ordered to add, that if Polycrates questioned the truth of what he said concerning the treasures, he might easily satisfy himself in that particular, by sending one of the most trusty persons he had about him to see them. Polycrates received this proposal with joy, and immediately sent his secretary Mammas to take a view of the treasures. When Oroetes heard he was coming with this design, he caused eight chests to be filled with stones, which he covered with some pieces of gold, and by that means deceived Mammas, upon whose information Polycrates resolved to go in person to Oroetes, tho' he was earnestly dissuaded by his friends.

and, if we believe Herodotus, by the gods themselves (N). But he despising their advice set out with divers of his friends, among whom was Democedes the Crotonian, the most skilful physician of his time. When he arrived at Magnesia, the treacherous Oroetes caused him to be seized and crucified, a death, as Herodotus observes, unworthy of a man, who far excelled in all respects the greatest heroes of his age<sup>p</sup>. Valerius Maximus<sup>q</sup> and Tully<sup>r</sup> tell us, that he was crucified by Orontes, for so they call him, governor under Darius Hystaspes, upon the top of mount Mycale, which is a promontory of Ionia over-against Samos. But it is very plain from all the antients, that Darius was then only one of Cambyfes's guards, and that Polycrates came to this tragical end while Cambyfes was delirious in Egypt. Pliny<sup>s</sup> in this agrees with Herodotus; for according to him Polycrates was put to death in the 230th year of Rome, which, if we follow Varro, fell upon the sixty-fourth olympiad. Thus died Polycrates, a prince, who to the hour of his death had never felt the least shock of adverse fortune, being attended during the whole course of his life, in every thing he undertook, with all the success and prosperity he could have wished for. All the antients speak of his prosperity as miraculous, and amongst others Valerius Maximus, who tells us, that he never formed a design, which he did not with great ease put in execution, nor

(N) Herodotus tells us, that his daughter dreamt she saw her father elevated in the air, and anointed by the sun, and that, being deeply affected with her dream, she endeavoured by all means to divert him from his intended voyage, accompanying him even to the sea-side, and assuring him that nothing but misfortunes could attend his enterprize. But Polycrates rejecting all advice embarked on a galley of fifty oars, threatening his daughter, who left no stone unturned to prevent his journey, that if he returned safe, she should long continue unmarried. Upon his arrival at Magnesia being seized by Oroetes and crucified, the dream of his daughter, says Herodotus, was accomplished; for as he hung on the cross exposed to the rays of the sun, he was first all covered over with the sweat of his body, and afterwards, a violent shower happening to fall, washed, we may say, by Jupiter, who sent it (3). By the help of such distorted interpretations there is no dream, but what may be easily fulfilled.

earnestly wish for a thing which he did not obtain, as if fortune had been wholly employed in waiting upon him <sup>t</sup>. He was, without all doubt, a man of most extraordinary parts, and, if we believe Herodotus <sup>u</sup>, superior in wisdom, greatness of mind, and other princely qualities, to all the Greek tyrants, not even those of Syracuse excepted. He took great delight in the conversation of learned men, and used to spend great part of his time, when at leisure from public affairs, with Anacreon and Pythagoras. The former he once presented with five talents, and the latter he recommended in a very obliging manner to Amasis king of Egypt, when that philosopher undertook for his improvement a journey into that kingdom. He embellished the city of Samos with many magnificent and stately buildings, which, as Aristotle informs us <sup>w</sup>, were still standing in his time; nay great part of the palace, which he built for himself, was remaining in the time of the Roman emperors; for Caligula, as we read in Suetonius <sup>x</sup>, had some thoughts of repairing that noble fabric, which was a subject of admiration even in those days. As to his character there is no small disagreement among authors, some painting him as a cruel tyrant, and others representing him as a prince of great humanity and moderation. Diodorus Siculus <sup>y</sup> tells us, that he oppressed his own subjects in a most tyrannical manner, and with no less cruelty treated such strangers as happened to come into his country; which so shocked Amasis king of Egypt, that, after having advised him in vain to rule with more humanity and moderation, he at last renounced the friendship which he had contracted with him, saying, that he foresaw the miserable fall that would soon overtake one who governed so tyrannically. This, as we have seen above, is related in a very different manner by Herodotus, who seems to have entertained a far better opinion of Polycrates; for he commends him as a prince of great generosity, and speaking of his unhappy end says, that he was put to death in a manner unworthy of a man of his dignity and grandeur, and not to be mentioned without indignation <sup>z</sup>. But Diogenes Laertius, Porphyrius, Jamblichus, Gellius, and Eusebius seem to agree with Diodorus, for they are all unanimous in telling us, that Pythagoras (O) abandoned his native

(O) This celebrated philosopher was a native of Samos, and for some time a great favourite of Polycrates; but on his return from Egypt, native country, because he could not endure the tyranny of Polycrates.

Polycrates

Egypt, Phœnice, and Chaldæa, whither he had travelled for his improvement, not being able to endure the tyranny of Polycrates, he retired to that part of Italy, which was called Magna Græcia, and founded there a famous sect of philosophers. Most writers acknowledge him to be the inventor of arithmetic, which Plato (4) ascribes to the Egyptian Mercury, and some others to Palamedes (5). St. Austin (6) speaks of a goddess Numeria, whom the Pagans worshipped as the goddess of numbers, believing they had been first introduced by her. Pythagoras is said to have been the first who taught the immortality of the soul. As to the transmigration of souls, which was the principal part of his philosophy, some writers endeavour to excuse him, saying, that he meant only the sensitive soul or vital principle of the animal. We are told, he was never seen to weep or laugh. Diogenes Laertius, Porphyrus, Jamblichus, and others, who have wrote his life, greatly vary among themselves as to the particulars and circumstances of his death; some saying he was assassinated, others that he died suddenly, &c. He died, according to Eusebius (7), in the fourth year of the seventieth olympiad, and eightieth or ninetieth of his life. Cedrenus tells us, that he wrote an account of the war which Cyrus made upon the Samians, and relates from him that Cyrus was killed in this war. But that writer was certainly mistaken, since Plutarch, Lucian, and Porphyrus assure us, that Pythagoras resolved to leave nothing in writing. Josephus likewise (8) informs us, that in his time no one piece ascribed to this philosopher was allowed to be genuine; and Rufinus, in his answer to S. Hierom, who had quoted Pythagoras, urges, that there were no genuine writings of that philosopher remaining; to which Hierom replied, that what he had said of him was not meant of his writings, but of his opinions, which he had learnt from Cicero, Brutus, and Seneca. However, Diogenes Laertius in his life mentions three books written by him, namely of instruction, politics, and natural philosophy. The book of verses, which bears his name, and is a collection of the opinions and maxims of the Pythagorean philosophers, was not written by him, but by one Lysis, if we believe Laertius, a Pythagorean of Sarepta, who retired from Thebes, and was preceptor to Epaninondas. Others ascribe this book to Philolaus, some to Epicharmus, and some to Empedocles.

Pythagoras was not the only great man this island produced; Clearchus, Conon, Cacephylus, Pythagoras the statuary, &c. were natives of Samos, and are mentioned by Strabo and other ancient writers as the ornaments of the ages they lived in (9). Chærilus wrote in verse the actions of Xerxes and Darius kings of Persia, and of Archelaus king of Macedon. Josephus quotes some of his verses on the expedition of Xerxes into Greece, wherein he speaks of a nation serving under that prince come from Phænice using an unknown language, and dwelling on the mountains of Solyma near a great lake; which, in the opinion of Josephus, is plainly meant of the Jews, the mountains of Solyma and the lake of Asphaltites being in their country. Suidas and Strabo (10) cite other verses from the same poem, and Hesychius tells us, that the Athenians gave him a stater of gold for each verse of the poem he wrote on the victory obtained by the Greeks over Xerxes. Some writers have confounded Chærilus the Samian with another poet bearing the same name, who lived in the time of Alexander. The latter was a wretched writer, as appears from what Horace says of him in the following verses:

Gratus Alexandro regi Magno fuit ille Chærilus, incultis qui versibus & male natis

Retulit acceptos, regale numisma, Philippos (11). And elsewhere (12),

Sit Chærilus ille, Quem bis terque bonum cum risu miror, &c.

Chærilus the Samian lived before Alexander, and withdrew from Samos to the court of Archelaus, where he died. Some of his verses, which have been transmitted to us by Aristotle (13) and Tatian, shew that he was no contemptible poet.

Conon was a famous mathematician, and is said to have wrote seven books of astronomy. He lived in an intimate friendship with Archimedes, and taught him, as Pomponius Mela informs us, the first rudiments of mathematics. It was he who gave out, that the hair of Berenice, the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes, was taken up into heaven, and there transformed into seven stars called from thence Coma Berenices. He is mentioned by Strabo (14), Virgil (15), and others. Creophylus was an excellent poet, and contemporary with Homer, who presented him, as we read in Strabo (16), with a poem on the taking of the city of Oechalia. This poem is mentioned also by Pausanias (17) and Callimachus; but both these writers make Creophylus, and not Homer, the author of it. Creophylus entertain-pointed to govern during his absence. When Mæandrus heard of his death, he took the whole power into his own hands, Syloson the late king's brother being then in banishment. Mæandrus was a man of great probity, and therefore no sooner saw himself invested with the sovereign power, but he resolved to resign it, and restore his countrymen to their former liberty. Having therefore erected an altar to Jupiter the Deliverer, and marked out the ground for a temple, he summoned a general assembly of the citizens, and addressed them thus: "You know that I was entrusted " with the sceptre and all the power of Polycrates, and that " the government is wholly in my hands. But I will not " be guilty of a crime, which I should condemn in another.

 " The arbitrary power assumed by Polycrates over men equal " to himself was never approved of by me; neither shall I " ever approve of it in any other person. Now that the de" cree of the gods has been fulfilled in him, I surrender the " government into your hands, and proclaim an equal liberty " to all. Only I desire you would grant me six talents out " of the treasures of Polycrates, and confer upon me and " my descendants for ever the priesthood of the temple of " Jupiter the Deliverer, as a just reward of the benefits you " are to receive by my means." Having thus spoke, one Telearchus, a leading man among the Samians, bitterly inveighing against him, insisted upon his giving an account of the public money he had spent, during the short time he had governed. Mæandrus perceiving by the tenor of this speech that, if he divested himself of the power, he could be no longer safe in his own country, and that some other would soon usurp it, resolved to keep possession of the government; and accordingly retiring to the citadel, and sending for the citizens under colour of giving them an account of the public treasures, he seized their persons and kept them under close confinement to prevent insurrections in the city. In the mean time Mæandrus falling sick, his brother Lycaretus, imagining he could not recover, put all the prisoners to death, that he might with more ease usurp the sovereignty. But Mæandrus recovered and ruled quietly in Samos till he was driven out by the Persians, who placed Syloson, the brother of Polycrates, in his room. This event is

ed Homer in his house, and is said by some to have been his master, and to have had great share in the composing of the divine work, as Cicero styles it, which passes under the name of that inimitable poet. Hierophyle, one of the Sybils, was likewise a native of Samos, and is commonly known by the name of the Samian Sybil.

related by Herodotus <sup>a</sup> in the following manner. Syloson being banished by his brother, as we have related above, retired into Egypt, where Cambyfes was at that time making war upon Amasis king of that country. While he resided at Memphis, Darius, who was one of Cambyfes's guards and made then no great figure, was greatly taken with a scarlet cloak which Syloson wore, and asked him whether he would sell it. Syloson, perceiving him to be passionately fond of the garment, answered, that he would not part with it for any riches, but would willingly give it him, if he cared to receive it as a present. Darius accepted the offer, and Syloson, who was then but in very indifferent circumstances, thought himself a loser by his forward generosity. But when he heard that Darius, after the death of Cambyfes and destruction of the mages, was advanced to the throne, he hastened to Susa, and desired audience of the king, telling the guards that he had been a benefactor to him ; which when Darius heard, he answered with surprize ; What Grecian is this who pretends to have conferred benefits upon me, and to be respected on that account ? I have but lately taken possession of the kingdom, and have seen here few or none of that country ; neither can I remember that I am at all obliged to any Grecian. However, bring in the man that I may hear what he says from his own mouth. Syloson was immediately introduced, and asked by the interpreters who he was, and what he meant by saying that he had been a benefactor to the king. Then Syloson related what had passed in Egypt between Darius and himself, which the king remembering answered : O thou most generous man ! art thou then the person from whose hands I received that present, which though small in itself, yet at that time when I had no power, was of more value to me than any thing that can be offered me at present ? I will reward thee plentifully with gold and silver, that thou mayest not repent thy kindness to Darius the son of Hystaspes. Syloson replied, that he neither asked gold nor silver, but only that he would give his country, which ever since the death of his brother Polycrates had been possessed by one who had no claim to it. Give me, said he, Samos without blood, and without expelling my countrymen. Darius having heard his request, immediately sent an army under the conduct of Otanes, one of the seven, to Samos, ordering him to act agreeable to the directions of Syloson. Otanes arriving on the coast of Samos landed his forces without the least opposition. As they drew near the city,

Mæandrus with those of his party offered to depart the island under a promise of indemnity and protection. Otanes readily agreed to the proposal, and a truce was concluded on both sides. But in the mean time Charilaus, another brother of Mæandrus, who had been shut up in a dungeon for several crimes he was guilty of, having overheard what was doing, and from an aperture of his prison observed the Persians sitting before the castle without the least apprehension, demanded to speak with his brother. He was accordingly brought into his presence, when he began with most opprobrious and reviling language to stir him up against the Persians, calling him a coward for parting so tamely with a kingdom, and demanding leave to do for him what he had not courage enough to do for himself. He engaged, if he would but trust him with the command of his forces for a few days, not only to make the Persians repent their coming, but to drive them out of the island. Mæandrus accepted the offer, not that he imagined his troops able to cope with the Persians, but out of envy to Syloson, and in order to weaken the power of the Samians before he took possession of the island. For he knew, that the Persians would not fail to take a severe revenge on the Samians for the outrages they should suffer; and as for himself, he could make his escape out of the island when he pleased, having made a private passage under-ground, leading from the castle to the sea. Charilaus no sooner saw himself at the head of the troops, but sallying out of the citadel upon the Persians, who expected no hostilities, every thing having been already agreed on, he surprized and killed the chief men among them. But the rest of the army, taking the alarm, came in to their relief, and repulsed the Samians into the castle. Otanes, being provoked at the great loss he had sustained, commanded his army, notwithstanding the orders given him by Darius not to kill or take any Samian prisoner, to put all they met to the sword without distinction of sex or age. So that while one part of his forces was employed in besieging the castle, the rest were busied in plundering the houses and murdering the inhabitants, without sparing even such as had taken sanctuary in the temples. Mæandrus made his escape by sea, and fled to Lacedæmon, where soon after his arrival having commanded his slaves to take out and cleanse his gold and silver plate, he conducted Cleomenes, the son of Anaxandrides, then king of Sparta, to his house, hoping he might take a fancy to some of his rich moveables, and thereby give him an opportunity of gaining him over to his views. The king was greatly surprized at the workmanship of some cups,

cups, which Mæandrus perceiving pressed him to take whatever he pleased, and repeated his offer several times. But Cleomenes constantly refused to accept of any thing; and being afterwards informed that other citizens had received his presents, he went immediately to complain of him to the ephori, who, fearing lest he should introduce luxury among them, commanded him to depart Peloponnesus that very day <sup>b</sup>.

THE Persians, upon the flight of Mæandrus, put Samos, Syloson. plundered and depopulated as it was, into the hands of Syloson. Otanes, the Persian general, is said to have repeopled it upon a vision he saw in a dream, and a distemper with which he was seized. Syloson, seeing himself in possession of the island and supported by the Persians, oppressed his subjects to such a degree, that most of them, abandoning their native country, settled either in the neighbouring islands or on the continent, so that Samos became again almost quite destitute of inhabitants, the lands lying every-where untilled, and the whole country resembling a desert <sup>c</sup>.

Syloson after a short reign was succeeded by his son Æaces, Æaces. who attended Darius in his expedition into Scythia, and is counted by Herodotus among the Ionian tyrants, who had no small share in the esteem of Darius. Æaces being driven out, as well as the other tyrants of Ionia, by Aristagoras the Milesian, the Samians openly declared against Darius, and joined the other Ionians in the revolt. But when the two fleets, the Ionian consisting of three hundred and sixty three ships, and the Persian of six hundred, were ready to engage near Lade, a small island over-against Miletus, Æaces, who served on board the Persian fleet, sent a messenger to the Samians, exhorting them to abandon the confederacy, since they could not possibly prevail against the king, who, if that fleet were destroyed, could fit out another five times as powerful. The Samians hearkened to this message, and in the heat of the engagement hoisting sail abandoned their confederates, and returned with fifty ships to Samos. However, eleven of the Samian ships refused to obey their leaders, and together with the Chians fought till they were quite disabled. The commanders of these were rewarded by the community of Samos with an inscription on a pillar, declaring their names and families, in order to transmit their memory to posterity, and this monument was still standing in Herodotus's time <sup>d</sup>. The example of the Samians, who retired in the beginning of the fight, being followed by the Lesbians and all the confederates except the Chians, the Persians gained a complete victory, took Miletus, and were preparing to invade Samos, in order to replace Æaces, to whom they were chiefly indebted for their success, on the throne of Samos. But many of the Samians, chusing rather to abandon their country than to live in subjection to him and the Persians, set sail for Sicily, being invited thither by the Zanclæans, who were desirous to have in their territory a city inhabited by the Ionians, and had allotted for that purpose a place on the coast which faces the Tyrrhenian sea, and was then called the Beautiful Coast. Upon their arrival in Sicily they found the city of Zancle quite abandoned, the Zanclæans being with their king Scythes employed in the siege of a Sicilian city. Hereupon Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium and an enemy to the Zanclæans, insinuated to the Samians, that it would be more advantageous for them to seize on the city of Zancle in the absence of the inhabitants, than to settle on the coast designed for their establishment. The Samians were easily prevailed upon to follow his advice, which the Zanclæans understanding, hastened to recover their city, calling in to their assistance Hippocrates tyrant of Gela their ally. But Hippocrates, betraying his friends, agreed with the Samians to leave them in possession of the city, and deliver up to them the rest of the Zanclæans, provided they yielded to him one half of the slaves and of the plunder of the city, with all the booty that should be found in the country. Thus the Samians made themselves masters of one of the greatest and most beautiful cities of Sicily. As to the Zanclæans, they were either banished or reduced to slavery by Hippocrates, to whom they were delivered by the Samians pursuant to their agreement. Scythes their king was banished with his brother Pythogenes to Inycum, whence he made his escape to Himera, and there embarking passed over into Asia to Darius <sup>e</sup>.

In the mean time the Persians, after the reduction of Miletus, put over with their fleet to Samos, and reinstated Æaces in his former government, for the eminent service he had rendered them, by persuading his countrymen to abandon the rest of the Ionians in the engagement at Lade. Samos by this means was the only city, of all those which revolted from Darius, that escaped undestroyed. Æaces, being thus restored to his authority, continued faithful to the Persians, and served under Xerxes in his expedition against Greece, obliging the Samians, contrary to their inclinations, to assist the Persians with their navy against their countrymen. During the Grecian war Æaces died, and was succeeded by Theomestor, whom Xerxes raised to that dignity for his courageous behaviour in the sea-fight at Salamis, on which occasion he took several of the Greek ships, and distinguished himself in a most eminent manner; as also did Phylacus another Samian, who was not only admitted into the number of those, who from deserving well of the king were called by the Persians Orosanges, but rewarded with large possessions and great wealth <sup>f</sup>.

THE Samians continued thus subject to the Persians and their own tyrants, who were but mere tools of the Persian kings, till the famous victory gained by the Greeks at Mycale; when they were restored to the full enjoyment of their antient liberties. Before this engagement, while the Grecian fleet was anchored at Delos, under the command of Leotychides the Lacedæmonian, the Samians, without being suspected either by the Persians or their own tyrant Theomestor, sent three of their chief citizens, Lampon, Athenagoras, and Hegesistratus, to assure the commanders of the Greek navy, that the Ionians would not fail to revolt from the Persians as soon as their fleet appeared. Hegesistratus, who spoke for the rest, added, that if they entertained the least suspicion of their sincerity, they were all three ready to remain with them as hostages. Leotychides after hearing him had the curiosity to ask his name, and understanding that he was called Hegesistratus, which in Greek signifies leader of an army, he resolved forthwith to set sail and attack the Persian fleet which lay then off of Samos. Having therefore obliged the three Samian ambassadors to confirm with an oath the truth of what they had said, he retained Hegesistratus, taking his name for a preface of success, and suffered the other two to return home. The next day Leotychides, having offered a solemn sacrifice to the gods, put to sea, and standing towards Samos came to an anchor near the temple of Juno. But the Persians, being informed of their approach, made towards the continent, and hawling their ships ashore fled to their land-forces, which were encamped at Mycale to the number of sixty thousand men. In the mean time the Persian generals caused all the Samians to be disarmed, fearing they were disposed to favour the enemy, because they had already redeemed all the Athenians taken in Attica by the forces of Xerxes, brought them to Samos, and thence sent them back to Athens furnished with provisions for their voyage. The Samians, though thus disarmed in the very beginning of the engagement, revolted to the Greeks, and assisted them in the best manner they could. Their example was immediately followed by the rest of the Ionians, who abandoning the Persians joined their countrymen, and greatly contributed to that victory which put an end to the designs of Xerxes upon Greece<sup>8</sup>.

Athenians. transplanted into Greece, would no longer look upon Athens
 as their mother city, engaged to protect them on all occasions against the common enemy. Wherefore, having obliged the Samians, Chians, Lesbians, and other islanders, who had revolted to them from the Persians, to swear that they would continue in their alliance, they set sail together with them for the Hellepont, to pursue the war on that side against the Persians.

The Sa- THE Samians, being thus delivered from the Persian

volt from for the space of thirty seven years, governing themselves en-

nians. their antient liberties. But in the sixth year of the thirty years peace concluded between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, they revolted from the Athenians on the following occasion. The Milesians and Samians falling out about the city of Priene in Caria, to which both parties laid claim, the former not finding themselves in a condition to maintain a war against the Samians, gained over such of them as desired to alter the form of government, and with them repaired to Athens, where they complained of the injuries they had suffered from the republic of Samos, which had driven them by force from a city, which they had as good a right to as themselves. Hereupon the Athenians sent messengers into Samos, requiring the Samians to forbear all hostilities, and refer their differences to their arbitration; which they refusing to do, by reason they apprehended the Athenians more favourable to the Milesians than to them, Pericles prevailed upon his republic to declare war against Samos, not out of any motive of justice, but to gratify the famous courtesan Aspasia, who was the daughter of Axiochus a Milesian, and greatly beloved by Pericles, not so much on account of her beauty as of her wit. The management of this war was committed to Pericles himself, who, having equipped a squadron of forty galleys, set sail for Samos, laid siege to the city, and reduced it without any considerable loss. He no sooner saw himself master of the place, but he changed the aristocracy into a democratical kind of government, and having imposed a fine of eighty talents on the inhabitants, and received fifty Samian youths for hostages, he committed them to the care of the Lemnians, and returned to Athens. He was scarce gone, when such of the Samians as disliked the popular government, entering into an association, sent deputies over into Asia to Pessuthnes, or, as Diodorus calls him, Pessuthines, the son of Hystaspes, and governor of Sardis, soliciting him to send them succours against the Athenians, the antient enemies of Persia. Pessuthnes hoping, by means of these troubles and domestic broils, to bring Samos under his power, lent them a body of seven hundred men. With these the Samian deputies setting sail from Asia in the dead of the night, with the assistance of their friends in the island, surprized the city, and, having seized on the heads of the popular faction, and taken the Athenians, who were there in garison, prisoners, sent them all as a present to Pessuthnes. Having thus demolished the democracy established by Pericles, they passed over into the island of Lesbos, rescued their hostages, and then proclaimed war against the Athenians. When news of this revolt was brought to Athens, Pericles was again dispatched to Samos with sixty sail well manned, in order to reduce the revolters. Pericles arriving on the coast of Asia, detached sixteen ships of his squadron to observe the motions of the Phœnicians, whom Pessuthnes had sent to join the Samians, and to bring in succours from Chios and Lesbos; which when the Samians heard, they immediately recalled twenty ships, which they had sent to attack Miletus, and, joining to them fifty more, went to meet Pericles, who with forty four ships entirely defeated their fleet consisting of seventy. Soon after this victory the Athenian squadron being reinforced with forty sail from Athens, and twenty five from Chios and Lesbos, Pericles landed his men in the island of Samos, overthrew the Samians in a pitched battle, and laid siege to their metropolis, inclosing it with a triple wall on the land side, and blocking it up by sea with his fleet. But in the mean time Pericles receiving intelligence, by letters from Caria and Caunus, that the Phœnician fleet was advancing to the relief of the besieged city, and that Stesagoras the Samian admiral, had already joined them with a squadron under his command, charged his colleagues to pursue with all possible vigour the siege, while he, with threescore sail, went out in quest of the enemy. The Samians, taking advantage of his absence, made a sally at the instigation, and under the conduct, of one Melissus the son of Ithogenes, routed the Athenians, possessed themselves of their camp, and obliged them to retire from before the city. Being elated with this success, they attacked the enemies fleet, which blocked up the harbour, sunk many of their ships, and forced the others to shelter themselves in the neighbouring islands. But Pericles, receiving notice of this overthrow, returned with all possible expedition, and being reinforced with forty ships from Athens under the command of Thucydides, Agnon, and Phormio, and soon after with twenty more commanded by Tlepolemus and Anticles, and moreover with forty from Chios and Lesbos, he attacked Melissus, and defeated the Samians both by sea and land, began the siege with new vigour, and brought the citizens into great distress. The town was battered both day and night without intermission; but the Samians, though quite tired out with frequent assaults on all sides, and reduced to the utmost distress for want of provisions, yet sustained the siege for the space of nine months, without once offering to capitulate. On this occasion the battering rams, scorpions, and galleries are said to have been first invented by one Artemon of Clazomenæ, whom Ephorus the historian confounds with Artemon Periphrusus, mentioned by Anacreon, as quoted by Athenæus<sup>b</sup>. The Samians at length, seeing they had no hopes of relief, and that their walls were in great part ruined, surrendered. The only terms they could obtain were the following, viz. that they should demolish their walls, give hostages for their fidelity in time to come, deliver up their navy, and pay the charges of the war. The Byzantines, who had joined the Samians in this war, submitted at the same time to the Athenians. Thus Pericles, having put to death the authors of the revolt, and re-established the democracy, returned to Athens<sup>c</sup>. This war happened, according to Thucydides, in the sixth of the thirty years truce between the Athenians and Lacedemonians; but Diodorus Siculus places it in the fourth year of the eighty fourth olympiad, that is, after the said truce was expired.

FROM this time the Samians continued subject to the Athenians till the twentieth year of the Peloponnesian war, when the common people of Samos taking up arms against the nobility, who had again usurped all the power, slew two hundred of them, banished the rest, and divided their lands and houses among themselves. This so pleased the Athenians, at whose instigation the people had revolted, that they restored to them all their antient privileges, and allowed them to govern their republic according to their own laws. The ensuing year, when the government of the four hundred was set up at Athens, the great men among the Samians, to the number of three hundred, formed a new conspiracy against the democracy, and being assisted by Pisander, and other Athenians, who favoured the oligarchy, they attempted to make themselves masters of the city, with a design to murder all those who were for the popular faction. But the people, having timely notice of their design, and being supported by Leon, Diomedon, Thrasybulus, and other Athenians, who were then in Samos, and professed enemies to the oligarchy, repulsed them, and having killed about thirty of the three hundred conspirators, obliged the rest to submit to the democracy. In this state the island of Samos continued long subject to the Athenians, and was resorted to by such of them as could not endure the tyranny of the four hundred usurpers. When Athens was besieged and taken by Lyfander the Lacedæmonian admiral, after his famous victory at Ægos-potamos, the island of Samos was also reduced by the conqueror, who abolished the popular government, and put the whole power into the hands of ten men, who from their number were called the Deciachæ. This form of government continued for the space of near ten years, till the Athenians, having regained the sovereignty of the seas by their signal victory over the Lacedæmonians at Cnidus, restored the democracy, and took anew possession of the island. But soon after the Samians, revolting from Athens, entered into a confederacy with the Lacedæmonians; but being in the mean time attacked by Tigranes, one of the Persian governors of the Lesser Asia, and by him brought under subjection to the king of Persia, they had recourse to the Athenians their antient allies, who immediately sent Timotheus to their assistance. Timotheus, landing his men in the island, laid siege to the city, and, in a few days, obliged the Persians, who held it, to capitulate, and leave the Samians in the full possession of their antient liberties*. From this time the island of Samos continued faithful to the Athenians till they were reduced by the Romans, who obliged the Samians, and others islanders, to pay a year ly tribute to Rome. But in the Roman times the Samians were a very inconsiderable people, and had quite degenerated from the valour of their ancestors. Not being able to defend themselves, they were an easy prey to the princes of Macedon, Syria, and Pergamus. They became subject to Rome upon the death of Eumenes the last king of Pergamus, who bequeathed, as the Romans, pretended, his dominions to their republic. Augustus restored them, for what service we know not, to their former liberty, suffering them to live according to their own laws, in the same manner as they had done during their alliance with Athens. By this indulgence the island, which had come into the hands of the Romans in a mean condition, began to flourish again, and, in a short time, became so populous, that many of the inhabitants were obliged to abandon their country, which could not maintain such multitudes, and settle in the neighbouring island of Icaria, which was then but thinly inhabited<sup>l</sup>. In this happy state they continued till the reign of Vespasian, who reduced Samos, with the other Greek islands, to a Roman province<sup>m</sup>.

The history of the other Greek ISLANDS.

BESIDES the Greek islands we have already described, there are many others, which if we dismissed this subject without taking some notice of, as they make no small figure in the antient history of Greece, we should after all look upon ours as maimed and imperfect. These lie partly in the Ægean and Icarian, and partly in the Cretan, Myrtoan, and Ionian, seas, or in the Propontis; whence we shall, with Strabo<sup>n</sup>, begin our account of them, describing first such as are on the coast of Asia, and therefore reckoned by all geographers among the Asiatic islands. In the Propontis, now the Sea of Marmora (P), the following islands are taken notice

(P) The Propontis, so called according to Suidas, because it lies before the Pontus, and is, as it were, an inlet into that sea, extends from the Hellepont to the Bosphorus Thracius, and is about three hundred miles in compass, being confined on the north by Thrace, and on the south by the kingdom of Pontus. It is now called by the was antiently known likewise by the name of Elapbonnesus, Proconne; that is, the island of stags •, it being particularly remarkable, sus.

 as the scholiast of Apollonius observes, for the vast number of stags with which it was stocked. Pliny <sup>p</sup>, Strabo <sup>q</sup>, and Vi- truvius <sup>r</sup>, greatly commend the marble quarries of Proconne- sus, and tell us, that the stately palace of Mausolus at Hali- carnassus was lined with this marble, which, according to Vitruvius, received a brighter polish than any other. Hence Constantine the Great, if we believe Zosimus <sup>t</sup>, made use of the Proconnesian marble only, in embellishing the public structures of his new city. Ptolemy places this island on the coast of Thrace, wherein he contradicts all the antient geographers who speak of it as lying on the coast of Asia over-against Cy- zicum; whence the Proconnesian marble, as Pliny observes, is often from that city called Cyzican <sup>u</sup> (Q).

(Q) Stephanus and Scylan speak of Proconnesus and Elapbonnesus as two different islands, and tell us, that in the former were an-tiently two cities, both bearing the name of the island, and distinguished by the epithets of the New and the Old Proconnesus; the first, say they, was built by the Milesians, and the other by the inhabitants of the island. Aristæas and Bion were both natives of Proconnesus. Aristæas was born, according to Suidas, in the fiftieth olympiad, and lived in the reigns of Cyrus and Cræsus. He was the son of Democharis, or, as others will have it, of Caustrobius.
 He wrote a Theogony in prose, and the history of the Arimaspians, an Hyperborean people, in verse. This poem, as Suidas informs us, was comprised in three books. He is quoted by Herodotus in the following words (18). Aristæas, a poet of Proconnesus, and son to Caustrobius, says in his verses, “ that he was transported by Apollo “ into the territories of the Iffedonians; beyond whom the Ari- “ maspians dwell, who are a people having but one eye; that the " next region abounds with griffins, which guard the gold of the " country; and that the Hyperboreans are situate beyond them,

 " their country bordering on the sea; that all these nations, ex-

 " the Arimaspians, the Scythians by the Iffedonians, and the Cim-
 " merians, inhabiting the coasts of the south sea, by the Scythi-
 " ans." Our historian adds, that Aristæas was in no respect inferior to any of his fellow-citizens, and that entering one day into a fuller's shop, he there died suddenly. Hereupon the fuller, having shut his door, went to acquaint the relations of the deceased with what had happened. The news of his death being spread over the city, a certain Cyzicenean, arriving from Artace, disputed the truth of the report, affirming that he had met him, and conversed with him in his way to Cyzicus. While he obstinately persisted in maintaining his assertion, the relations of Aristæas came with all things necessary for removing the body; but could not find Aristæas either alive or dead. Seven years after he appeared again in Pro- connesus, composed those verses which are by the Greeks called Arimaspians, and then disappeared a second time. Herodotus adds, that three hundred and forty years after this second disappearing of Aristæas, he shewed himself anew in the city of the Metapon- tins, exhorting them to erect an altar to Apollo, and a statue by the altar, which should bear the name of Aristæas the Proconnesian; he told them on that occasion, that they were the only nation of the Italian coast that had ever been favoured with the presence of Apollo, and that he himself attended the god in the shape of a raven. Having pronounced these words, he vanished; and the Metapontins, going to consult the oracle of Delphos concerning the apparition, were admonished by the Pythian to do as they had been directed, if they desired their affairs to prosper. In pursuance therefore of this oracle they erected an altar to Apollo, and near it a statue to Aristæas, which were still remaining in our historian's time (19). The same story is related by Pliny (20), A- pollonius (21), Maximus Tyrius (22), Origenes (23), Hesychius (24), and Tzetzes (25), Strabo, Tatian, and Pausanias likewise mention this author. Longinus, in his treatise of the Sublime, quotes some of his verses, as does also Julius Pollux. Gellius ranks him among which, being first joined to the continent, were separated from it by the violence of the seas or earthquakes. The others, to which he supposes the same misfortune to have happened, are Sicily, Cyprus, and Eubœa, the first having been separated, according to him, from Italy, the second from Syria, and the last from Bœotia. The other islands in the Propontis are of no note, and therefore leaving them, since we know nothing of them but their bare names, we shall proceed to the Ægean sea (R), describing such islands as lie on the coast of Asia, and make any figure in history.

the writers of extraordinary events and fables (26), and Pliny cites him to prove, that the Arimaspians, who had but one eye, were continually at war with a kind of wild beasts called Griffins, that guarded the gold, which the Arimaspians dug out of the mines (27). All these relations are fabulous, and therefore, in the opinion of Dionysius Halicarnassæus, the poem, entitled Arimaspians, was a spurious piece falsely ascribed to Aristæas. Tatian tells us, that Aristæas flourished before Homer; but Strabo will have him to be that poet's master.

Bion was contemporary with Phercydes, who flourished about the fiftieth olympiad. He copied the titles, and abridged the works, of Cadmus the Milesian, as Clemens Alexandrinus informs us (28). The same author quotes several of his apothegms. Cadmus, whose works Bion is said to have abridged, was the first who wrote a history in prose (29), and is commonly believed to have lived before the Trojan war. Strabo mentions this Cadmus (whom we must distinguish from another Cadmus, a Milesian also, but of a much later date) and says, that he, Phercydes, and Hecatæus, were the first three writers in prose (30).

(R) The Ægean sea, now the Archipelago, is that sea which separates Europe from Asia, washing on one side Greece and Macedon, and on the other Caria, Ionia, and Phrygia. There is a great variance among authors about the etymology of its name. Pliny will have it to be so called from Ægis an island, or rather a rock, sacred to Neptune, and lying between the islands of Tenos and Cbios (31). Solinus, and the scholiast of Apollonius, agree with Pliny. The island of Ægis borrowed its name, according to the same Pliny (32), from the Greek word Aix, signifying a goat, which that island, at some distance, resembles. Festus offers three different opinions; the Ægean sea, says he, was so named either from its islands, which, lying scattered up and down, look at a distance like so many goats, or from Ægea queen of the Amazons, who was drowned in it, or because Ægeus, the father of Theseus, appre-

The islands of the Ægean sea on the coast of Asia. THE antient geographers reckon fifty three islands from Tenedos to Crete, and comprehend them all under two general denominations. Those which form a circle round Delos, a little island revered by the antients for being reputed the birth-place of Apollo and Diana, they call the Cyclades from the Greek word cyclos, signifying a circle; such as are at a greater distance from Delos they call Sporades from the Greek word Spairo, importing to scatter or sow, these islands being scattered up and down the Ægean sea. To begin with the Sporades on the coast of Asia, Pliny w mentions the following islands at the mouth of the Hellespont over against the country of Troas, viz. the Ascanian islands, so called, according to some, from Ascanius the son of Æneas, according to others, from Askenaz, one of Gomer's sons, the islands of Plataea, Lamia, Plitania, Plate, Scopelos, Gethone, Arthedon, Cæla, Lagussa, and Didymæ. These islands are very small, and therefore scarce taken notice of by other geogra-hending his son had been devoured by the Minotaur, threw himself out of grief into the sea, and perished. Strabo (33) derives it from a city of Eubæa called Æga; Statius from Ægeon, one of the giants that warred against Jupiter, and was by Neptune, who overcame him, chained to a rock in this sea; and Nicocrates from Ægeus, a name antiently given to Neptune. Bochart recurs, according to his custom, to the Phœnician language, and forms the name of Ægeum, from the word Az, signifying among the Phœnicians, wild, cruel, and violent, which he pretends to have been given to this sea by the Phœnicians, who first inhabited the islands, by reason it is subject to frequent storms, which, among so many rocks and islands, prove very dangerous (34). The Icarian, Carpathian, and Cretan seas, so called from the islands they wash, and also the Myrtoan, are but parts of the Ægean sea taken in its full extent. The Myrtoan lies, according to Strabo (35), Pliny (36), and Pausanias (37), &c. between Crete, Peloponnesus, Attica, and Eubæa, and not on the side of Asia, as Ptolemy (38) would have it. That author places Miletus, Jassus, Myndus, and the other maritime cities of Caria on the Myrtoan sea, wherein he contradicts all the antient geographers as well as historians. This sea borrowed its name either from an island called Myrtus, as Pliny informs us (39), or from Myrtilus the son of Mercury, or a nymph named Myrton, as Pausanias insinuates (40). The Ægean is now called the Archipelago, from the Greek words ἀρχὸς chief, and πῆλαγος the sea, it being the chief and greatest sea in those parts.

phers or historians. Near them lies the island of Tenedos about two leagues from the shore. Behind this island the Greeks, as is well known, feigning to return into their own country, lay concealed till their plot against Troy took effect. But as we have already given an account of this island *, we shall only add here, that the learned Bochart derives the name of Tenedos from the Phœnician word Tin-edum, signifying red clay, which was found here, and in great request for the making of earthen ware †.

Lesbos, one of the most considerable islands of the Ægean sea or Archipelago, was antiently called Pelasgia, from the Pelasgi, by whom it was supposed to have been first peopled; Macaria, from Macareus the grandson of Jupiter, who settled here; Lesbos, from the son-in-law and successor of Macareus, who bore that name, &c. It is, according to Strabo ‡, sixty-two, according to Pliny, fifty-six, miles distant from Tenedos, divided from the continent of Asia by a streight seven miles and a half over, in length seventy miles, and an hundred and sixty-eight in compass. All the antient historians, geographers, and others, who speak of the greater islands in the Mediterranean and Ægean seas, constantly reckon Lesbos in the seventh place, tho' no two of them agree in the disposing of the rest. This Bochart, who, if we may be allowed to use the common saying, sees farther into a mill-stone than any other, surmised to be mysterious; and accordingly, with the help of his Phœnician etymologicon, found out, that the island of Lesbos was without change put in the seventh place, because its name was derived from the Phœnician word Esbuith, signifying seven. But to derive Lesbos from Esbuith requires several alterations, and withal a greater stock of anagrammatical wit than is fallen to every body's share. This island had in former times, if we believe Pliny §, eight cities of note; Herodotus ¶ speaks of six, but Pomponius Mela and Scylax name only five; the former leaves out Methymna, and the latter Arisba. These cities were, Arisba, which was quite ruined by an earthquake; Pyrrha, seated on the western coast of the island towards Greece, and distant from Mitylene, which stands on the other sea, eighty furlongs. This city under went the same fate as Arisba, and also the cities of Hiera and Agamis †. Eressus or Eresus, placed by Ptolemy between Pyrrha and Mela, the most southern promontory of Lesbos, but by Strabo between Pyrrha and Sigrium, the most northern promontory of the island. Eressus was the birth-place of the famous philosopher Theophrastus, who succeeded Aristotle in the Peripatetic school. Antissa, which was, according to Strabo <sup>e</sup>, in antient times an island by itself, and thence called Antissa, because it lay over-against Lesbos, then known by the name of Issa. This city, having disobliged the Romans, was destroyed by Labeo, and the inhabitants transplanted to Methymna <sup>f</sup>. Methymna, the native city of Arion, who is supposed to have been the first inventer of tragedies and of the Dithyrambic verse. This city borrowed its name from Mithymna, one of the daughters of Macareus <sup>g</sup>, of whom we shall have occasion to speak anon; and was the second city in rank of the whole island, especially after the inhabitants of Antissa were transplanted hither by the Romans. Methymna was famous for the fruitfulness of its territory and the excellent wines it produced. When the other cities of Lesbos revolted from the Athenians, Methymna continued steadfast in its former alliance, and proved very serviceable in reducing of the rest <sup>h</sup>. Mitylene, the capital of the whole island, so called from the daughter of Macareus, who married Lesbos, as we have hinted above. Cicero <sup>i</sup> and Vitruvius <sup>k</sup> greatly commend this city, on account of the stateliness of its buildings and the fertility of its soil. Strabo tells us, that it abounded with the necessaries and delights of life <sup>l</sup>, and Horace bestows upon it the epithet of famous or renowned <sup>m</sup>. A modern traveller is of opinion, that the present city of Castro was built on the ruins of Mitylene, there being to this day many vestiges of a great city to be seen in Castro and its neighbourhood <sup>n</sup>. But Mitylene was not so renowned on account of its magnificent buildings and fruitful soil, as for the many great men it produced. Pittacus, one of the seven sages of Greece; Alcæus, the famous Lyric poet; Sappho, called by Strabo a prodigy, by others the tenth muse; Terpander, who was the first that fitted seven strings to the lyre, which gave occasion to the fable of Orpheus's head being heard to speak in this island after it was cut off in Thrace, as Eustathius ingeniously explains it <sup>o</sup>; Hellanicus, the celebrated historian, and Callias, famous for his notes on Alcæus and Sappho, were all natives of Mitylene. To these we may add, with Strabo,

Diophanes, a famous rhetorician, who was tutor to Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, and afterwards pressed him to revive the Licinian law, which occasioned great disturbances in the republic; Potamon, Lestode, Crinagoras, and Theophanes, all mentioned by Strabo as men of great parts and learning. Theophanes had a great influence over Pompey, who honoured him with his confidence and an employment of distinction in his troops; and the Greek, in gratitude to his benefactor, wrote the history of his glorious conquests. Mitylene was in antient times the seat of all polite arts and literature. There Epicurus read public lectures at thirty years of age <sup>P</sup>, and Aristotle resided two years to improve by the conversation of the learned men of the place <sup>Q</sup>. In the Roman times such as were dissatisfied with the government at home, or desirous to perfect themselves in polite literature, retired to Athens, Rhodes, or Mitylene. Among the former was Marcellus, who after the battle of Pharsalia withdrew to this city, and was so taken with the conversation of the many learned men he found there, that Cicero could not prevail upon him to abandon the place and return to Rome, even after he had obtained his pardon from Cæsar <sup>R</sup>. This city suffered greatly in the Peloponnesian war, after it had revolted from the Athenians, as we read in Thucydides <sup>S</sup>. In the Mithridatic war it was the only city that refused to submit to the Romans, after the treaty of peace was concluded between Mithridates and Sylla. Wherefore it was besieged, taken, and razed to the ground by Minucius Thermus. Julius Cæsar, who was then making his first campaign, signalized himself at this siege, and was honoured with several civic crowns. This city was soon after rebuilt, and in favour of Theophanes restored by Pompey to the full enjoyment of all its antient privileges <sup>T</sup>. Pliny says, that in his time it enjoyed the same liberty which Pompey had granted it. The emperor Trajan embellished it with many costly buildings, and called it from his own name Trajanopolis; but the antient name prevailed, and in process of time became common to the whole island, which to this day is called Metelin.

THE fruitfulness of this island is much spoke of by the antients; it produced great quantities of delicious fruits and exquisite wines, which, if we believe our modern travellers, still deserve the mighty praises bestowed upon them by Strabo, Horace, Athenæus, Ælian, &c. We are told, that while

Aristotle was dying, a dispute arose among his disciples about the person who should succeed him, some thinking Menedemus of Rhodes the most proper man to keep up the reputation of the Peripatetic school, and others declaring in favour of Theophrastus the Lesbian. The matter was at last referred to Aristotle himself, who, having called for some wine of both islands, and tasted them, said they were both excellent wines, but that the Rhodian was not to compare with the Lesbian; thereby giving to understand, that Theophrastus excelled his competitor as much as the wine of Lesbos did that of Rhodes <sup>u</sup>. Trifan mentions a medal of the emperor Geta, who according to Spartianus, did not dislike good wine, with a fortune on the reverse, holding in her right hand the rudder of a ship, and in her left a cornucopiæ with a bunch of grapes, and underneath the inscription Mitylene. Pliny tells us, that the wine of Lesbos was deemed no less wholesome than pleasant by Erasistratus, one of the greatest physicians of antiquity. The same author speaks of the jasper of Lesbos, and of a certain kind of pine-trees yielding pitch. As to the morals of the antient Lesbians, we cannot say any thing in their commendation; they were given to all kinds of lewdness and debauchery, insomuch, that to express the lewd and dissolute life of a debauchee, the antients used to say, that he lived like a Lesbian <sup>w</sup>. Goltzius exhibits a medal, which does no great honour to the Lesbian women.

THIS island, according to Diodorus Siculus, was first peopled by the Pelasgi; for Xanthus the son of Triopas, prince of the Pelasgians, who came from Argos, having first settled in Lycia, and there reigned some time over the Pelasgians, who had attended him in his expedition, sailed from thence to Lesbos, which, as it lay at that time desolate, he divided among his followers, changing its antient name of Iffa into that of Pelasgia. In process of time, that is, after seven generations, the inhabitants being all destroyed by Deucalion's flood, the island lay waste and desolate, till Macareus, happening to touch there, and being taken with the pleasantness and fertility of the country, settled in it, and built the city of Olanus. The fame of his justice and humanity drew many Ionians to him, by whose means he possessed himself of some of the neighbouring islands, and in a short time became very powerful. In his time Lesbos, the son of Lapithas and grandson of Æolus, arriving in this island, by the direction of the oracle at Delphos, with a new colony, was kindly received by the inhabitants, and being allowed to enjoy, with his followers, the same rights and privileges as those who were there before him, he married Methymna the eldest daughter of Macareus, after whose death he called the island from his own name Lesbos *. This is the account Diodorus gives us of the first inhabitants of Lesbos; but Strabo †, Herodotus ‡, Thucydides §, Pausanias ¶, Ptolemy ††, Velleius ‡‡, unanimously tells us, that it was first peopled by the Æolians, and constantly speak of the Lesbians as having come originally from Æolis.

THE Lesbians were, like most of the other Greek nations, Govern- first governed by kings; but of these we find four only men- ment and tioned in history, viz. Macareus, Lesbos, Æolion, and Penthilus. history. Macareus is said to have subdued some of the neighbouring islands, viz. Samos, whither he sent one of his sons, by name Cycholaus, who divided the island among his followers, and ruled over them as king; Cos, over which he appointed his second son Nicander king; and Rhodes, great part of which was held by his third son Leucippus. These conquests Macareus made, if we believe Diodorus †, soon after the flood of Deucalion, that is, about 1046 years before the Christian æra, when the islands were but thinly peopled. But Dionysius Halicarnassæus tells us, that Xanthus the Pelagian, long before the reign of Macareus, had peopled Lesbos, and that Macareus did not subdue, but only peopled some of the adjacent islands †. Macareus was succeeded by Lesbos the son of Lapithas, who, marrying Methymna the daughter of Macareus, had the island for her dowry. Æolion is mentioned by Homer as reigning in Lesbos; and Penthilus by Pausanias ‡, who tells us, that Penthilus was king of Mycenæ, and that he subdued great part of Æolis, with the island of Lesbos, whence he places him among the Lesbian kings. In process of time the democratical form of government universally prevailed in all the Greek states, and, amongst others, in Lesbos, the Lesbians having driven out their kings, as Aristotle informs us ¶, when they began to rule not as kings, but as tyrants. Upon this revolution great troubles arose in the island, each city aspiring to the same power over the others, which they could not bear in one man. In this contest the city of Mitylene at last prevailed, and by that means became so powerful, that the Mityleneans, being disengaged from all wars at home, began to entertain thoughts of making conquests on the continent. Accordingly, having equipped a fleet, they made a descent on the country of Troas, which they in great part reduced, and held undisturbed till the time of Pisistratus tyrant of Athens, who took from them the city of Sigeum, and put it into the hands of Hegeſistratus his natural son by a woman of Argos. This occasioned a war between the Athenians and Mityleneans, which was carried on with great vigour by the contending parties, till they were reconciled by the mediation of Periander tyrant of Corinth. The terms of accommodation were, that each party should retain what they possessed, and that the Lesbians should be allowed to make what conquests they pleased on the continent of Asia. Thus the Athenians remained masters of Sigeum, and the Mityleneans quietly possessed the rest of Troas. In a battle fought during this war, the poet Alcæus is said to have betaken himself to flight, leaving his armour behind him, which the Athenians, who carried the day, hung up in the temple of Minerva at Sigeum. This disgrace the poet lamented in a poem, which he inscribed to Menalippus, who had attended him in his flight<sup>1</sup>. This war was scarce ended, when the other cities of Lesbos, not being able to brook the yoke laid upon them by Mitylene, revolted. Thus a civil war was kindled anew, which Myrsilus, a man of great wealth and authority in the island, taking advantage of, seized on the sovereignty, and ruled without controul. Alcæus composed bitter invectives against him, as well as his successor in the tyranny Megalagyrus<sup>2</sup>. The other tyrants mentioned in history are Cleonaclis, Archæanax, and Melanchrus. Archæanax is said to have raised some stately buildings with materials brought from Troy<sup>1</sup>. Melanchrus was driven out by Pittacus, with the assistance of Alcæus, who, on this occasion, wiped off the disgrace he had incurred in the Athenian war. Pittacus, having delivered his country from tyrants, took upon himself to govern it, being warmly pressed thereunto by his fellow citizens; but after having reigned ten years, he resigned all the power which he had been vested with, and spent the remainder of his life in study and retirement. He was not only a great philosopher but an experienced officer. In the above mentioned war between the Athenians and Mityleneans, he had the chief command of the army, on which occasion he gave a signal proof both of his courage and good nature ; for being unwilling to hazard the lives of his fellow citizens, he challenged Phrynon the Athenian general to a single combat, notwithstanding he had been victor at the Olympic games. Phrynon accepted the challenge, but was conquered and killed by Pittacus, who is said to have entangled him in a net, which he had hid under his shield. During his administration he made many wise laws, which he comprehended in six hundred verses. One of these laws, taken notice of by Aristotle, Plato, and Plutarch, was, that every fault committed by a man, when drunk, deserved double punishment. Many of his sentences were written on the walls of the temple of Apollo at Delphos ; so great was the esteem which the antients entertained of his wisdom. He died ten years after he had resigned the government, in the third year of the fifty-second olympiad, and seventieth of his age <sup>m</sup>. The Lesbians maintained their liberties from the time of his resignation to the reign of Cyrus the great ; but were in that interval greatly harassed by Polycrates tyrant of Samos, who, having defeated their fleet, obliged them to pay him an annual tribute. After the defeat of Cræsus king of Lydia, they submitted with the other islanders to the conqueror, and even agreed, as some authors write, to deliver up to him Pactyas, who, after having persuaded the Lydians to revolt, had taken sanctuary in the city of Mitylene <sup>n</sup>. Being thus made tributaries to the kings of Persia, they served Darius in his wars, both against Scythia and Greece. In the former Coes, the son of Erxandrus, commander of the Mityleneans, dissuaded Darius from breaking down the bridge, which he had laid over the Ister, on his march into Scythia ; for which piece of good advice he was rewarded with the sovereignty of Lesbos, which he did not long enjoy, being driven out by Aristagoras, at the beginning of the Ionian revolt. He was afterwards seized by one Itragoras, and delivered up to the Mityleneans, who stoned him to death <sup>o</sup>. The Lesbians being thus delivered from the tyranny of Coes, readily came into the measures of Histiæus and Aristagoras ; but in the sea-fight near Lade, over-against Miletus, followed the example of the Samians, retiring in the heat of the engagement and abandoning their allies. By this means the Persians having gained a complete victory, soon reduced Lesbos, as well as the other islands. The Lesbians, after the defeat of the confederate fleet, had joined Histiæus, and subdued the island of Chios; on which account they were treated by Darius with more severity than the other islanders. This treatment they were forced to endure till the battle of Mycale, when they revolted with the other Greeks, and joined their countrymen against the common enemy. After the signal victory obtained at Mycale by the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, they entered into an alliance with the conquerors, who promised to protect them, whenever they should be attacked by the Persians<sup>p</sup>. In the course of the war, being provoked at the haughty behaviour of Pausanias the Lacedæmonian commander, they, together with the other allies, deserted him, and put themselves under the command and protection of the Athenians, by which means the Lacedæmonians lost the chief command<sup>q</sup>. Neither did the Lesbians long continue faithful to the Athenians, but abandoned them in the third year of the Peloponnesian war. But of this revolt, and the evils which it brought upon Mitylene, we have spoke at length in the foregoing volume<sup>r</sup>. After the great overthrow received by the Athenians in Sicily, they revolted anew from Athens, but were soon again brought under subjection, as we have related in the history of Athens<sup>s</sup>. From this time to the reign of Alexander, we find nothing upon record concerning the Lesbians worth mentioning. In the war which that prince made upon the Persians, the Lesbians readily joined him; whereupon Memnon the Rhodian made a descent upon the island, and reduced it, not without great loss, the city of Mitylene having stood a long siege. At last the Mityleneans surrendered, upon condition, that the Macedonians, who were there in garison, should be suffered to depart unmolested; which so pleased Alexander, that after he had regained the city, he restored the inhabitants to their former liberty, enlarged their territory, and confirmed many privileges, not on them only, but on all the Lesbians<sup>t</sup>. Alexander having made himself master of the whole island, by driving the Persians from all the places they possessed there, delivered up the tyrants, namely, Aristonicus and Chrysolæus, to those whom they had oppressed.

allowing them to inflict upon their oppressors what punishments they pleased. They were both first cruelly racked, and then put to death, which, as Diodorus observes, prevented others from aspiring to the tyranny, even after the death of Alexander. Thus they enjoyed their liberty till the time of Pompey the great, who reduced the island of Lesbos to a Roman province, for having delivered up to Mithridates M. Aquilius, the chief of the Roman deputies sent in to Asia. However, he soon restored Mitylene to the enjoyment of its antient privileges, as we have related above, whence it is counted by Pliny among the free cities.

IN the streight which separates Lesbos from the continent, Hecaton- are a great many small islands called Hecatonnessi, from A-nessi. pollo, named antiently Hecatos, to whom they were consecrated <sup>u</sup>. Between the promontory Malea in Lesbos and that of Cane in Æolis, lie the three islands Arginusæ, famous for the victory which the Athenians gained there in the Peloponnesian war <sup>w</sup>. Cicero, who mentions this battle, calls these islands Arginussæ <sup>x</sup>. The largest of the three, called by Pliny Arginusa, had a town bearing the same name <sup>y</sup>.

Chios, now Scio, distant from Lesbos about four hundred Chios. furlongs, and nine hundred in circuit, lies between Lesbos and Samos, opposite to the peninsula of Ionia, on which stand Erythræ, Clazomenæ and Tcos <sup>z</sup>. It is divided from Ionia by a channel which is but three leagues over. This island was known to the antients by the names of Ætha- Names. lia, Macris, Pitbyusa, &c. but that of Chios prevailed over all the rest, which some derive from the name of a nymph, others from the Greek word Chion, signifying snow, the mountains of the island, especially mount Pelenæus, being often covered with snow. But Isidorus <sup>a</sup> is of opinion, that the name of Chios was borrowed from the Syriac, that word signifying, in the Syriac tongue, mastic, with which this island abounds above all other places.

As for its soil, Athenæus calls it a mountainous and rugged Soil, &c. country; however, it produced excellent wine, and is on that account highly commended by the antients. Oenopion, the son of Bacchus, if we believe Theopompus as quoted by Athenæus, taught the Chians the manner of cultivating the vine, and they the rest of mankind. The same author adds, that the first red wine was made in this island. Virgil, Horace, and Silius Italicus seem not to have disliked the wine of Chios, especially that which was squeezed from the grapes of Ariusa or Arisia, and is called by Virgil <sup>b</sup> Arvisian nectar, by Silius Arisian ambrosia <sup>c</sup>. Strabo prefers this to all the wines of Greece <sup>d</sup>. Pliny often speaks of it, and quotes Varro to prove, that it was often prescribed at Rome as an excellent stomachic <sup>e</sup>. The same author adds, that Hortensius left to his heir ten thousand casks of this wine. Julius Cæsar used to regale his friends with the Arvisian wine in his public entertainments, that wine being, as Athenæus subjoins, an excellent digester, exceeding wholesome, and far surpassing all others in taste and flavour <sup>f</sup>. Hence we may easily comprehend, why we find so many medals of Chios in Goltzius <sup>g</sup>, with bunches of grapes, casks, and other implements for making of wine. The figs of Chios were likewise in great reputation, and are no less commended by the antient writers than the wine. Strabo takes notice of the quarries of Chios, and Pliny tells us, that the first jasper was discovered in this island. Cicero happening to be here when it was first made use of, the inhabitants shewed him it as a curiosity; but the Roman, after having viewed it with attention, said, That he should be better pleased with the fabric they were then carrying on, if it were built with stone from Tibur, a city in the neighbourhood of Rome. But the chief produce of this island is mastic, which is produced by the lentisk-trees in greater plenty here than any-where else. But for the description of the mastic, and the trees that produce it, we refer the readers to our modern travellers <sup>h</sup>, who give a very distinct account of them. Vitruvius mentions a spring in Chios, which deprived of their senses all those who tasted its waters; for which reason an epigram was placed over it, warning all passengers of the danger <sup>i</sup>. Chios, the chief town of the island, stood on the eastern coast, in the most pleasant and fruitful part of the country, and was, according to Strabo, forty stades in circumference <sup>k</sup>. This city pretended to be the birth-place of Homer; and Leo Allatius, a native of Scio, has taken a great deal of pains to shew, that this pretension was well grounded <sup>l</sup>. The inhabitants, to this day, shew the school they suppose he went to, which is cut out of a rock at the foot of mount Epos, on the sea side, about four miles from the present town of Scio. They likewise pretend to shew his dwelling-house in a place which bears the poet's name, on the north side of the island, near Volisso, called Bolissus by Thucydides and the author of Homer's life. Bolissus stands in the midst of the Arvisian fields, so famed for the wines they produced. These perhaps did not a little contribute to the raising of the poet's vein. The inhabitants of Chios were so prepossessed with this opinion that Homer was born in their island, that, according to Julius Pollux, they stamped his figure on their money. Several medals are still to be seen, which preserve the traces of this ancient tradition. On one, mentioned by Beger, Homer is represented sitting in a chair, and holding the Iliad in his hand; and on the reverse, an harp, the symbol of poetry, with a sphinx, which agrees very well with what is said of Homer, viz. that he knew how to inculcate the finest maxims of morality under beautiful allegories and allusions, and that his fables are so many mystical veils which conceal the most important truths and profound knowledge<sup>m</sup>. This island has given to the world other very extraordinary men, namely, Ion, Theopompus, Theocritus, and Metrodorus (S).

(S) Ion flourished about the eighty second olympiad, and is often mentioned and commended by Aristophanes, Athenæus, and Suidas, as an elegant writer of tragedies. His first performance was exhibited in Athens, in the eighty second olympiad, and met with general applause. This cannot be the Ion, whom Plato, in one of his dialogues, introduces reasoning with Socrates, as some writers have imagined; for the tragic poet was of Chios, and the other a native of Ephesus.

Theopompus flourished in the reigns of Artaxerxes Ochus in Persia, and Philip the father of Alexander the Great in Macedon. He was disciple to Isocrates, and, in the opinion of Dionysius Halicarnassæus, far excelled his master. The same author tells us, that he wrote several books, viz. orations, in imitation of those wrote by Isocrates, among which was a funeral oration on Mautolus, called by some, the epitaph of Mautolus; a book of epistles; an epitome of Herodotus; a treatise on the doctrine of Plato; another of wonderful things, and two histories. His epistles, as Dionysius of Halicarnassus informs us, were titled Ἀρχαίων, or, as others read it, Ἀρχαίων. Athenæus quotes two of his epistles, one addressed to the inhabitants of Chios, and the other to

THIS island was first peopled, according to Strabo, by the Pelasgians; according to Diodorus by Macareus and his followers, Alexander. Harpocration mentions a third written to Tizamenes. Suidas mentions his abridgment of Herodotus, and says, that he was therein assisted by Ephorus. His treatise on the doctrine of Plato is quoted by Athenæus; and that of wonderful things by the scholiast of Aristophanes, by Apollonius, and Laertius. The same scholiast mentions a treatise of his on piety and religion. The scholiast of Apollonius quotes the twenty-first and twenty-second books of his Philippics. Longinus, in his treatise on the sublime, produces two passages out of Theopompus, the one relating to Philip, and probably taken from his Philippics, where he says, that Philip swallowed, without reluctance, such affronts as the necessity of his affairs obliged him to bear. This expression is censured by Cecilius, but approved of by Longinus, as just and proper. The other passage relates to the descent of the king of Persia into Egypt, where the author, in the opinion of Longinus, enters into a detail of too mean particulars, which greatly lessen the beauty of his relations; but the chief works of Theopompus were his two histories, the one comprehending the last years of the Peloponnesian war, and the other the actions of Philip. Both these pieces are highly commended by Athenæus and Dionysius Halicarnassensis. The former praises Theopompus as a lover of truth, and one who spared no pains in the search of it. The latter tells us, that his diction was pure and simple, and yet sublime and noble; that it had something very pompous, but was tempered with a just harmony; that the whole was well connected, plain and easy, &c. However, some authors have found fault with him as an ill-natured writer, and one who took pleasure in railing. Cornelius Nepos, in the life of Alcibiades, and Lucian, think his invectives too bitter, and add, that his design seems to have been rather to censure, than to relate, facts. Josephus ranks him among the historians, whose chief aim was to disparage cities and nations. Dionysius of Halicarnassus endeavours to excuse him in this particular, telling us, that he acted like a prudent and skilful surgeon, who cuts off, or burns the corrupted part of the body, making deep incisions and applying caustics, without ever hurting such parts as are sound and vigorous. Theon blames his digressions as too long, and making the reader forget the main subject. Quintilian, and with him most of the antients agree, that he wrote in the stile of an orator rather than of an historian. His history of Philip consisted of 58 books, as Diodorus Siculus and Photius inform us, and not of 72, as Suidas asserts. These Philip of Macedon, the father of Perseus, reduced to 10, by retrenching the many digressions with which he had filled them. His history of the Peloponnesian war was comprised in 11 books, according to the anonymous author of the olympiads, in 12, according to Suidas. He began where Thucydides left off, and ended with the sea fight near Cnidus. Some authors have ascribed to him the eighth book of Thucydides; but this opinion is rejected by Marcellinus. Anaximenes of Lampsacus lowers, after they had made themselves masters of Lesbos. But the opinion of Herodotus, who will have the Chians to be Ionians, has generally obtained <sup>n</sup>. As to their government, they were first subject to kings; but of these we find Hippoclus alone mentioned in history. This prince being murdered by his subjects, as Strabo informs us <sup>o</sup>, for a pretended affront offered to the bride of one of the chief men of the island, the Chians formed themselves into a republic; but as to the laws and constitutions of their new government, we are altogether in the dark. In process of time, with the assistance and under the direction of Isocrates, they new-modelled their republic, forming it on the plan of that of Athens <sup>p</sup>; but they did not long enjoy the blessings of liberty, being, like the other small states of Greece, brought under subjection by their domestic tyrants. Athenæus speaks of Amphicus and Polytechnus, as the first who aspired to the sovereignty of the island, and assumed all the power into their own hands <sup>q</sup>. In the reigns of Sadyattes and Halyattes kings of Lydia, they assisted the Milesians against these princes, remembering, says Herodotus, that the Milesians had assisted them in their wars with the Erythraeans <sup>r</sup>; but neither the occasion, nor the success of this war, nor even the time in which it happened, have been transmitted to us. After the Lampfacus published a history under his name, which was looked upon as a spurious piece. Photius epitomized one of the books of his history; and this epitome is the only part of his works that has reached our times. The same Photius gives a very particular account of his birth, education, manner of life, works, &c. which it would be too tedious to insert here (41).

Theocritus was cotemporary with Theopompus and Ephorus, and wrote, as Suidas witnesses, some learned epistles, and the history of Libya. Strabo (42) calls him a sophist, and ranks him and Theopompus among the illustrious men of Chios, who, with mutual emulation, strove for the administration of affairs in their republic. This perhaps is the Theocritus, whom Fulgentius quotes in his Mythology, in the fable of Perseus and the Gorgons (43).

Metrodorus flourished in the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon king of Persia, and was, according to Suidas, preceptor to Hippocrates and Anaxarchus. He was by profession a philosopher and a physician, and wrote several books relating to physic, which are often quoted by Pliny. Athenæus informs us, that he likewise wrote a book intitled Troica; but none of his works have reached us.

defeat of Cræsus by Cyrus, they submitted with the other islanders to the conqueror, and even delivered up to him Pactyas the Lydian, who had stirred up his countrymen to revolt against the Persians. This Pactyas, not finding himself in a condition to make head against Mazares, whom Cyrus had sent against him, fled for refuge to the city of Cyme. The Cymeans, being unwilling to deliver him up to Mazares, and, on the other hand, not caring to draw a war upon themselves by protecting him, sent him to Mitylene; but the Mityleneans, at the request of Mazares, agreeing to deliver him into the hands of the Persians, the Cymeans dispatched a vessel to Lesbos, and transported him to Chios. The Chians, terrified at the threatening messages of Mazares, dragging him from the very altar of Minerva, the tutelary goddess of their city, put him into the hands of Mazares, who, for their ready compliance with his request, bestowed upon them the city of Atarneus in Mysia, over-against Lesbos, with its territory. Our historian adds, that for many years after, the Chians declined using in their sacrifices the growth of lands thus acquired, looking upon the corn and fruits of Atarneus as unhallowed, and not fit to be offered to the gods <sup>f</sup>. Being reduced by the Persians, they were, like the other islanders, employed by them in all their naval expeditions. They served Darius, as the same historian tells us, in his expedition against the Scythians; on which occasion Strattias, styled by Herodotus tyrant of Chios, signalized his affection to that prince, by strenuously opposing such of the Ionians as were for abandoning him and returning home <sup>e</sup>. In the Ionian revolt the Chians readily joined Aristagoras, shook off the Persian yoke, and equipped an hundred ships, each of which had forty chosen citizens on board. In the sea-fight at Lade, they distinguished themselves in a very particular manner; for the *Sami*ans, Lesbians, and most of the other Ionians betaking themselves to flight in the very beginning of the engagement, the Chians fought to the last, took many of the enemy's ships, and gave such proofs of their valour and zeal for the common cause, that had the other Ionians followed their example, *Ion*ia had been that day delivered from the Persian yoke; but as they were abandoned by all their allies, except eleven Samian ships, they were at last overpowered, and obliged to save themselves by running their ships aground at Mycale; whence they marched into the territory of Ephesus. As they arrived in the neighbourhood of the city by night, while the women were celebrating the rites of Ceres, the Ephesians, not knowing what had happened, and seeing an armed multitude making towards them, took them for robbers come to strip the women, and without examining further into the matter, sallying out of the city with their whole force, killed all the Chians on the spot<sup>u</sup>. Nor did the misfortunes of Chios end here ; for Histiæus, after the defeat of the Ionians, retiring to Chios, and not being received there, attacked those who opposed him, and, with the assistance of the Lesbians, reduced the whole island, the Chians being greatly weakened by the loss they had sustained in the fight at sea. Thus were the Chians rewarded by Histiæus, who had been the chief cause of their revolt, and whom they had assisted to the utmost of their power, in hopes of rescuing their country, under his command, from the Persian bondage. Histiæus not being able to keep possession of the island, abandoned it to the Persians, who punished the Chians with the utmost severity. The most handsome of their youths they made eunuchs, and their daughters they sent to the king of Persia, after having destroyed both their houses and temples, ravaged their territories, and reduced the few inhabitants that remained to a state of slavery<sup>w</sup>. Before this last catastrophe, two great misfortunes beset the Chians, which our historian looks upon as previous signs of the many calamities they were to suffer from the Persians. They had sent an hundred young men of the chief families of the island to Delphos, perhaps with some offering ; out of that number two only returned home, all the rest dying of the plague. Not long before the sea fight off of Lade, the school, where their youth were educated, falling down buried an hundred and nineteen of them in the ruins<sup>x</sup>. Thus they continued subject to the Persians, whom they assisted with a considerable squadron in their expedition against Greece, till the battle of Mylæ, when they revolted with the other Ionians, and entered into an alliance with the Athenians and Lacedæmonians against the common enemy<sup>y</sup>. The Chians, being thus delivered from the Persian yoke, and restored to their antient liberty, flourished, if we believe Thucydides, above all the states of Greece, Lacedæmon alone excepted<sup>z</sup>. When the supreme command was, by the unanimous consent of the allies, conferred upon the Athenians, the Chians, who greatly contributed thereunto, were favoured by the Athenians above the other allies, being exempted from all manner of tribute, and obliged only to furnish a certain number of ships<sup>a</sup>. They continued faithful to the Athenians till the twentieth year of the Peloponnesian war, when they revolted to the Lacedæmonians, upon the dreadful overthrow received by the Athenians in Sicily; and though in this they acted, as Thucydides owns, a very prudent part, yet they were, after the loss of three battles, constrained to return to their antient alliance, in which they continued till the social war, when, growing weary of their alliance with Athens, they joined the Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantines, with a design to throw off the Athenian yoke, and set themselves free. In this they were attended with better success than they had been in their former revolt; for, after having maintained the war three years, they concluded a peace almost upon their own terms<sup>b</sup>, as we have related in the history of Athens<sup>c</sup>. From this time they enjoyed a profound peace and tranquillity till the downfall of the Persian empire, when they, together with the other Greek states in Europe and Asia, became subject to the Macedonian princes. Their city was besieged and reduced to great straits by Philip the father of Perjes, who, finding he could not take it by force, proclaimed liberty to all the slaves who should revolt, and besides promised them their masters wives in marriage; but, notwithstanding this offer, not one single slave, and there were more slaves in the city of Chios than in any other of Greece, attempted to revolt, or betray their masters: Whereupon Philip was obliged to break up the siege, after he had lost a great number of his men<sup>d</sup>. In the war which the Æolians waged with the same Philip and Prusias king of Bithynia, they sided with the former, which cost them dear, their territories being laid waste, and all the open places in the island utterly destroyed by the troops of the confederate princes. Afterwards they assisted the Romans in their wars against Philip, his son Perjes, and Antiochus surnamed the Great, king of Syria, and were, for their eminent services, not only declared free, but honoured with the title of friends and allies of the people of Rome. They were strangely oppressed and loaded with taxes by Zenobius, one of Mithridates Eupator's lieutenants, for refusing to join that prince against the Romans, but amply rewarded by Sylla, after he had overthrown Mithridates, for their attachment to the interest of Rome. The Roman general restored them to the full enjoyment of all their ancient rights and privileges, which they maintained undisturbed, living in great ease and plenty, till the reign of Vespasian, who reduced Chios, with the other islands of the Ægean sea, to a Roman province;

but, at the same time, allowed the Chians to live according to their own laws, under the superintendence of a Roman prætor, whose province comprehended all the islands in the Ægean sea, from the mouth of the Hellepont to Rhodes.

SEVERAL small islands lie round Chios, which were formerly subject to that state, viz. Thalussa or Daphnusa, Oenussa, Elaphitis, Eurynassa; and over-against Ephesus, at a greater distance from Chios, the islands of Pisistratus, as Pliny styles them, viz. Anthinæ, Myonnesos, and Diarrheusa. These islands are also mentioned by Thucydides†, Herodotus§, Strabo<sup>h</sup>, &c.

Icaria, now Nicaria, lies about twenty miles west of Samos, and is, according to Strabo, three hundred furlongs, that is, thirty seven miles and a half in circumference. It was antiently called Doliche, Macris, and Ichthæsa. The name of Icaria it is supposed to have borrowed from Icarus the son of Dædalus, who is said to have been drowned near this island, whence the neighbouring sea took the name of the Icarian sea, which, according to Pliny, extends from Samos to Mycone. Bochart derives the name of Icaria from the Phœnician word Icaure, which signifies full of fish, and agrees with the name of Ichthuessæ, given to this island by the antient Greeks. Icaria, if we believe Strabo, was never well peopled; however, it had two pretty considerable towns, viz. Dracanon and Ænoe. It had good pasture ground, and was on that account, as the same writer tells us, of great use to the Samians, who were long masters of it<sup>i</sup>. The inhabitants of Icaria were particularly addicted to the worship of Diana, whence Callimachus did not scruple to say, that the goddess took more delight in the island of Icaria, than any other of the Ægean sea. He alluded, without doubt, to the famous temple erected by the Icarians in honour of Diana, and called by the antients Tauropolium. Some medals of this island are still to be seen, representing Diana in the attire of a huntress, and on the reverse a woman on a bull, whom some take for Europa; but Nonius is of opinion, that the woman represents the same Diana, and the bull the richness of the pastures for which this island was once famous.

Patmos, or, as others write it, Pathmos, lies forty five miles south of Icaria, and is, according to Pliny, thirty, according to our modern geographers, only eighteen, miles in compass. It is a barren, mountainous, and rocky country. It had formerly, and has still, several safe and capacious har-bours; that which is now called port La Scala, is one of the best in the Archipelago. Near this harbour are to be seen some pieces of broken columns, which the antiquaries reckon the most antient in the Archipelago. The chief town of this island, as Galen informs us, bore likewise the name of Patmos. The Romans used this island as a place of banishment, under which punishment St. John resided here, and wrote his revelations. The present inhabitants pretend to shew the house he lived in, which they call the Apocalypse. Patmos is now known by the name of Palmosa.

Leros. Leros is a small island, about eighteen miles in compass, lying south of Patmos. It was antiently very populous, and furnished the neighbouring countries with aloes<sup>k</sup>. It had formerly two convenient havens. The inhabitants, called Lerarii, were reckoned very corrupt by the antients. Pharmacusa is placed by Stephanus over-against Miletus. In this island king Attalus was killed, and near it Julius Cæsar taken prisoner by the pirates<sup>l</sup>. Between Pharmacusa and the continent, over-against Miletus, is the island of Lade, mentioned by Thucydides<sup>m</sup>, Strabo<sup>n</sup>, Pausanias<sup>o</sup>, Herodotus<sup>p</sup>, Arrian<sup>q</sup>, &c. It was antiently called Late, as Pliny informs us, and inhabited by the Ionians<sup>r</sup>. Minyia, Arcesine, Belgialis, Amorgus, and Caryanda, are mentioned by Ptolemy, and placed between Patmos and Cos. Some geographers have placed Caryanda in a lake near the coast of Ionis; but Pliny, and Scylax, who was a native of this island, counted it among the other islands of the Archipelago.

Cos. Cos, Coos, or Cous, is counted by Pliny<sup>t</sup> among the most considerable islands of the Ægean, or rather Myrtoan, sea. It was formerly known by the names of Merope, Cea, Nymphæa, and Caris. It lies, according to some, in the Carpathian, according to others, in the Myrtoan, sea, at a small distance from the coast of Caria, and fifteen miles from Halicarnassus. It was once very famous for its excellent wines, which are highly commended by all the antients. Strabo and Pliny agree in making it about eighty miles in compass. The chief city of the island was first called Astypalæa, and afterwards Cos. This city is mentioned by Homer, who calls it a place well peopled. Strabo speaks of a stately temple erected by the Coans in honour of Æsculapius, the tutelar god of their island, and enriched with offerings and presents of great value ; but the chief ornament of the place was a Venus rising out of the sea, done by Apelles, and reckoned one of his best performances. This inimitable piece was by Augustus conveyed to Rome, and there dedicated to Cæsar, Venus being reckoned the mother of the Julian family. To make some amends to the Coans for the loss of so valuable a treasure, the same Augustus eased them of a considerable part of their annual tribute<sup>t</sup>. This island was, in the Roman times, famous for a kind of fine stuff, which was in great request among the women of distinction at Rome. It covered them indeed, says the historian, but, at the same time, shewed them naked<sup>u</sup>; and hence it is so much spoke of, and inveighed against by the Latin poets<sup>w</sup>. But nothing has rendered this island more famous than the many great men it has produced, viz. Hippocrates, the reviver of physic, Senius, another famous physician, Ariston, a peripatetic philosopher, and Apelles, the so much celebrated painter (T). This island was, according to Homer and Strabo, inhabited by Greeks before the Trojan war, a colony of Dorians having passed over into it from the continent<sup>x</sup>. The Coans were first governed by kings, among whom we find mention made of Eurypylus contemporary with Hercules; of Chalcon,

(T) To these we may add Sisyphus, who is said to have been secretary to Teucer, and to have possessed the records of the Trojan war, which Homer made use of. He is mentioned by Tzetzes, and in a manuscript chronology quoted by the learned Leo Allatius. As to Hippocrates, he learned, if we believe Pliny (44), the first rudiments of physic, by perusing certain tablets, called by the Latins, tabellæ votivæ, which were hung up in the temples; for, agreeable to an antient custom, which prevailed all over Greece, such as recovered from any distemper, used to write on a tablet the nature and symptoms of their respective maladies, and the remedies which had been attended with most success. These tablets Hippocrates is said to have copied and followed when he first began to practise. A tablet of this nature was discovered at Rome, not many years ago, among the ruins of the antient temple of Æsculapius, with this inscription in Greek: Julianus being afflicted with vomiting of blood, and abandoned by men, the gods hastened to his relief, and having nourished him for the space of three days with honey, restored him to his health; for which favour he came to return them thanks in the presence of the people.

(44) Plin. l. vii. c. 37.

Antiphus, and Phidippus. The two latter are said by Hommer and Theocritus to have served at the siege of Troy. The kingly government gave room to a democracy, and this, as Aristotle informs us <sup>1</sup>, to an aristocracy, which was abolished by some private men, who, taking the whole power into their hands, governed with an absolute sway. Among these Nicippus and Scythes are mentioned by Ælian <sup>2</sup>. Hippocrates, in one of his letters, tells us, that the Coans refused to give earth and water to the messengers of Darius and Xerxes; but this does not agree with what we read in Herodotus, who counts the Coans among the Greeks who served as auxiliaries in the army of Xerxes <sup>3</sup>. In the twentieth year of the Peloponnesian war, the city of Cos, as we read in Thucydides <sup>4</sup>, was thrown down by an earthquake, the most violent one that had ever happened in those parts. Soon after this calamity, before they had time to repair the walls of their city, Astyochus the Lacedæmonian making a descent on the island, for the Coans sided with the Athenians, laid waste the whole country, plundered the city, the inhabitants having fled to the mountains, and retired to Cnidus with an immense booty. When Mithridates commanded all the Romans in Asia to be massacred, the only place that shewed any regard to them was the island of Cos, where they were suffered to enjoy the common rights of asylum in the sacred places. Mithridates soon after invaded the island, took the metropolis, and committed great devastations in their territory; but the Coans no sooner saw Lucullus Sylla's quæstor appear off their coast, than they rose in arms, drove out the king's garison, and received the Romans, by whom they were amply rewarded, Sylla having exempted them from all manner of tribute, and allowed them to live according to their own laws <sup>5</sup>. Tacitus tells us, that the Coans continued ever faithful to the Romans, did them many good services, and greatly contributed to some victories gained by their fleets. However, in the reign of the emperor Claudius, we find them, like the other Greek states, paying an annual tribute to Rome, which that emperor eased them of, in compliance with the request of Xenophon his physician, whom he pretended to be one of the descendants of Æsculapius <sup>6</sup>. This immunity from all impositions, taxes, and tributes they enjoyed till the reign of Vespasian, who, reducing them to a Roman province, exacted the same tribute from them is from the other Asiatic islands. Strabo tells us, that the island of Nisyra, called formerly Porphyris, was once joined to Cos †, but separated from it by the violence of the winds and seas. This island is sixty furlongs from Cos, and as many from Telos, being, according to Strabo, eighty furlongs in compass.

Carpathus lies between Rhodes and Crete in the sea, which from this island is called the Carpathian sea, and has to the north the Ionian, to the south the Egyptian, to the west the Cretan and African seas ‡. This island is two hundred furlongs in compass, and an hundred in length †. It had antiently, according to Strabo, four cities; according to Scylax only three. Ptolemy mentions but one, which he calls Posidium. This island is now called Scarpanto. Divers other islands lie dispersed on this coast, and are mentioned by Pliny, Strabo, Ptolemy, Thucydides, &c. viz. Casos, eighty furlongs in compass; Syme, over-against the continent of Caria, between Lorima and Cnidus; Chalæ, distant from Carpathus four hundred furlongs; Telos, over-against Triopium, an hundred and forty furlongs in circuit; Arconnesus, lying off of Halicarnassus, with several other islands mentioned by Pliny †, in the Ceramic gulf, that is, in the sea between the city of Halicarnassus and the island of Cos. This bay was so called from the city of Ceramus, which Pliny places in the island of Arconnesus; but all other geographers on the continent between Cnidus and Halicarnassus. This bay is called by some writers the Ceraunian bay, and the city, from which it borrowed its name, Ceraunus *. Casos, &c.

The Cretan sea is properly that part of the Ægean sea which lies about Crete, and formerly belonged, together with the islands it contained, to the Cretans. These islands are, Claude, Dia, Letoa, Ægilia, Calymna, Astypalæa, Thera, &c. Claude, which is mentioned in the Acts †, and had, in Pliny's time, a city called Gaulos, and now Gozo, lies south of Crete. Dia, now Standia, is about three leagues distant from Crete, and rather a rock than an island. Letoa is now known by the name of Cristina, and Ægilia by that of Cerigo. The former lies near Crete, the other not far from Peloponnesus. Calymna is celebrated by the antients for its excellent honey ‡. Astypalæa, now Stampala, lies off the south-west coast of Cos, is about sixty miles in compass, and had formerly a city bearing the same name, with two safe harbours.

Thera is placed by Strabo between Crete and Egypt, and said to be twenty-five miles in compass; but the modern geographers more rightly place it between Crete and the Cyclades, and allow it thirty-six miles in circuit, wherein they agree with Stephanus Byzantinus. This island was first peopled by the Phœnicians; for Cadmus as Herodotus<sup>a</sup>, Pausanias<sup>b</sup>, and Strabo<sup>c</sup>, inform us, arriving here in search of his sister Europa, left some of his followers, under the command of his kinsman Membliares, to people the island, which was then called Callista. This name it changed in process of time to that of Thera, from Theras the Lacedæmonian, the son of Autesion and grandson of Tisamenes, who led into this island a colony of Lacedæmonians and Mynians. The story is thus related by Herodotus<sup>d</sup>; the Argonauts, on their return from Colchis, stopped at Lemnos, where their posterity retained the name of Mynians. These, being driven out of Lemnos by the Pelasgians, sailed to Lacedæmon, and arriving at Taygetus landed there. When the Lacedæmonians heard of their arrival, they dispatched a messenger to enquire who they were, and whence they came. They answered, that they were Mynians, descended from those heroes who had attended Jason to Colchis. The Lacedæmonians, understanding that they were of Mynian extraction, sent another messenger to enquire with what design they had landed in their territories. To this they answered, that being expelled Lemnos by the Pelasgians, they were desirous to return to and settle in the country of their ancestors. The Lacedæmonians readily complied with their desire, allowing them to share with them their lands and privileges, and even to marry Lacedæmonian women; but not long after these new-comers conspired together to seize on the lands of the antient proprietors, and usurp the supreme authority; but their plot being discovered, they were all apprehended and sentenced to die. As the sentence, according to the custom of the country, was to be put in execution in the night, the wives of the Mynians, who were daughters to the principal persons of Sparta, asked leave to take their last farewell of their husbands; which being granted, they changed their garments with them, the women remaining in the prison, and the men making their escape, disguised like women, to the city of Taygetus. At this time Theras, who had been regent of the kingdom of Sparta during the minority of his nephews Eurysthenes and Procles, the sons of Aristodemus, having resigned to them the government, and not liking to obey after he had tasted the pleasure of commanding, declared his resolution to leave Lacedæmon and settle in the island of Callista, which was then held by the Phœnicians. As the Lacedæmonians pursued the Mynians to Taygetus, with a design to seize them there and put them to death, pursuant to the sentence pronounced against them, Theras interceded in their behalf, promising to transport them out of the country, and by that means free the Lacedæmonians from their troublesome guests. The Lacedæmonians complied with his desire, and Theras, with the Mynians and a great many of his countrymen, set sail to Callista, where they all settled. Thus was the island peopled, first by the Phœnicians, and afterwards by the Mynians and Lacedæmonians under the conduct of Theras. Herodotus, who gives us this account of the inhabitants of Thera, names two of the descendants of Theras who reigned here, viz. Æsanius and his son Grynus. The latter went to Delphos to sacrifice an hecatomb in honour of Apollo, attended by the most eminent citizens of the place, among whom was Battus the son of Polymnestus or Cyrnus, a man of great distinction among the Mynians. While Theras consulted the oracle about other affairs, the Pythian commanded him to build a city in Libya; from the execution of which command he excused himself on account of his age, desiring the oracle to employ therein some of the young men there present, at the same time pointing to Battus. On their return they slighted the oracle, nor did they know in what part of the world Libya was; but a drought, which lasted seven years in Thera and destroyed all the trees in the island, except one, obliged the king to return to the oracle, which commanded them again to build a town in Libya, and send a colony thither. Thus seeing no end of their calamity, they dispatched some of their citizens to Crete, with orders to enquire, whether any of the Cretans, or other inhabitants of that island, had ever been in Libya. These messengers, travelling from place to place, arrived in the city of Itanus, where having met with one Corobius a dyer of purple, who told them, that he had, by distress of weather, been driven to an island of Libya called Platæa, they prevailed upon him, with the promise of a great reward, to go with them to Thera. The Theræans found means to persuade him to conduct a small number of men to the island of Platæa, whence they soon returned to give an account of the place to their countrymen, leaving Corobius there with provisions for two months; but as they did not return within the time appointed, Corobius was reduced to the last extremity, when a ship from Samos, bound homewards from Egypt, arrived in the harbour. The Samians being informed by Corobius of all that had happened, left him subsistence for a year ; during which time the Theræans returned with a numerous colony, and having divided the lands among them, chose Battus for their king. Battus seeing himself raised to this dignity, made many wise laws, governed his new kingdom with great prudence, and built a city, which, by order of the oracle, he called Cyrene. This city, in process of time, became very famous, and one of the most powerful states of Africa, as we shall see in the sequel of this history. <sup>r</sup>

THE islands of Thera and Melos were the only two places, that in the Peloponnesian war, sided with the Lacedæmonians, and held out to the last against the Athenians, tho' solicited, with advantageous offers, to join the other islands. Thera made then, as Herodotus informs us <sup>r</sup>, a very considerable figure, was well peopled, and had no fewer than seven cities of no small note. It has still five towns pretty well peopled, viz. Apanomeria, Scaro or Castro, Pyrgos, Emperie or Nebrio, and Acroteri. Near Apanomeria is a capacious harbour, in the shape of a half-moon ; but ships cannot anchor in it, no bottom having ever yet been found. In this harbour there are two small islands, and at a little distance from it two others, called by Pliny, Strabo, and Seneca, Hiera or Automate, and Therasia. Seneca tells us <sup>t</sup>, that the island of Therasia appeared first in his time ; and Pliny <sup>u</sup> speaks of another, which he calls Thia, and places near Hiera, as quite new. This island, says he, has been seen issuing out of the sea in our days ; and Justin <sup>w</sup> tells us, that in his time, a great earthquake happening between the islands of Thera and Therasia, a new island sprung up, to the great surprize of all who beheld it. Dion Cassius <sup>x</sup> also speaks of an island appearing here in the reign of Claudius, which Aurelius Victor <sup>y</sup> calls a considerable island, and Syncellus mentions as appearing first in the forty-sixth year of the Christian æra. Cedrenus <sup>z</sup> tells us, that in the tenth year of Leo Isauricus there appeared, for some days together, a thick fog between the islands of Thera and Therasia, and a smoke, as if a burning kiln or furnace were rising up ;

and that, on a sudden, there appeared, floating on the surface of the water, a new island, which at last fastened to the island of Hiera, and considerably increased its bulk. At the same time such vast quantities of pumice-stone were cast up, as covered the coasts of Macedon and Asia, as far as the Dardanelles. This happened, according to Theophanes, in the year of Christ 712, according to Nicephorus in 720. A modern writer, who describes the island of Thera, called by the modern inhabitants Santorin, tells us, that, in his time, there were many old men in the island, who assured him, that they had seen, in 1573, a violent fire break out of the sea, and soon after a new island appear, which from thence they called Micri Cammeni, that is, the little burnt island<sup>a</sup>. This seems to confirm what Strabo says<sup>b</sup>, viz. That in his time the sea between Thera and Therasia was observed to boil four days together, and that an island 1500 paces in compass suddenly appeared, as if it had been plucked up by engines from the bottom of the water. A modern traveller tells us, that a few years before his arrival in the island, an immense quantity of pumice-stone arose out of the harbour of Thera, with such a dreadful noise, that at Scio, which is above 200 miles distant from Thera, they imagined the Venetian and Ottoman fleets had engaged<sup>c</sup>. In 1707 a new island appeared, if we may credit the accounts from the Levant, near Santorin or Thera, which was two miles in circuit at its first appearance, and was a few months after considerably increased by additional rocks cast up in violent earthquakes by the sea. The present inhabitants of Thera never fail to acquaint strangers, that the many rocks which are seen about their island, were all brought into the world by earthquakes. Pliny tells us<sup>d</sup>, that Thera itself first appeared after a violent earthquake; and that Thia, which is but two furlongs from it, was cast up by the sea in his time, on the eighth of the Ides of July, M. Junius Silanus and L. Balbus being then consuls. What Pliny advances is vouched by many other antient writers.

THERE are still to be seen in Thera the ruins of the temples of Neptune and Minerva, mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, and the scholiast of Pindar. The island was consecrated to Apollo, and thence is called by Pindar the holy island<sup>e</sup>. The many inscriptions, that are still remaining, shew, that this island made no small figure even in the Roman times. It is now known by the name of Santorin or Santorino, probably derived from St. Irene, the tutelary saint of the island. These are the chief islands in the Ægean, Icarian, and Cretan seas on the coasts of Asia. We shall now proceed to the Cyclades, the number and order of which is, according to Strabo <sup>f</sup>, as follows, Helena, Ceos, Cythnus, Seriphus, Melos, Siphnus, Cimolis, Prepesinthus, Olearus, Naxus, Parus, Cyrus, Myconus, Tenus, Andrus, Gyarus. Most of these islands lie south of Delos; so that this island is not strictly in the midst of the Cyclades, as the antients seem to have supposed.

Helena.

Helena, now Macronisi, was antiently known by the names of Macris and Granae; but that of Helena prevailed over the other two, and was borrowed, according to Strabo <sup>g</sup>, Pausanias <sup>h</sup>, and Stephanus, from the Grecian beauty of that name, Paris having stopped some time with her in this island. It is about three miles in breadth and eight in length, whence it is called the Long island. Pliny says it was separated from the island of Eubæa by an earthquake. It is a barren and inhospitable place, being covered over with a deep sand, and having but one spring, and that, as our modern travellers inform us, but a very poor one. Some have been of opinion, that this island was never inhabited; but Goltzius mentions two medals relating to its antient inhabitants. It is separated from the continent of Attica by a streight eight miles over <sup>i</sup>.

Ceos.

Ceos, Cea, or Cia, lies opposite to the promontory of Achaia called Sunium, and is fifty miles in compass <sup>k</sup>. This island is commended by the antients on account of its fertility and richness of its pastures <sup>l</sup>. The first silk-stuffs, if Pliny and Solinus are to be credited, were wrought here. Ceos was particularly famous for the excellent figs it produced, as the same Pliny informs us <sup>m</sup>. It was first peopled by Aristeus the son of Apollo and Cyrene, who, being grieved for the death of his son Ætæon, retired from Thebes, at the persuasion of his mother, and went over with some Thebans to Ceos, at that time uninhabited <sup>n</sup>. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that he retired to the island of Cos; but the antients, as

Servius observes, called both these islands by the same name of Cos. Be that as it will, the island of Ceos became so populous, that a law obtained there, commanding all persons upwards of sixty to be poisoned, that others might have wherewithal to subsist; so that none above sixty were to be seen in the island, being obliged, after they arrived at that age, either to submit to the law, or abandon the country, leaving all their effects behind them *. Ceos had, in former times, four famous cities, viz. Julis, Carthæa, Coreffus, and Præessa. The two latter were, according to Pliny, swallowed up by an earthquake †. The other two flourished in Strabo's time. Carthæa stood on a rising ground, at the end of a valley, about three miles from the sea. The situation of it, as described by Strabo, agrees with that of the present town of Zia, which gives name to the whole island. The ruins both of Carthæa and Julis are still remaining; those of the latter take up a whole mountain, and are called by the modern inhabitants Polis, that is, the city. Near this place are to be seen the ruins of a stately temple, with a great many pieces of broken pillars and statues of most exquisite workmanship. The walls of the city were of marble, and some pieces are still remaining above twelve feet in length. Julis was, according to Strabo, the birth-place of Simonides, Bacchylides, Erastratus, and Aristo (U). (U) The antients mention two great men natives of Ceos, both bearing the name of Simonides. The elder, the son of one Leoprepis, was born in the fifty-sixth olympiad, and died in the seventy-eighth, in the eighty-ninth year of his age. He wrote in the Doric dialect the history of Cambyfes and Darius Hystaspis, and described in Lyric verses the battles of Artemisium and Salamis. He is said to have added to the Greek alphabet the four letters H, Ω, Ξ, Ψ. He had, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Quintilian, a particular talent in moving his readers to compassion; and to this probably Catullus alluded in the following lines:

He was highly favoured by the greatest princes of Greece and Sicily, especially by Pausanias and Hiero. He wrote several books, a catalogue of which may be seen in Suidas and the anonymous author of the chronology of the olympiads (35). He carried the prize

bles tell us <sup>9</sup>, that Simonides, the son of Leoprepis, invented a sort of artificial memory, whereof he shewed the principles at Athens, and add, that he was descended of another Simonides, who was a poet no less renowned than himself. One of these two poets invented those doleful verses, which are sung at funerals, and are called by the Latins, Neniae<sup>r</sup>. Strabo tells us, That the Athenians having besieged the city of Julis, raised the siege, upon advice, that the inhabitants had resolved to murder all the children under a certain age, that other useful persons might not be employed in looking after them<sup>s</sup>. Ceos was, with the other Greek islands, subdued by the Romans, and bestowed upon the Athenians by Marc Anthony the triumvir, together with Ægina, Tinos, and some other adjoining islands<sup>t</sup>, which were all reduced to one Roman province by Vespasian.

Cythnus.

Cythnus, about twelve miles east of Ceos, is counted, by Strabo, among the most fruitful islands of the Ægean sea. It of poetry, probably in Syracuse, being then in the eightieth year of his age. After his death the Syracusians erected a magnificent monument to his memory, which was afterwards demolished by Phœnix general of the Agrigentines. On this occasion Callimachus wrote a piece against Phœnix, wherein he introduced Simonides complaining of that general, for not shewing the same regard to him, which Caster and Pollux had shewn, when they rescued him from the danger he was in of being crushed under the ruins of a house that was ready to fall, as Phædrus relates in his fables.

The other Simonides was grandson of Simonides the elder, and flourished a little before the Peloponnesian war. He was, as Suidas informs us, author of the three books of inventions, and wrote as many of genealogies, whence the scholiast of Apollonius gives him the surname of the Genealogist. Bacchylides was nearly related to Simonides, and wrote some tragedies. Aristo was a Peripatetic philosopher of no mean character. Erasistratus was an eminent physician, the grandson of Aristotle, and flourished under Ptolemy Philadelphus or Antiochus Nicanor. He is said to have been the first who discovered that Antiochus Soter was in love with his mother-in-law Stratonice, as we shall relate in the history of that prince's reign. Erasistratus is mentioned by Pliny (36), Plutarch (37), Appian (38), Gellius (39), Valerius Maximus (40), &c.

was the birth-place of Cyadras, an eminent painter, mentioned by Dionysius and his commentator Eustathius. The cheese of Cythus was, according to Stephanus and Julius Pollux, in great request among the antients. The island is now called Thermia, from the Greek word Thermos, signifying hot, by reason it abounds with hot springs, which are much commended by the antients. There are some remains of an antient and very magnificent city on the southern coast.

Seriphus, now Serpho, is a barren rock rather than an island, Seriphus whence Tacitus calls it the Seriphian rock <sup>u</sup>. Pliny allows it only twelve miles in compass <sup>w</sup>; but, according to our modern travellers, it is thirty-six. The rugged and steep mountains of Seriphus gave the poets occasion to feign, that Perseus transformed the inhabitants into stones. Strabo tells us, that on this coast was found the chest, wherein Acrisius had shut up Perseus and his mother Danaë <sup>x</sup>. Origen speaks of the inhabitants of this island with great contempt <sup>y</sup>; but Herodotus lets us know, that the inhabitants of Seriphus, Siphnos, and Melos were the only islanders that refused to admit the fleet and troops of Xerxes <sup>z</sup>. The same author adds, that the Seriphians were originally Athenians, and that they assisted their countrymen with two galleys against the Persians. They were in antient times governed by kings; but of these we find one only mentioned in history, viz. Polydectes, and of him we know nothing but what we read in the poets. To this place the Romans confined enormous offenders. Here died Cassius Severus the famous orator, banished by Augustus for speaking with too much freedom; a fault which seventeen years of banishment in the isle of Crete had not cured him of <sup>a</sup>. Vestilia the wife of Labeo, being convicted of adultery, was sent to Seriphus to spend the remainder of her life there <sup>b</sup>. One Stratonicus, mentioned by Plutarch <sup>c</sup>, being banished to this island, found the place so very disagreeable, that he one day asked his landlord, what crimes were punished in his country with banishment? The Seriphian answered, Perjury. Why then, replied Stratonicus, don't you forswear yourself, that you may be banished from such an execrable place? Pliny <sup>d</sup> and Ælian <sup>e</sup> tells us, that the frogs of Seriphus are naturally mute, but as noisy as any others when transported out of the island. Jupiter, say the poets, struck the frogs dumb at the request of Perseus, who could not sleep here for the noise they made; but Theophrastus ascribes their silence to the chillness of the waters in this island. The waters as our modern travellers observe, are not colder here than elsewhere, nor the frogs less noisy <sup>f</sup>. However, this groundless report gave rise to the proverb, quoted by Stephanus and Suidas, As silent as a frog of Seriphus. This island abounds with mines of iron and load-stone, and had antiently a very convenient harbour. The onions of Seriphus are highly commended by Spon; they grow on small spots of ground between the rocks, and are cultivated by the inhabitants with extraordinary care, being the only commodity the island affords.

Melos.

Melos lies about twenty four miles off of cape Scyllæum, now Schilli, in Peloponnesus, is sixty miles in compass, and, according to Pliny <sup>g</sup>, almost round. This island, though small, made a very considerable figure in the flourishing ages of Greece. Melos, says Thucydides <sup>h</sup>, enjoyed its liberty seven hundred years before the Peloponnesian war. The inhabitants, says the same Thucydides <sup>i</sup>, were originally Lacedæmonians, and therefore refused in the time of the Peloponnesian war to join the Athenians, declaring, that they would maintain a strict neutrality, which they did accordingly. Stephanus and Festus will have the Melians to be a colony of Phœnicians, and the island to have borrowed its name from one Melos who led the colony. Be that as it will, the Melians could never be prevailed upon to join the other islanders and Athenians against the Lacedæmonians; which the Athenians resenting, sent Nicias with a fleet of threescore sail and two thousand land-forces to besiege the capital of the island. Nicias landed in the island, laid waste the country, but was obliged to raise the siege of the town, the Melians having made a more vigorous resistance than he expected <sup>k</sup>. Some time after the Athenians made another descent with three thousand men under the command of Cleomedes and Tisias, but could not reduce the town, till they were reinforced with new troops from Athens, which arriving with Philocrates brought the Melians to such streights, that they were forced to surrender at discretion. The Athenians, at the instigation of Alcibiades, treated them with great cruelty, putting to the sword all those who were able to bear arms, and carrying into Attica the women and children, where they were sold for slaves. The island being thus quite unpeopled, a new colony was sent thither from Athens. But not long after Lyfander the Lacedæmonian general, having obliged the Athenians in their turn to surrender at discretion, released the captive Melians, and restored them to their native country, after having driven from thence the Athenian colony <sup>1</sup>. Melos afterwards underwent the same fate as the other islands of the Ægean sea, that is, it fell under the yoke of the Romans, and was by them reduced with the other islands to a province. Melos was the birth-place of the philosopher Diagoras, who was the first, as Lactantius informs us, that asserted there were no gods, whence he had the surname of Atheist. This island abounds with iron mines, and was in former ages famed for its wine and honey; from the latter some are of opinion it took the name of Melos. Clemens Alexandrinus <sup>m</sup> and Julius Pollux <sup>n</sup> greatly commend the pastures and mineral waters of this island; but Hippocrates speaks of one, who, being cured of the itch by using the waters of Melos, fell into a dropsy, of which he died <sup>o</sup>. The allum of Melos was in great request among the Romans, who preferred it, as we read in Pliny <sup>p</sup>, to that of any other country except the Egyptian.

Siphnus, now Siphanto, is about thirty six miles distant Siphnus. from Melos, and, according to Pliny, twenty-eight in circumference, though our modern geographers allow it to be forty. It was antiently known by the names of Merope, or Merapia, and Acis. The name of Siphnus, if we believe Stephanus is of a later date, and borrowed from Siphnus the son of Sunion, who settled here with a colony. The air of Siphnus is exceeding wholesome, and the soil equally fruitful, producing great plenty of delicious fruits, and corn enough to support its inhabitants. The morals of the antient Siphnians were very depraved; whence it was proverbially said of persons leading a debauched and dissolute life, that they lived like Siphnians <sup>q</sup>. Siphnus had formerly several good harbours, and has still five very safe ones, viz. Faro, Vati, Chitriani, Chironisso, and Calanca. There were formerly here rich mines of gold, as Pausanias informs us <sup>r</sup>, and great plenty of lead; whence the inhabitants were reckoned very rich, and the island distinguished with the epithet of happy <sup>s</sup>. The- ophrastus <sup>t</sup>, Pliny <sup>u</sup>, and Isidorus <sup>w</sup> mention certain cups of stone made in Siphnus, which were in great esteem among the Romans. In the last century the Grand Signior sent some Jews to examine into the lead-mines; but the inhabitants, apprehending they should be obliged to work in them, bribed the captain of the vessel, which brought the Jews, to sink his ship; by which means the cargo of ore was lost, and the Jews, who designed to farm the mines, all drowned. Some time after other undertakers came upon the same errand, but as they met with no better success, the undertaking was dropt <sup>x</sup>.

Cimolis is separated from Melos by a streight, which is scarce a mile over. It is, according to Pliny, twelve miles in compass, and was antiently called Echinusa, or the island of Vipers. It is now known by the name of Argentiere, which it borrowed from the silver mines, with which it is said to abound. The present inhabitants shew these mines to strangers, but are afraid to meddle with them, lest the Turks should load them with taxes under pretence that they reaped great advantages from them. This island is a very barren place, and full of rocks and mountains. It is scarce ever mentioned in history, having always followed the fate of Melos. The terra Cimolia, or Cimolian earth, is greatly commended by Pliny <sup>y</sup>; it is a kind of chalk used by the present inhabitants, as it was by their forefathers in Pliny's time <sup>z</sup>, in washing linen and whitening it. The same author speaks of the medicinal virtues of this earth; but these it has no more at present, and perhaps never had. The whole island is covered with this sort of chalk, whence it is called by Ovid a chalky country <sup>a</sup>.

Prepesinthus.

Prepesinthus is a small island between Siphnus and Melos, about four miles in compass. It is mentioned only by Artemidorus and Strabo <sup>b</sup>, and contains nothing worthy of notice.

Oliaros.

Olearus, or Oliaros, mentioned by Strabo <sup>c</sup>, Pliny <sup>d</sup>, Virgil <sup>e</sup>, Ovid <sup>f</sup>, &c. is sixteen miles in compass, and separated from the isle of Paros by a streight seven miles over. This island was, according to Heracledes Ponticus as quoted by Stephanus, first peopled by a Phœnician colony from Sidon. This island, now known by the name of Antiparos, exhibits one of the greatest curiosities in nature, namely the vegetation of stones, which is described at length by a modern traveller, to whom we refer our readers <sup>g</sup>.

Naxos now Naxia, was formerly known by the names of Naxos. Strongyle, Dia, Dionysias, Callipolis, and Little Sicily. It was called Strongyle from a Greek word signifying round, though in reality it is rather square than round. The names of Dia or Divine, and Dionysias were given it as being consecrated in a peculiar manner to the fabulous god Dionysius or Bacchus. The name of Callipolis Pliny and Solinus derive from the metropolis of the island, formerly a most beautiful city, which is the import of the word Callipolis <sup>h</sup>. The great fruitfulness of the country gave rise to the name of Little Sicily, Naxos being the most fruitful of all the Cyclades, as Agathemerus informs us <sup>i</sup>, and no less fertile than Sicily itself. As for the name of Naxos, some tell us that it was borrowed from one Naxos, under whose conduct the Carians possessed themselves of the island; others pretend it received this name from Naxus the son of Endymion. Stephanus, Suidas, and Phavorinus derive the name of Naxus from the Greek word Naxai, signifying to sacrifice, and will have it to have been so called from the many sacrifices offered here to Bacchus. With these Bockart agrees as to its being called Naxos from the sacrifices performed here in honour of Bacchus, but will have the word Naxos to be a corruption of the Phœnician Nacsa or Nicfa, signifying a sacrifice or offering. Naxos is, according to Pliny <sup>k</sup>, seventy five, according to the present inhabitants, an hundred miles in compass. It has Paros to the west, Myconos and Delos to the north, and Ios to the south. This island is the most fruitful of the Archipelago, and was in former ages famed for the excellent wines it produced: Archilochus, as quoted by Athenæus, compares them to the nectar of the gods; and Asclepiades, cited by Stephanus, tells us, that Bacchus took more delight in Naxos than in any other place whatsoever, having himself taught the inhabitants to cultivate their vines. The wine of Naxos maintains to this day its antient reputation, being by some deemed the best of the Levant. Besides wine, this island abounds with all sorts of delicious fruits, the plains being covered with orange, olive, lemon, cedar, citron, pomgranate, mulberry, and fig-trees. It was formerly famous for quarries of that sort of marble, which the Greeks called Ophites, from its being green and speckled with white spots like the skin of a serpent. The ophrastus<sup>t</sup>, Pliny<sup>u</sup>, and Isidorus<sup>w</sup> mention certain cups of stone made in Siphnus, which were in great esteem among the Romans. In the last century the Grand Signior sent some Jews to examine into the lead-mines; but the inhabitants, apprehending they should be obliged to work in them, bribed the captain of the vessel, which brought the Jews, to sink his ship; by which means the cargo of ore was lost, and the Jews, who designed to farm the mines, all drowned. Some time after other undertakers came upon the same errand, but as they met with no better success, the undertaking was dropt<sup>x</sup>.

Cimolis is separated from Melos by a strait, which is scarce a mile over. It is, according to Pliny, twelve miles in compass, and was antiently called Echinusa, or the island of Vipers. It is now known by the name of Argentiere, which it borrowed from the silver mines, with which it is said to abound. The present inhabitants shew these mines to strangers, but are afraid to meddle with them, lest the Turks should load them with taxes under pretence that they reaped great advantages from them. This island is a very barren place, and full of rocks and mountains. It is scarce ever mentioned in history, having always followed the fate of Melos. The terra Cimolia, or Cimolian earth, is greatly commended by Pliny<sup>y</sup>; it is a kind of chalk used by the present inhabitants, as it was by their forefathers in Pliny's time<sup>z</sup>, in washing linen and whitening it. The same author speaks of the medicinal virtues of this earth; but these it has no more at present, and perhaps never had. The whole island is covered with this sort of chalk, whence it is called by Ovid a chalky country<sup>a</sup>.

Prepesinthus.

Prepesinthus is a small island between Siphnus and Melos, about four miles in compass. It is mentioned only by Artemidorus and Strabo<sup>b</sup>, and contains nothing worthy of notice.

best emeril is found here on mountains near the western coast, whence the neighbouring cape is called by the Italians Capo Smeriglio, or the Emeril Cape. As to the inhabitants of Naxos, Diodorus tells us, that the island was first peopled by the Thracians, who settled here on the following occasion.

Boreas had two sons, Butes and Lycurgus, by different mothers. Butes, who was the younger, entered into a plot against his brother; which being discovered, Boreas commanded him to leave Thrace and find himself some other habitation. Butes imbarqued with his accomplices, and steering his course to the Cyclades, possessed himself of Naxos, then called Strongyle, and lived upon plunder, seizing all the ships that sailed that way. But as Butes and his Thracians wanted women, and the neighbouring islands were either thinly inhabited or quite desolate, they sailed to Theffaly, and landing there seized upon some women, while they were celebrating the mysteries of Bacchus on a mountain near the shore called Diros. Butes having used violence on this occasion to Coronides, she made her complaints to Bacchus, who struck Butes with madness, which occasioned his death, he having thrown himself down a precipice and died of the fall. The other Thracians returned with the Theffalian women to Strongyle, carrying with them, amongst others, Iphimedia the wife of Aloeas and Pancratis his daughter, both women of extraordinary beauty. On their return they created Agassamenus king of the island in the room of Bates, bestowing upon him Pancratis, as he did Iphimedia on one of his intimate friends, whom he had appointed commander in chief of his forces. In the mean time Aloeas sent his two sons Otus and Ephialtes in quest of his wife and daughter. These landing in the island with a strong body of men, engaged the Thracians, routed them, took their metropolis by storm, and made themselves masters of the whole island. Not long after the two brothers fell out, which occasioned a civil war, wherein many were killed on both sides, and amongst the rest the two brothers by one another; but the Theffalians afterwards adored them as demigods or heroes. After the Theffalians had held the island for the space of two hundred years and upwards, they were at length obliged by a drought and famine to abandon it. After the Trojan war the Carians, being then powerful at sea, settled here, and called the island Naxos from their king, who was the son of Polemon. He was succeeded by his son Leucippus, and Leucippus by his son Smardius, in whose reign Theseus coming out of Crete landed here with Ariadne, whom he was, as Diodorus tells us, commanded in his sleep by Bacchus to leave in this island, which he did accordingly, and Bac- chus having retired with her to mount Arius, they both soon after disappeared † (W). In process of time a colony of Cnidians and Rhodians settled here, under the conduct of Hippothous and Xuthus; and last of all the Ionians, who by degrees possessed themselves of the whole island, whence the Naxians are by Herodotus called Ionians, and ranked among the Athenian colonies<sup>1</sup>.

Naxos was formerly a very flourishing republic, and by far the most powerful of the Cyclades, as Herodotus informs us<sup>m</sup>, and had several cities of note, amongst others Naxos the metropolis of the island mentioned by Ptolemy<sup>n</sup>; the present city of Naxia, which is the capital, was perhaps built on the ruins of the antient Naxos, whence it retains the same name.

THE Naxians were first governed by kings, as we have hinted above out of Diodorus, but afterwards formed themselves into a republic, and enjoyed their liberty till the time of Pisistratus tyrant of Athens, who having subdued Naxos bestowed it upon Lygdamis a native of the island, for having assisted him with men and money in usurping the sovereign power<sup>o</sup>. Upon the death of Lygdamis they recovered their liberty, and even possessed themselves of the neighbouring islands of Paros and Andros. In the reign of Darius Hystaspis, Aristagoras, governor of Miletus in Ionia, formed a design of surprizing Naxos, under colour of restoring the nobles, who had been driven out by the popular faction and taken refuge in Miletus. Darius furnished him with two hundred ships and a considerable body of land-forces to be employed in this expedition. But the Naxians, being forewarned by Megabates the Persian general, with whom Aristagoras happened to fall out, put themselves in a posture of defence, and obliged Aristagoras, after a siege of four months, to drop the enterprize, and retire to the continent. On the miscarriage of this expedition Aristagoras, as we have related in the history of Persia, revolted from the Persians, and prevailed upon the Ionians to join in his revolt, which brought endless calamities upon Ionia. Not long after the Persians made a second descent on Naxos, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes, and meeting with no opposition, the inhabitants having at their approach abandoned their habitations and fled to the mountains, they possessed themselves of the island, ravaged the whole country, and laid the city with its temples in ashes <sup>p</sup>. The Naxians, being thus brought under the Persian yoke, could not help sending some ships of war to their assistance in their expedition against Greece; but the officers, who commanded them, at the persuasion of Democritus, the most wealthy and powerful citizen of Naxos, instead of joining the Persians, went over with their ships to the Athenians. At the battle of Platæa the Naxians gave singular proofs of their valour, as we read in Diodorus Siculus, being above the other islanders zealous in the defence of the common liberties of Greece <sup>q</sup>. They were at that time, according to Herodotus, in a very flourishing condition, had a great number of slaves, a squadron of ships well appointed, and eight thousand land-forces <sup>r</sup>. In the Peloponnesian war they declared for the Athenians, as did most of the other islands of the Ægean sea; but, being treated by them more like subjects than allies, attempted to shake off the yoke. The Athenians sent a powerful fleet against them, besieged their capital, and forced them to accept what conditions Athens was pleased to impose. Thucydides observes, that Naxos was the first of the confederate cities which the Athenians deprived of their liberty <sup>s</sup>. From this time they continued subject to the Athenians till they fell into the hands of the Romans, which happened in the Mithridatic war. After the battle of Philippi Mark Anthony bestowed Naxos, Andros, and some other islands on the Rhodians, who oppressed them to such a degree, that he was soon obliged to drive them out, and restore those islanders to their former state of liberty, which they enjoyed till the reign of Vespasian <sup>t</sup>.

(W) The antients mention two women, who had the common name of Ariadne; and in honour of both festivals were yearly solemnized in the island of Naxos. The one was thought to be of a gay and pleasant temper; and therefore her festival was observed with music and many other expressions of joy and mirth. The other was the same whom Theseus is supposed to have left big with child on the coast of Naxos, and is said to have been of a melancholy disposition, whence the solemnity dedicated to her had a shew of sorrow and mourning. In memory of her being left by Theseus, it was usual on this occasion for a young man to lie down and counterfeit all the agonies of women in labour. This festival is said to have been first instituted by Theseus, to atone in some degree for his ingratitude to her (41).

WITHIN a stone's cast from Naxos is a rock, on which is still to be seen a very beautiful gate of marble, which the inhabitants call the gate of Bacchus's palace; but is without all doubt part of the magnificent temple, which the Naxians built here in honour of that god. For they had a tradition that Bacchus was born in their island, and educated among them by the nymphs Philiæ, Coronidis, and Cleidis, and that out of gratitude for the kindness shewn him in his infancy by the Naxians, he had taken the island under his protection, and on several occasions assisted them in a miraculous manner against their enemies. The gate we are speaking of is eighteen foot high, eleven foot three inches broad, and remarkably beautiful. This temple and the island on which it stood were joined to Naxos by a stone bridge, on which were to be seen in 1547 the conduits which served to convey the wine from Naxos into the cellars of the temple. This is what we learn from Benedetto Berdonio <sup>w</sup>; but our more modern travellers take no notice of this bridge.

THE island of Paros was antiently called Paëtia, Minoa, Paros. or Minoia, Demetrias, Zacynthus, Hyria, Hileassa, and Cabarnis <sup>x</sup>. The name of Cabarnis is borrowed, according to Stephanus, from one Cabarnus, who first acquainted Ceres with the rape of her daughter Proserpine; or, according to Hesychius, from the Cabarni, the priests of Ceres being so called by the inhabitants of this island. Bochart <sup>y</sup> tells us, that the word Cabarnis in the Phœnician tongue signifies to sacrifice, whence the priests were called in some places, such especially as had any communication with Phœnice, Cabarni, that is, sacrificers. The name of Minoa it borrowed from Minos king of Crete, who subdued this as he did most of the other islands of the Ægean sea <sup>z</sup>. It was called Paros, which name it retains to this day, from Paros the son of Parrhasius, or, as Stephanus will have it, of Jason the Argonaut. Paros, according to Pliny's computation <sup>a</sup>, is distant from Naxos seven miles and a half, and twenty-eight from Delos. Some of the modern travellers will have it to be fourscore <sup>b</sup>, others only fifty, miles in compass <sup>c</sup>. Pliny says it is half as large as Naxos, that is, between thirty six and thirty seven miles in compass. It was antiently a rich and powerful island, being called by Stephanus the most wealthy and happy of the Cyclades, and by Cornelius Nepos an island elated with its riches <sup>d</sup>.

The city of Paros, which was the metropolis of the island, is stiled by Stephanus a potent city, and said to have been one of the largest in the Archipelago; the present city of Paros, or, as the natives call it Parichia, is supposed to have been built upon its ruins, the neighbouring country abounding with valuable monuments of antiquity; the very walls of the present city are built with columns, architraves, pedestals, mingled with pieces of antient marble of a surprizing bigness, which were once employed in more noble edifices. Every one knows, that Paros was formerly famous for its marble, which was of an extraordinary whiteness, and in such request among the antients, that the best statuaries used no other<sup>e</sup>. Pliny tells us<sup>f</sup>, that the Parian marble and no other was made use of in adorning the frontispiece of the celebrated labyrinth in Egypt, which was counted one of the wonders of the world. The best quarries were those of mount Marpesus or Marpessus, mentioned by Virgil<sup>g</sup> and his interpreter Servius. In this mountain are still to be seen caverns of an extraordinary depth, which the modern inhabitants and travellers take to be the antient quarries. The quarries of Paros, if Pliny is to be credited, were so deep, that even in the clearest weather the workmen were obliged to use lamps, whence the marble was called by the Greeks Lychnites, that is, worked by the light of lamps<sup>h</sup>. The same author tells us, that in a block of marble, dug up in one of these quarries, when broken by the workmen, there appeared a beautiful representation of Silenus engraved on the stone by the hand of nature<sup>i</sup>. In one of the quarries, distant about four miles from the present city of Parichia, is still to be seen a basso-relievo cut in the rock, and containing twenty nine figures of nymphs and satyrs dancing a kind of brawl. This was done, as appears from the inscription, by one Adamas Odryses in honour of the nymphs. Though Pliny greatly commends the Parian marble, yet he prefers to it that of Luna in Italy, as being both whiter and of a closer grain<sup>k</sup>. The island is provided with several capacious and safe harbours, and was antiently much resorted to by traders. Archilochus, the inventor of the Iambic verse, was a native of Paros. Horace was in the right when he said, that rage armed him with Iambics<sup>l</sup>; for his verses were so satirical and biting, that Lycambes, against whom he wrote, hanged himself out of despair. Lycambes, after having betrothed his daughter to him, bestowed her upon another, which affront the poet revenged by composing those bitter invectives, which obliged Lycambes to lay violent hands on himself. His books were forbidden at Sparta for their wanton and obscene expressions, and himself banished the country. He was contemporary with Gyges king of Lydia. The author of the most valuable monument of antiquity now extant, that is, of the Oxford marbles, was born in this island, as Gassendus informs us<sup>m</sup>, but his name has not reached us. He lived, according to the learned Usher, in the third century before the christian æra. As to the inhabitants of Paros, this island was, according to Thucydides<sup>n</sup>, first peopled by the Phœnicians, who were before other nations masters of the sea. Afterwards the Carians settled here, as we are told both by Thucydides<sup>o</sup> and Diodorus<sup>p</sup>. But it is no easy matter to reconcile these two authors as to the time when the Carians came first into the island; for Thucydides tells us, that the Carians were driven out by the Cretans under the conduct of Minos; and Diodorus writes, that the Carians did not settle here till after the Trojan war, and that they found the Cretans in possession of the island. Stephanus is of opinion, that the Cretans mixed with some Arcadians were the only nations that ever possessed this island. Minos himself, if we believe Pliny<sup>q</sup>, resided some time in the island of Paros, and received here the melancholy news of the death of his son Androgeus, who was killed in Attica, after he had distinguished himself at the public games. When Hercules passed through Paros, going in quest of the girdle of Hippolita by order of Eurystheus, he found there Eurydemon, Chryses, Nephalion, and Philolaus, the sons of Minos, and with them a great many Cretans<sup>r</sup>.

As to the history of Paros, we find the inhabitants of this island chosen from among all the Greeks by the Milesians to compose the differences, which had for two generations rent that unhappy state into various parties and factions<sup>s</sup>. They acquitted themselves of this charge with great prudence, and reformed the government in the manner we have related in the history of Miletus. They joined Darius in his expedition against Greece, assisting him with a considerable squadron, but after the victory obtained by Miltiades at Marathon they were reduced to great straits by that general. The matter is thus related by Herodotus<sup>t</sup>: Miltiades having by his success at Marathon acquired a much greater reputation at Athens than he had before, demanded seventy ships of the Athenians with men and money in proportion, assuring them, without declaring his design, that he would lead them into a country, from whence they should bring home great riches without any manner of trouble. The Athenians, accepting the proposal with joy, prepared the ships, and Miltiades, being supplied with all things necessary for his enterprize, set sail for Paros, under colour of chastising the Parians for having assisted the Persians at Marathon. But the true motive of his expedition was his private hatred against the Parians, because one Lysagoras the son of Tiseus, who was of Parian extraction, had spoke ill of him to Hydarnes the Persian. Miltiades on his arrival at Paros besieged the capital, threatening to take it by storm and plunder the houses, unless the citizens sent him an hundred talents. The Parians, instead of granting him his demand, applied themselves wholly to the defence of their city, repairing the fortifications and working in the night, till they had made their walls twice as high as they were before, in that part where they were least defensible; insomuch, that Miltiades could not by any means make himself master of the city. That great general, seeing he could not reduce the Parians by force, had recourse to one Timo, priestess of the national gods, and then his prisoner, who advised him to perform some secret ceremony in the temple of Ceres near the city. Miltiades followed her advice, went directly to the inclosure of the temple, and after having endeavoured in vain to open the gate, mounted the wall and leaped down with a design to enter the sacred place. But while he stood before the door of the temple, being seized with a sudden terror, he resolved to return, and leaping down from the same place had the misfortune to break his leg. The ceremony either did not succeed, or was not at least attended with the promised success; for Miltiades, after having kept the city blocked up for the space of twenty six days, was obliged to drop the enterprize and return to Athens with disgrace<sup>n</sup>. Upon his departure, the Parians being informed of the counsel which Timo had given to Miltiades, and desirous to bring her to justice, sent deputies to consult the oracle of Delphos, whether they should punish her with death for endeavouring to betray the city to the enemy, and discovering the sacred mysteries to Miltiades, which it was a great crime to reveal to any man. The Py-

bian answered, That Timo was not the author of that advice, but that the gods, having determined to destroy Miltiades, had only made her the instrument of his death <sup>w</sup>. Cornelius Nepos likewise relates the siege of Paros by Miltiades, but varies in some particulars from Herodotus; for that writer tells us, that the Athenian general having invested the city by sea and land, reduced it to such straits, that the inhabitants desired to capitulate. But in the mean time a wood on the continent taking fire, by what accident was never known, the Parians imagined it to be a signal given them by the fleet of Darius advancing to their relief; whereupon they broke off the conferences, and would no more hearken to the terms offered them by the enemy. Miltiades likewise, apprehending that the Persian fleet approached, set fire to his engines, and weighing anchor returned to Athens, where he was condemned to defray the charges of that unsuccessful expedition, amounting to fifty talents <sup>z</sup>. Stephanus tells us, That the Parians had already agreed to surrender their city; but that a forest on the side of Mycone taking fire, and the Parians not doubting but it was a signal given them by the Persian general Datis, who was hastening to their relief, would not stand to their agreement; which gave rise to the proverb, To keep one's word after the Parian manner. by his success at Marathon acquired a much greater reputation at Athens than he had before, demanded seventy ships of the Athenians with men and money in proportion, assuring them, without declaring his design, that he would lead them into a country, from whence they should bring home great riches without any manner of trouble. The Athenians, accepting the proposal with joy, prepared the ships, and Miltiades, being supplied with all things necessary for his enterprize, set sail for Paros, under colour of chastising the Parians for having assisted the Persians at Marathon. But the true motive of his expedition was his private hatred against the Parians, because one Lyfagoras the son of Tiscus, who was of Parian extraction, had spoke ill of him to Hydarnes the Persian. Miltiades on his arrival at Paros besieged the capital, threatening to take it by storm and plunder the houses, unless the citizens sent him an hundred talents. The Parians, instead of granting him his demand, applied themselves wholly to the defence of their city, repairing the fortifications and working in the night, till they had made their walls twice as high as they were before, in that part where they were least defensible; insomuch, that Miltiades could not by any means make himself master of the city. That great general, seeing he could not reduce the Parians by force, had recourse to one Timo, priestess of the national gods, and then his prisoner, who advised him to perform some secret ceremony in the temple of Ceres near the city. Miltiades followed her advice, went directly to the inclosure of the temple, and after having endeavoured in vain to open the gate, mounted the wall and leaped down with a design to enter the sacred place. But while he stood before the door of the temple, being seized with a sudden terror, he resolved to return, and leaping down from the same place had the misfortune to break his leg. The ceremony either did not succeed, or was not at least attended with the promised success; for Miltiades, after having kept the city blocked up for the space of twenty six days, was obliged to drop the enterprize and return to Athens with disgrace<sup>a</sup>. Upon his departure, the Parians being informed of the counsel which Timo had given to Miltiades, and desirous to bring her to justice, sent deputies to consult the oracle of Delphos, whether they should punish her with death for endeavouring to betray the city to the enemy, and discovering the sacred mysteries to Miltiades, which it was a great crime to reveal to any man. quoted by Pliny, makes it an hundred and sixty, but our modern travellers agree with Pliny. This island had formerly a town of no small note bearing the name, as appears from an antient inscription still to be seen in the present town of Syra, and from many ruins of stately buildings at a small distance from the harbour. Syros, according to Homer's account of it, abounded with corn, wine, and all other necessities of life, and was reckoned one of the most healthy places of the Ægean sea, the plague never having raged there with any violence <sup>c</sup>. This island, as we learn from the same poet, was frequented in the earliest ages by the Phœnician merchants, who, after having passed a whole year here, carried off with them one of the concubines of Ctesias king of the place, she being a native of Sidon, and the daughter of Arybas king of that city. Pherocydes, one of the most antient philosophers of Greece, the disciple of Pittacus and master of Pythagoras, was born in Syros. Strabo, Porphyrius, Apuleius, and the author of the chronology of the olympiads tell us, that he was the first, or one of the first, that wrote in prose. Tzetzes says, he was the first who observed the periods of the moon and foretold eclipses; that he was the master of Thales the Milesian, and that he wrote ten books on the origin of the gods. He was the first, according to Cicero <sup>d</sup>, who taught the immortality of the soul. He is charged by Suidas with being the author of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls out of one body into another. He is greatly commended on account of his knowledgē by Dio-genes, Laertius, Apuleius, Jamblichus, Lactantius, Eustathius, &c. who all agree him to have been one of the greatest philosophers that Greece ever produced, and add, that he learnt his philosophy of the Phœnicians, being well acquainted with their language and books (X). Stephanus reckons Syros among

(X) Some writers tell us, that the Pherocydes was a native of Babylon, and in favour of this opinion quote Eustathius; but there is evidently a mistake in the passage which they alledge, since Eustathius in the very same place calls him a native of Syros. Some therefore in the text of that writer instead of Βαβυλώνιος read Βαβίης, as it is in Suidas and the chronology of the olympiads, or Βάδου, as in Laertius, that is, the son of Babis or Badis. Heracledes, Apuleius, Ælian, Pausanias, Porphyrius, and Jamblichus mention two other writers bearing the same name; the one of Athens and the other of the island of Leros; some take these two to be but one, born according to them in Athens, and brought up in Leros; others are mong the Ionian colonies; it is at present known by the names of Siro, Sira, and Zyra, and by many confounded with the island of Skyros, antiently Scyrus, which we shall describe in its proper place. Off the eastern coast of Syros lie three small islands called Gadronisi.

Myconus, lies between Icaria and Delos, about three miles distance from the latter, and is thirty six in circuit. It borrowed the name of Myconus or Mycone from one Myconus, the son of Ænius and grandson of Carystus and Rhyas<sup>c</sup>; but who these were, neither Strabo nor Stephanus his transcriber have thought fit to acquaint us. This island was long uninhabited by reason of the frequent and dreadful earthquakes to which it was subject; but they no sooner ceased, than the inhabitants of the adjoining islands settled in it, and built a town to which they gave the name of the island. The poets feigned, that the centaurs killed by Hercules were buried here, whence took rise the proverb, To place all things under one Mycone, applied to those, who under one and the same title touched upon quite different subjects<sup>d</sup>. Strabo, and after him Eustathius<sup>e</sup>, observes, that the Myconians grew bald very early, whence they were called by way of contempt, The bald heads of Mycone. Our modern travellers confirm Strabo's observation, assuring us, that the present Myconians lose their hair when twenty or twenty five years old<sup>f</sup>. Pliny tells us, that in this island children are all born are of opinion that there was but one Phercydes, and make the Athenian, Lerian, and Syrian one and the same person; and indeed the passages quoted out of the other two by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Germanicus, Hyginus, Marcellinus, Eusebius, and Suidas, seem to be taken out of the books, which have been ascribed to Phercydes of Syros. He was called the Athenian, say they, because he wrote a book, entitled, The genealogy of the Athenians; and as to the name of Lerian, it might have been given him because he lived some time in the island of Leros. Strabo nowhere mentions Phercydes of Leros, but often speaks of the other two, calling the one a philosopher and the other an historian. Cicero (42), the scholiast of Euripides (43), Macrobius (44), and Origen (45), quote Phercydes without mentioning his country; whence some have concluded, that there was but one writer of that name. Although it is no easy matter to decide this question, yet the authority of Strabo, a most accurate writer, is of more weight with us than that of our modern critics.

without hair, and that both men and women soon lose that ornament given by nature <sup>k</sup>. They were heretofore reckoned arrant parasites; whence Archilochus, as quoted by Athenæus <sup>l</sup>, taxes one Pericles with coming to a feast after the Myconian manner, that is without being invited. In this island there is great scarcity of water, but the wine it formerly produced is highly commended by Pliny <sup>m</sup>. Wheeler speaks of a medal which he purchased here, with Jupiter's head on one side, and a bunch of grapes on the other. Virgil gives the island of Mycone the epithet of high <sup>n</sup>, wherein he disagrees with Ovid, who calls it a low island <sup>o</sup>. But Virgil, in all likelihood alluded to mount Dimastos, mentioned by Pliny as the highest in the island <sup>p</sup>; since the island itself lies, according to Strabo, very low. Between Mycone and Delos, about a mile from the former, lies the isle of Tragonisi about three miles in compass. It formerly abounded with goats, whence it had the name of Tragonisi, or the goat-island.

Tenos.

THIS island was first called Hydrusia, from the Greek word bydor, signifying water, being more plentifully supplied with springs than the other islands; afterwards it had the name of Ophiusa, from the serpents which infested the island, the Greek word ophis signifying a serpent; and lastly the name of Tenos was given it from one Tenos, the first who settled here <sup>q</sup>. Bochart pretends the word Tenos to be derived from Tannoth, which, in the Phœnician language, signifies a serpent <sup>r</sup>, and answers the Greek word Ophiusa or Ophiussa. Pliny places Tenos one mile from Andros, fifteen from Delos, and says 'tis fifteen miles in extent. Tournefort will have it to be sixty miles in compass, Porchachi forty, and Ferrarius but five and thirty. It is very mountainous, but nevertheless produces great plenty of excellent fruit. The wine of Tenos was in great request among the antients; whence several medals of this island are still to be seen with bunches of grapes on the reverse <sup>s</sup>. The name of Tenos was common to the island and its capital <sup>t</sup>, which, according to Strabo, was not a great, but a well-built city, and had a stately temple in an adjoining grove dedicated to Neptune <sup>u</sup>. This temple and grove enjoyed the privileges of an asylum, which were abridged by Tiberius, as were those of the most famous temples in the Levant<sup>w</sup>. Philocorus, as quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus*, tells us, that Neptune was worshipped by the Tenians as the god of physic. Goltzius, Tristanus, and others exhibit several medals of this island representing Neptune, with his trident on the reverse; the serpent, which is on some medals joined to the trident, was among the antients an emblem of physic; besides, Tenos was antiently called Ophiusa, or the Snake-island, as we have observed already; and Hesychius tells us, that it was cleared of the serpents, which infested it, by Neptune, who, for that purpose, brought great flights of flocks into the island. The Tenians were once very powerful by sea, as Herodotus informs us<sup>y</sup>; but nevertheless were so terrified at the approach of the Persian fleet, that they submitted without making the least opposition, and assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Greece. This island afterwards underwent the same fate as the others of the Archipelago, being first subdued by the Athenians, who drove out the Persians, afterwards by the Macedonian princes, and lastly by the Romans.

THE island of Andros lies between Tenos and Eubæa, being Andros. distant from the former one mile, and ten from the latter<sup>z</sup>. Pliny will have it to be ninety three miles in compass; but the inhabitants say it is an hundred and twenty. The antients give it various names, viz. Cauros, Lasia, Nonagria, Epagris, Antandros, and Hydrusia. The name of Andros it borrowed from one Andreus, who was, according to Diodorus Siculus<sup>a</sup>, one of the generals, whom Rhadamanthus appointed to govern the Cyclades, after they had, of their own accord, submitted to him. Conon will have this Andreus to be the son of Anius, and grandson of Apollo and Creusa, and to have been the first who settled in this island. As to the name of Antandros, the same author tells us, that Ascanius the son of Æneas, being taken prisoner by the Pelasgians, gave them this island for his ransom, which, on that account, was called Antandros, that is, delivered for one man<sup>b</sup>. It had formerly a city of great note bearing the same name, and situated very advantageously on the brow of a hill, which commanded the whole coast<sup>c</sup>. There are still to be seen, about two miles from the present town of Arna, the ruins of a great and strong wall, with the fragments of many columns, chapiters, bases, broken statues, and several inscriptions, some of which mention the senate and people of Andros, and the priests of Bacchus; for in the town of Andros stood, as we read in Strabo and Pliny, a famous temple dedicated to that god. The territory of Andros was antiently, and is still, one of the most fertile and pleasant countries in the whole Archipelago, abounding with all kinds of delicious fruit, and watered with innumerable springs, whence it had the name of Hydrusia, a name given by the Greeks to all places plentifully supplied with water. Mutianus, as quoted by Pliny<sup>d</sup>, tells us, that near the temple of Bacchus was a spring, called the gift of Jupiter, the waters whereof had the taste of wine in the month of January, during the feasts of Bacchus, which lasted seven days. The same author adds, that the waters, if carried to a place whence the temple could not be seen, lost their miraculous taste<sup>e</sup>. Pausanias makes no mention of this spring, but says, that, during the feasts of Bacchus, wine flowed, or was at least by the Andrians believed to flow, from the temple of that god; the priests, no doubt, found their account in keeping up this belief by conveying through secret conduits a great quantity of wine into the temple. The Andrians were the first of all the islanders who joined the Persians; wherefore Themistocles, after the signal victory gained at Salamis, resolved to attack the city of Andros, and oblige the inhabitants to pay large contributions for the maintenance of his fleet. Having landed his men in the island, he sent heralds to the magistrates, acquainting them, that the Athenians were come against them with two powerful divinities, persuasion and force, and therefore they must part with their money by fair means or by foul. The Andrians returned answer, that they likewise had two mighty deities, who were very fond of their island, poverty and impossibility, and therefore could give no money. Themistocles, not satisfied with this answer, laid siege to the town<sup>f</sup>. Our historian does not acquaint us with the event of this undertaking; but we may suppose that the Athenian general made himself master of the place, since Pericles, as we read in Plutarch<sup>g</sup>, a few years after sent thither a colony of two hundred and fifty Athenians. It did not long continue subject to Athens, being re-taken by the Persians, and besieged in vain by Alcibiades, who, after having taken and fortified the castle of Gamium, left Draffobates in it with a strong garrison, and retired first <sup>h</sup>o Rhodes, and thence to the island of Cos<sup>h</sup>. This, as the other Greek islands, submitted to Alexander. After whose death it sided with Antigonus, who was driven out by Ptolemy, whose successors held it to the Roman times, when Attalus king of Pergamus besieged the metropolis at the head of a Roman army, and, having taken it, was by the Romans put in possession of the whole island. Upon the death of that prince, the people of Rome claimed the island of Andros, as well as his other dominions, in virtue of his last will<sup>i</sup>.

Gyarus, Gyara, or Gyaræ, lies near Delos, and is, according to Pliny<sup>k</sup>, twelve miles in compass. It is the most abandoned and disagreeable place of the whole Archipelago. In Strabo's time it had but one small village, and that inhabited by a few beggarly fishermen, who, after the battle of Actium, sent a deputation to Augustus, to obtain a diminution of their annual tribute, which was set at an hundred and fifty denarii<sup>l</sup>. We are told by the antient writers, that this island was once infested by swarms of field-mice of an extraordinary size, which, after having driven out the inhabitants, were forced to live upon the iron that was dug out of the mines, finding nothing else to subsist on in so barren a place<sup>m</sup>. It was not therefore without reason that the Romans used to banish offenders to this island; for they had not, in their wide-spreading dominions, a more wretched and uncomfortable place to send them to.

THESE are the islands counted by Strabo, Artimedorus, Pomponius Mela, Stephanus, and Scylax, among the Cyclades. We shall now proceed to Delos itself, and such islands as lie north of it on the coasts of Greece, Thessaly, and Thrace.

Delos, an island heretofore of great fame, but at present Delos: an inhospitable and abandoned rock, serving only for a retreat to pirates, is placed by Pliny at fifteen miles distance from Myconus, eighteen from Naxus, and fifty from Icaria<sup>n</sup>. But that writer was certainly mistaken in his measures with regard to Myconus and Naxus, the former being distant from Delos but three miles, and the latter forty. Delos was known to the antients by the names of Cynethos or Cynthos, Asteria, Pelaggia, Chlamydias, Lagia, Pyripilis, Scythos, Midia, and Ortygia<sup>o</sup>. It was named Ortygia and Lagia from the two Greek words ortyx and lages, the former signifying a quail, and the latter a hare, there being antiently great store of both in this island. The scholiast of Apollonius <sup>P</sup> says, it was called Ortygia from a sister of Latona bearing that name, and Cynethos from the son of Apollo. Pyrpilis Pliny derives from the Greek word pyr, signifying fire, which he pretends to have been first found out here <sup>4</sup>. As to the name of Delos, the etymologists all agree in deriving it from a Greek verb signifying to appear, but vary as to the reason of its being appropriated to the island before us. Pliny, after Aristotle, pretends that the name of Delos was given it, because it rose unexpectedly out of the sea, and appeared floating on the water <sup>1</sup>. Solinus thinks it was the first of the islands that began to appear after it had been with the others of the Archipelago for the space of nine months under water in the famous deluge that happened in the time of Ogyges. But this opinion is altogether groundless, and repugnant to reason; for, allowing all these islands to have been drowned in that deluge, yet the island we are speaking of could not appear the first after the waters began to retire, it being much lower than the islands of Andros, Tenos, Myconus, Syros, and Naxus. Stephanus tells us, that the name of Delos was given it on account of the oracle of Apollo, which made things, that were perplexed and obscure, clear and apparent. The poets will have it to be named Delos, because Latona, being delivered of Apollo and Diana, shewed herself first here, not having dared to appear before for fear of Juno. It is still called by the Greeks Dili or Deli in the plural, because under that name they comprehend another island known to the antients by the name of Rhenæa, which at some distance seems to be joined to Delos. These two the present inhabitants distinguish by the epithets of little and great; the Delos of the antients they stile the Little Delis, it being but seven miles in compass, whereas the other is eighteen. Pliny ranks Delos among the floating islands, and the poets tell us, that it was fastened, some say by Neptune, others by Apollo, with strong chains to the neighbouring islands of Gyarus and Myconus (Y).

As Latona was supposed to have been delivered in this island of Apollo and Diana, three most magnificent temples were erected here to these deities. That of Apollo was, according to Strabo<sup>c</sup>, begun by Eryfichton the son of Cecrops, but afterwards enlarged and embellished at the common charges of all the states of Greece. Plutarch tells us, that it was one of the most stately buildings in the universe, and speaks of an altar in it, which, in his opinion, deserves a place among the seven wonders of the world. It was a built with the horns of various animals, so artificially joined and adapted to one another, as to hang together without being fastened by any kind of cement<sup>e</sup>. The trunk of the famous statue of Apollo, mentioned by Strabo and Pliny, is still an object of great admiration to all travellers. It is without head, feet, arms, or legs; but, from the parts that are yet remaining, it plainly appears, that the antients did not exaggerate when they commended it as wonder of art. It was of a gigantic size, tho' cut out of one single block of marble, the shoulders being six feet broad, and the thighs nine feet round. At a small distance from this statue lies, amongst confused heaps of broken columns, architraves, bases, chapters, &c. a square piece of marble, fifteen feet and a half long, ten feet nine inches broad, and two feet three inches thick, which, without all doubt, served as a pedestal to this colossus. It bears, in very fair characters, this inscription in Greek, The Naxians to Apollo. Plutarch tells us, in the life of Nicias, that he caused to be set up near the temple of Delos, a huge palm-tree of brass, which he consecrated to Apollo; and adds that a violent storm of wind threw down this tree on a colossian statue raised by the inhabitants of Naxos<sup>u</sup>. Round the temple were magnificent porticoes built at the charges of various princes, as appears from inscriptions which are still very plain. The names of Philip king of Macedon, Dionysius Eutyches, Mithridates Euergetes, Mithridates Eupator kings of Pontus, and Nicomedes king of Bithynia, are found on several pedestals. and the latter a bare, there being antiently great store of both in this island. The scholiast of Apollonius <sup>P</sup> says, it was called Ortygia from a sister of Latona bearing that name, and Cynethos from the son of Apollo. Pyrpilis Pliny derives from the Greek word pyr, signifying fire, which he pretends to have been first found out here <sup>q</sup>. As to the name of Delos, the etymologists all agree in deriving it from a Greek verb signifying to appear, but vary as to the reason of its being appropriated to the island before us. Pliny, after Aristotle, pretends that the name of Delos was given it, because it rose unexpectedly out of the sea, and appeared floating on the water <sup>r</sup>. Solinus thinks it was the first of the islands that began to appear after it had been with the others of the Archipelago for the space of nine months under water in the famous deluge that happened in the time of Ogyges. But this opinion is altogether groundless, and repugnant to reason; for, allowing all these islands to have been drowned in that deluge, yet the island we are speaking of could not appear the first after the waters began to retire, it being much lower than the islands of Andros, Tenos, Myconus, Syros, and Naxus. Stephanus tells us, that the name of Delos was given it on account of the oracle of Apollo, which made things, that were perplexed and obscure, clear and apparent. The poets will have it to be named Delos, because Latona, being delivered of Apollo and Diana, shewed herself first here, not having dared to appear before for fear of Juno. It is still called by the Greeks Dili or Deli in the plural, because under that name they comprehend another island known to the antients by the name of Rhenæa, which at some distance seems to be joined to Delos. These two the present inhabitants distinguish by the epithets of little and great; the Delos of the antients they stile the Little Delis, it being but seven miles in compass, whereas the other is eighteen. Pliny ranks Delos among the floating islands, and the poets tell us, that it was fastened, some say by Neptune, others by Apollo, with strong chains to the neighbouring islands of Gyarus and Myconus (Y).

As Latona was supposed to have been delivered in this island of Apollo and Diana, three most magnificent temples were erected here to these deities. That of Apollo was, according to Strabo†, begun by Erysichton the son of Cecrops, but afterwards enlarged and embellished at the common charges of all the states of Greece. Plutarch tells us, that it was one of the most stately buildings in the universe, and speaks of an altar in it, which, in his opinion, deserves a place among the seven wonders of the world. It was a built with the horns of various animals, so artificially joined and adapted to one another, as to hang together without being fastened by any kind of cement‡. The trunk of the famous statue of Apollo, mentioned by Strabo and Pliny, is still an object of great admiration to all travellers. It is without head, feet, arms, or legs; but, from the parts that are yet remaining, it plainly appears, that the antients did not exaggerate when they commended it as wonder of art. It was of a gigantic size, tho' cut out of one single block of marble, the shoulders being six feet broad, and the thighs nine feet round. At a small distance from this statue lies, amongst confused heaps of broken columns, architraves, bases, chapiters, &c. a square piece of marble, fifteen feet and a half long, ten feet nine inches broad, and two feet three inches thick, which, without all doubt, served as a pedestal to this colossus. It bears, in very fair characters, this inscription in Greek, The Naxians to Apollo. Plutarch tells us, in the life of Nicias, that he caused to be set up near the temple of Delos, a huge palm-tree of brass, which he consecrated to Apollo; and adds that a violent storm of wind threw down this tree on a colossian statue raised by the inhabitants of Naxos§. Round the temple were magnificent porticoes built at the charges of various princes, as appears from inscriptions which are still very plain. from being happy, as is plain from the account we have given of his reign in the history of Sicily. As to Dionysius the elder, we find him every-where plundering and destroying the temples of the gods, even in his old age; we are therefore inclined to believe, that this Dionysius was tyrant of Heraclea; for both Memnon * and Diodorus Siculus * speak of one Dionysius tyrant of Heraclea, whose reign lasted thirty years, and was very happy. The ruins of the temple, which take up great part of the island, are carefully described by Spon, Wheeler, Tournefort, and others, to whom we refer our readers. To this temple the inhabitants of the neighbouring islands sent yearly a company of virgins, to celebrate, with dancing, the festival of Apollo and his sister Diana, and to make offerings in the name of their respective cities.

As Delos was the reputed birth-place of Apollo and Diana, it was highly revered by all nations, even by the Persians themselves, who, after having laid waste the other islands, and every-where destroyed the temples of the gods, spared Delos; nay Datis, who commanded the Persian fleet, would not even permit his ships to anchor in that harbour; but from Naxos, where he had committed great devastations and burnt the city with all its temples, he proceeded to Rhenæa. There he received intelligence, that the Delians had on his approach abandoned their island, and retired with their effects to Tenos; whereupon he sent a herald to them with this message: Sacred men, upon what account have you abandoned your habitations, and by your flight discovered the ill opinion you have of me? I am not your enemy by inclination; and besides, I have been commanded by the king to forbear practising any sort of hostilities in a country where two gods were born, or using violence of any kind against the inhabitants or the place. Return therefore to your houses, and resume the possession of your lands. Upon the return of the messenger, he sent the weight of three hundred talents of frankincense to be burnt on the altar of Apollo, and set sail with his whole fleet, without suffering any of his soldiers to land in the island. The Delians say, that, soon after his departure, the island was shaken by a violent earthquake, the first that had ever been felt there; and that Apollo thereby foretold the many calamities that were ready to fall upon the Greeks of that age; for the misfortunes they suffered under Darius, Xerxes, and Artaxerxes were far greater than all the evils they had undergone for twenty generations before, as our historian rightly observes<sup>1</sup>. In this island no hostilities were practised, even by nations that were at war with each other, when they happened to meet here. Of this we have an instance in Livy, who tells, that the Roman deputies, Caius Popilius, Caius Decimius, and Caius Hostilius, being obliged to put in at Delos on their voyage to Syria and Egypt, found the galleys of Perfes king of Macedon and those of Eumenes king of Pergamus anchored in one and the same harbour, tho' these two princes were then making war upon one another. The same author adds, that the Romans, Macedonians, and Pergameans, conversed and visited the temple together, as if they had been friends, the sanctity of the place suspending, to use Livy's expression, all manner of hostilities<sup>2</sup>.

THE offerings, that were made to Apollo in this island, were, according to an antient custom, first wrapped up in wheat-straw. This ceremony passed from the Hyperboreans to the Scythians, and from the Scythians spread gradually through the bordering nations, as far westward as the Adriatic sea, and southward to Dodona, the Dodonæans having been the first among the Greeks who embraced this custom. Afterwards it prevailed in the cities on the gulph of Mælis, in the island of Eubæa, and reached to Carystus. The Carystians introduced it among the Tenians, and these among the Delians. Thus was that ceremony first brought into Delos<sup>3</sup>. Our historian adds out of the antient Delian writers, that, long before the time we are now speaking of, the Hyperboreans had sent two young women, named Hyperoche and Laodice, to propagate this ceremony, appointing five persons of distinction to attend them, whose memory was in our historian's time in great veneration among the Delians. As none of those whom the Hyperboreans had sent out upon this errand, returned home, they dispatched others to the bordering countries, injoining them to introduce this ceremony among their neighbours, and prevail upon them to impart it to other nations. Thus, if we believe the Delians, these sacred rites were introduced, through many other nations and countries, into their island. The Hyperborean young women, Hyperoche and Laodice, are said to have died in Delos, where their memory was honoured by the Delian maids and young men in the following manner. The maids cut off a lock of their hair before marriage, which they used to put upon a distaff, and offer it to these Hyperborean virgins on their tomb, which was within the temple of Diana. The young men likewise offered their hair on the same monument, twisted round a small tuft of grass. In the same age, but before the arrival of Hyperocha and Laodice, two other Hyperborean women, Argis and Opis, landed in Delos, and brought into the island the first knowledge of the ceremony, which was afterwards established by the two former. Argis and Opis were on that account honoured with great solemnity by the Delian women, who used to assemble at stated times, and sing hymns in their praise, composed by one Olen a Lycian, the author of several other hymns sung in the island of Delos. The ashes of the sacrifices, which were burnt on this occasion, were thrown upon their sepulchres, which, in our historian's time, were still to be seen behind the temple of Diana <sup>b</sup>.

THE oracle of Apollo in Delos was one of the most famous oracles in the world, as well for its antiquity, as for the truth and perspicuity of its answers, the number and richness of the sacred presents dedicated to the god, and the multitudes of people that from all parts resorted thither for advice; in which respect it surpassed not only all the oracles of other gods, but those of Apollo himself, that of Delphos alone excepted. Some writers tell us <sup>c</sup>, that the island had the name of Delos from the answers that were returned here by the oracle in most clear and plain terms, without any ambiguity or obscurity; whereas in other places they were delivered in words capable of different, nay, opposite, senses: But these answers were not to be expected all the year; Apollo only kept his summer residence in this place, and in winter retired to Patara a city of Lycia <sup>d</sup>. The presents, which the votaries offered here to Apollo were laid on the altar which we have mentioned above. Some writers tell us, that this altar was erected by Apollo himself, when he was but four years old, and that it was formed of the horns of goats only, killed by Diana on mount Cynthus <sup>e</sup>. It was not lawful to sacrifice any living creature upon this altar, it being the will of Apollo, that it should be preserved pure from blood and all manner of pollution. The whole island enjoyed the privileges of an asylum, which extended to all living creatures, and on that account it abounded with hares, no dogs being suffered to enter it <sup>f</sup>. Pisistratus tyrant of Athens was commanded by an oracle, as Herodotus informs us <sup>g</sup>, to purify the island, which he did accordingly, causing the dead bodies to be taken up, and removed from all places within the prospect of the temple. In the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians, by the advice of an oracle, purified it anew, by digging up all the dead bodies, and carrying them over to the island of Rhenæa, where they were interred. Having thus cleared it from sepulchres and graves, in order to preserve it from pollution, they put forth an edict, whereby it was enacted, that for the future no person should be suffered to die, nor any woman to be brought to bed, in the island; but when they were near the time of the one or the other, they should be carried over into Rhenæa<sup>h</sup>. In memory of this purification, the Athenians instituted a solemn feast, which was celebrated every fifth year, people flocking on that occasion to Delos from the neighbouring islands and all parts of Greece. A few years after, the Athenians, to compleat the purification of the island, drove out all the antient inhabitants, whom they pretended to be polluted, on account of a crime by them committed in former times, but not mentioned by our historian. The Delian exiles retired to the continent, and settled in the city of Adramyttium, bestowed upon them by Pharnaces the Persian governor of Asia Minor. The Athenians suffered great losses, both by sea and land, after their expulsion; whereupon they soon recalled them, and put them anew in possession of the island. Some chose to remain in Adramyttium, where they were barbarously murdered by the command of one Astacus, deputy to Tissaphernes governor of Lydia<sup>i</sup>.

WE must not omit in this place the annual procession made by the Athenians to the island of Delos. The author of this ceremony was Theseus, who, being sent with other Athenian youths into Crete to be devoured by the Minotaur, made a vow to Apollo, that, if he granted them a safe return, they should make a solemn voyage to his temple in Delos every year. This was called Dorias; the persons employed in it Theori and Deliaſti, from the name of the island; the chief of them Architheoros, and the ship in which they went, Theoris or Delias, which was the very same that carried Theseus and his companions to Crete, being preserved, says Plutarch, by the Athenians, till the time of Demetrius of Phaleros; they restored always what was decayed, and put new planks in the room of the old ones, insomuch, that it furnished the philosophers with matter of dispute, whether, after so many alterations and reparations, it might be still called the same ship. The beginning of the voyage was computed, as Plato informs us <sup>k</sup>, from the time that the priest of Apollo first adorned the stern of the ship with garlands; and it was held unlawful to put any person to death till it returned: And this was the reason why Socrates was reprieved for thirty days after his condemnation <sup>l</sup>. Upon their arrival at Delos, they offered a solemn sacrifice, and celebrated a festival in honour of Apollo, and then repairing to their ships, sailed back to Athen, where they were received with great demonstrations of joy. Another feast was instituted by Theseus on his return from Crete, and celebrated every fifth year by the Delians, in honour of Venus, whose statue Theseus received from Ariadne, and left in that island. The chief ceremonies on this occasion were the following: They crowned the statue of the goddess with garlands, appointed horse-races, and performed a remarkable dance called the Crane, wherein they represented, by their motions, the various windings of the Cretan labyrinth, out of which Theseus, who was the inventor of the dance, made his escape <sup>m</sup>.

THE city of Delos took up, as is manifest from the magnificent ruins that are still to be seen, that spacious plain which reaches from one coast to the other, and extends eastward as far as the isthmus. It was well peopled, and the richest city of the Archipelago, especially after the destruction of Corinth, merchants flocking thither from all parts, both in regard of the immunity they enjoyed there, and of the convenient situation of the place between Europe and Asia. Strabo calls it one of the most frequented empories of the world <sup>n</sup>; and Pliny tells us, that all the commodities of Europe and Asia were sold, purchased, or exchanged there <sup>o</sup>. It contained many noble and stately buildings, namely, the temples of Apollo, Diana, and Latona, the porticoes of Philip of Macedon and of Dionysius Eutyches, a gymnasium, an oval basin, made at an immense expence, for the representation of sea-fights, and a most magnificent theatre.

Strabo <sup>p</sup> and Callimachus <sup>q</sup> tell us, that the island was watered by the river Inopus; but Pliny <sup>r</sup> calls it only a spring, and adds, that its waters swelled and abated at the same time with those of the Nile, as if there had been some communication between the Nile and the Inopus, which, in Strabo's opinion <sup>s</sup>, is carrying prodigies too far. At present there is no river in the island; but one of the noblest springs in all the Archipelago, being twelve paces diameter, and inclosed partly by rocks, and partly by a wall. Mount Cynthus, whence Apollo had the surname of Cynthius, is by Strabo placed near the city, and said to be so high as to cover the whole island with its shadow; but our modern travellers speak of it as a hill of a very moderate height. On mount Cynthus Latona is said to have been delivered of Apollo and Diana; whence it was looked upon by the antients as sacred. It is but one block of granite of the ordinary sort, cut out on that side which faced the city, in regular steps, inclosed on both sides with a wall. On the top of the mountain are still to be seen the remains of a stately building, with a Mosaic pavement, many broken pillars, and other valuable monuments of antiquity. From an inscription, which has been lately discovered there, and mentions a vow made to Serapis, Isis, and Anubis, some have conjectured, that on this hill stood a temple consecrated to these Egyptian deities, tho' no where spoke of by the antients.

THE island of Delos was, it seems, in antient times, governed by kings; for Virgil mentions one Anius reigning here in the time of the Trojan war. He was, according to that poet, both king, and high priest of Apollo, and entertained Aeneas with great kindness. This Anius was descended from Cadmus, and had by his wife Dorippe three daughters, Oino, Spermo, and Elais, who are feigned by the poets to have received from Bacchus the power of changing whatever they touched into wine, wheat or seed, and oil, as their names import, Oinos in Greek signifying wine, Sperma seed, and Elaion oil. The great quantity of wine, wheat, and oil, which accrued to their father Anius from the offerings made to Apollo, gave rise to this fable<sup>t</sup>. The Persians, as we have hinted above, allowed the Delians to enjoy their antient liberties, after they had reduced all the other Greek islands. In after-ages the Athenians made themselves masters of Delos, and held it till they were driven out by Mithridates the Great, who plundered the rich temple of Apollo, and obliged the Delians to side with him. Mithridates was, in his turn, dispossessed of it by the Romans, who granted the inhabitants many privileges, and exempted them from all sort of tribute and taxes. It is at present quite abandoned, the lands being so covered with ruins and rubbish, as not to admit of any sort of culture. The inhabitants of Mycone hold it now, and pay but ten crowns land-tax to the Grand-Signior for an island, which was once one of the richest countries in the world.

Rhenæa.

THE island of Rhenæa, Rhenia, or Rhene, is separated from Delos by a streight about five hundred paces over. It is now called the Great Sdili or Deli, and is about eighteen miles in compass. Polycrates tyrant of Samos, having made himself master of this island, consecrated it to Apollo, fastening it to Delos with a long chain <sup>u</sup>. It has excellent pasture grounds ; but nevertheless is at present quite abandoned, none daring to settle there for fear of the pirates who infest the Archipelago. On the coast facing Delos are still to be seen the ruins of a great city ; and near to the city was the burying-place of the Delians, as is plain from some inscriptions on tomb-stones found there. It is somewhat strange, that Strabo should call Rhenæa a little uninhabited island, since it is three times as big as Delos, and was, in former times so far as we can guess from the ruins of antient buildings, as well peopled as Delos itself.

Scyrus.

Scyrus, now Sciro, lies over-against Eubæa, from which it is about eight and twenty miles distant. It is sixty miles in compass, but a very barren and inhospitable country, being full of hills and rocks ; whence it had the name of Scyros ; that is, rugged or barren. However, in Strabo's time, it yielded excellent wine, and was famed, as the same author tells us, for its goats <sup>w</sup> ; but so unprovided with corn and all other necessaries of life, that any poor and barren country was proverbially called the principality of Scyrus <sup>x</sup>. The same writer commends the marble quarries of this island ; and Pliny speaks of a kind of stone found here, which swam when entire, and sunk when broken. Scyrus was, according to Plutarch <sup>y</sup>, first peopled by the Pelasgians and Carians (Z) ; but there is no mention made of it in history till the reign

(Z) Marciannus of Heraclea tells us, that after the island had been long held by the Pelasgians and Carians, the inhabitants of Chalcis, the capital of Eubæa, sent thither a colony, which settled on the coast, leaving the inland places to the antient proprietors. reign of Lycomedes, who was king of this island, when Theseus retired to it to take possession of his paternal estate. That prince, either jealous of the superior genius of Theseus, or not caring to provoke Mnestheus, who had driven him out of Athens, by entertaining the exile, led him to the top of a rock, under pretence of shewing him his father's lands, and from thence threw him treacherously into the sea *. In this island, and in the court of the same Lycomedes, Achilles lay concealed till he was discovered by Ulysses, and sent, with the other Greek princes, to war against Troy, which, according to the oracle, could not be conquered without his assistance. While he lived among the king's daughters, disguised under the apparel of a woman, he had by Deidamia, who was one of them, Neoptolemus, called Pyrrhus on account of his yellow hair. Neoptolemus was brought up in this island, and raised here the brave troops which he carried to the war of Troy, to revenge his father's death. Many ages after the Trojan war, Scyrus was reduced by the Athenians, under the command of Cimon, who, being ordered by an oracle to make diligent search after the bones of Theseus, used his utmost endeavours to find out the place where they had been buried. After he had searched in vain for a long time, he at last observed an eagle on a rising ground, digging up the earth with his beak and talons. This prompted him to search carefully the same place, where he discovered the coffin of a tall man, with a sword and pike lying by him. He made no further search, but taking for granted, that in the coffin was the body of Theseus, he put it on board a galley richly adorned and carried it to Athens, about 400 years after that hero's death †. The remains of so great a island, and used to seize and strip such as came to traffic with the Chalcidians and other inhabitants. Some of these being sentenced to restore to the merchants of Theffaly, the goods which they had taken from them, to prevent the execution of the sentence, betrayed the town to Cimon the Athenian, as we read in Thucydides (48). The city bore the same name as the island, and was famous for a magnificent temple built on the sea-side, in honour of Pallas, the tutelary goddess of the country. Of this temple, and of another dedicated to Neptune, there are still some remains to be seen near the present port called St. George's haven. Goltzius exhibits the type of a medal of this city, with Neptune holding his trident on one side, and the prow of a ship on the other.

man were received at Athens with great demonstrations of joy, and placed in the heart of the city, where they served as an asylum for offenders * (A). The island of Scyrus was taken from the Athenians by the Persians, but afterwards restored to them by the articles of the famous peace of Antalcidas. After the death of Alexander, to whom this island submitted, Demetrius, surnamed Poliorcetes or the Town-taker, made himself master of it, and restored the inhabitants to their antient liberty <sup>a</sup>, which they enjoyed, till they were with the other Greek states brought under the Roman yoke.

Sciathus.

FROM Scyrus Strabo proceeds to the islands of Sciathus, Peparethus, Icos, and Halonefus, which according to him lie in the Ægean sea, near the coast of Magnesia <sup>b</sup>. Sciathus, now Sciato and Sciatta, lies about four leagues north of Eubæa, is thirty miles in compass, and separated from the continent of Magnesia by a narrow streight <sup>c</sup>. Pomponius Mela places it more to the south, over-against the Pegasean bay, called now the gulf of Volo. It had formerly two cities, one of which, called also Sciathus, was demolished by Philip the father of Perfes, lest the Romans should seize it <sup>d</sup>. In the Roman times it served as a place of retreat for pirates; wherefore Bruttius Sura, having made himself master of it, crucified all the slaves he found in the island, and cut off the right hands of all the inhabitants he could seize <sup>e</sup>. Seneca calls it a barren and abandoned island, and such it is to this day, being uninhabited on account of the pirates who still continue to infest it.

Peparethus

Peparethus is placed by Stephanus in the neighbourhood of Eubæa, wherein he disagrees with all the antients, who speak of it as lying between the islands of Sciathus and Scyrus, thirty leagues from mount Athos, and eight from the coast of Magnesia. Some of the modern geographers, namely Benjamin, gave the island of Peparethus the name of Opula; others, as Niger, that of Lemene; and some, particularly Castaldus, call it Seraquino; but in the sea-charts it is commonly known by the name of Piperi. It is about twenty miles in circumference, and formerly abounded with excellent olives, as Ovid informs us<sup>f</sup>. Pliny boasts of the excellency of its wines, and tells us, that Apollodorus, a famous physician, in a book which he wrote about the choice of wines and dedicated to Ptolemy king of Egypt, preferred that of Peparethus to any other. The same author adds, that it was not in great request, as not being palatable, till it was seven years old<sup>g</sup>. From the excellence of its wines, it was called in the most early ages Eucænus, that is, producing good wine, or the wine-island<sup>h</sup>. In this island was formerly a city of the same name, which was destroyed, together with Sciathus, by Philip of Macedon, in his war with the Romans<sup>i</sup>.

(A) Solemn sacrifices were offered on this occasion; and, to perpetuate the remembrance of this event, a yearly contest for tragic writers was instituted, which became very famous, and greatly contributed to the improvement of dramatic compositions, by the emulation it excited among the tragic poets. On this occasion Sophocles brought his first performance on the stage, and won the prize, tho' he had Æschylus for his competitor; which the conquered poet, who, till that time, had been considered as the best tragedian of his age, not being able to brook, left Athens, and withdrew to Sicily, where he spent the remainder of his life.

Icos is by Stephanus counted among the Cyclades, and placed Icos near Eubæa; but by Livy<sup>k</sup> between the islands of Sciathus and Scyros. It is a very small island, but nevertheless had antiently two cities, whence it was also called Dipolis, Halonefus is placed by Pliny<sup>l</sup> between Samothrace and the Thracian Chersonesus at an equal distance, that is of fifteen miles, from both. But Strabo<sup>m</sup> and Mela<sup>n</sup> speak of it as lying between Icos and Scyros, over-against Magnesia. It had formerly a town of the same name, and, being claimed both by the Athenians and by Philip of Macedon, gave rise to a war, as Stephanus informs us, between those two powers. It is at present called Pelagnisi and Pelagisi. Halone-fus.

BETWEEN these islands on the coast of Magnesia and Lesbos on the coast of Asia, lies a small island, called by the antients Chryse, and now known by the name of S. Strato. There were formerly two islands bearing this name, whereof one, if Pausanias<sup>o</sup> may be credited, sunk into the sea, and never afterwards appeared. Chryse.

(B) Mount Athos reaches a great way into the sea, in the form of a peninsula, and is joined to the land by an isthmus twelve furlongs over. It extends towards the confines of Thrace and Macedon, between the gulfs of Strymon and Singum, of which the former is now called the gulf of Monte Santo, and the latter the gulf of Contessa.

the Thracian Chersonesus, being, according to Pliny's account <sup>P</sup>, distant twenty two miles from Imbros, eighty seven from mount Athos, twenty two from Samothrace, and five from Thasos. The same author makes it an hundred and twelve miles in compass ; and Stephanus tells us, that it was called Lemnos from Juno, whom the antient inhabitants worshipped under that name, sacrificing yearly to her a young woman. It was also called Hypsipylea, from the daughter of Thoas king of the island ; but is now known by the name of Stalimene or Stalimini. It had in former times two cities, Hephestias and Myrina. The former was the capital of the island, and took its name from Hephaistos or Vulcan, the tutelary god of the place, and is now known by the name of Cochino, as the latter is by that of Lemno and Stalimene. The country is full of hills and vales, which in some places are well cultivated, and produce all sorts of fruit. The eastern part of the island is dry and barren, but the country lying on the western and southern coasts, as it abounds more with springs, is very fruitful. It has two high mountains, one of which, called by Hesychius and Nicander Mespilæ, vomits flames like mount Ætna in Sicily ; and hence the island was called in antient times Æthalia, which Bochart derives from a Greek verb signifying to burn. The island was consecrated to Vulcan, whom the inhabitants worshipped as their tutelary god. They were believed to have been the first blacksmiths, which gave the poets occasion to feign, that Vulcan, when he was thrown down from heaven, fell in the island of Lemnos, where he built his forge. These fabulous opinions were recorded on their medals, some of which are still to be seen stamped with

Stephanus tells us, that it borrowed its name from a giant who lived in that neighbourhood. We may judge of its height by what the antient writers say of it, viz. that in the summer solstice its shade reached as far as the market-place of Myrina in the island of Lemnos ; that is, according to Pliny, eighty six miles. It is reckoned to be an hundred and fifty miles in circumference, and has been known since the Greek monks made it the place of their retreat, by the name of Monte Santo, or, the holy mountain. In the market-place of Myrina stood a statue of white marble, representing an ox, which being shaded by mount Athos, gave rise to the proverb, Mount Athos darkens the white ox of Lemnos, applicable to those, who, with calumnies and false reports, endeavour to tarnish the reputation of deserving men (49).

the head of a Vulcan, and his usual symbols, viz. his anvil, pincers, and hammer, which, according to the fictions of the poets, he used in making new thunderbolts for Jupiter. This island has ever been famous for a certain kind of earth, or rather chalk, called Terra Lemnia from the place, and Terra Sigillata, from the seal or character that is imprinted on it. Terra Sigillata. It has been always deemed an excellent remedy against poisons, stings of serpents, wounds, and bloody fluxes. In the time of Dioscorides they used to mix this earth with goats blood, and sell it made up in small pellets, each pellet being sealed with the figure of a goat. This manner of preparing it was no more used in Galen's time ; for that great man undertook a voyage to Lemnos, with no other view but to inquire, on the spot, into the nature, virtue, and qualities of that wonderful earth. He tells us, that it was then dug up with a great many religious ceremonies ; that the priests went in procession to a rising ground, at a small distance from the city of Hephestias, the only place where they supposed this earth to be found ; and there, after sowing a certain measure of wheat and barley, and performing other mysterious ceremonies, they loaded a cart with the earth, which they attended in procession to the city. The ceremonies described by Galen have been long since abolished, and others, which are still practised, brought in probably by the Venetians in their room ; for on the sixth of August, and on no other day, all the chief men of the island, whether Turks or Christians, assemble at a chapel called Sotira, standing half way between the city, or rather the village, of Cochino, and the hill where the earth is found, to the top of which they walk in procession. There the Caloyers or Greek priests read their liturgy ; which being done, certain persons appointed for that purpose, begin to dig, and having discovered a vein of the earth they look for, give notice thereof to the Caloyers, who fill with it certain small hair sacks, delivering them to the Turkish governor and other officers there present. When they have taken up as much as they think proper, they fill up the place again, and return in procession to the city. Some of the bags are sent to the Grand Signior, and the rest, marked with his seal, or with those two words, Tin Imachton, that is, sealed earth, sold by the Sangiack, or his deputies, to the inhabitants and foreign merchants. The Sangiack is accountable to the Grand Signior's treasury for the money arising from the sale of the whole which is yearly disposed of, it being a capital crime for any of the inhabitants to keep in their houses, export, or any ways dispose of it, without the governor's governor's knowledge and licence. There is no doubt, but earth of the same nature might be found in other places of the island; but none of the orientals would make use of it, unless it were dug up with the usual ceremonies, and in the presence of the Caloyers; nay, it would be in no request among them, as our modern travellers inform us, unless it were dug up on the usual day, the sixth of August.

The Labyrinth.

THE labyrinth of Lemnos is much spoke of by the antients, and, in the opinion of Pliny<sup>9</sup>, preferable to those of Egypt and Crete. It was a magnificent building, supported by forty columns of extraordinary height and thickness. The architects, employed in raising this admirable edifice, were Zmilus, Rholus, and Theodorus, a native of the island. Some remains of this stately fabric were still to be seen in Pliny's time; but Belonius tells us, that he could not discover, in any part of the island, the least vestiges of it.

THE most antient inhabitants of Lemnos were the Sapeans and Sintians, a people of Thrace, to whom Homer gives the epithet of hoarse. These inhabited the island before the expedition of the Argonauts, whose descendants, known by the name of Minyans, settled here, but soon abandoned the country, and retired to the city of Lacedæmon, from whence they went to Triphilia, and stopt in the neighbourhood of Arena, in a country which in Strabo's time was called Lypefia<sup>r</sup>. Many years after their departure from Lemnos, the Pelasgians, being driven out of Attica, possessed themselves of this and the adjacent islands, and governed them according to their own laws, till they were brought under subjection to Athens by Miltiades. As to the motive which prompted the Athenians to drive them out of Attica, there is a great disagreement among authors, some pretending that they were justly expelled, and others maintaining, that the Athenians therein were guilty of the greatest injustice and treachery. Herodotus leaves the cause undecided, and only relates what was reported by writers of both sides. Hecatæus (C),

(C) Hecatæus was a native of Miletus, flourished, according to Suidas, in the sixty fifth olympiad, and wrote the lives of Cyrus and Cambyses. Laertius says, that he was a disciple of Heraclitus. He is frequently mentioned by Herodotus, who tells us, that Hecatæus, being at Thebes in Egypt, had the vanity to give out, that he was descended from one of the Egyptian deities, whereby he became the

as quoted by him <sup>c</sup>, tells us, that the Athenians seeing the lands about Hymessus, which they had given to the Pelasgians in payment for the wall they had built round the Acropolis or citadel of Athens, improved, from a barren and unprofitable soil, into a fruitful and well cultivated country, drove them out without any provocation whatsoever, and resumed the country which they had bestowed upon them. On the other hand, the Athenians affirm, that the Pelasgians, while they were possessed of the country under mount Hymessus, frequently offered violence to their sons and daughters, who were sent for water to a place called the nine fountains. They add, that the Pelasgians, not contented with these attempts, conspired to possess themselves of Athens itself; which conspiracy being detected, the Athenians, to shew themselves as generous as the others had been base, instead of punishing with death, as their treachery deserved, commanded them only to depart the country. The Pelasgians, being thus driven from Attica, passed over into Lemnos, and settled there; but desiring to be revenged on the Athenians, they fitted out a fleet, and having laid an ambuscade for the Athenian women, as they celebrated the feast of Diana in Brauron, they surprized a great many of them, carried them to Lemnos, and there kept them for concubines. These women having many children by the Pelasgians, taught their sons the language of Attica and manners of the Athenians. Being thus brought up, they not only refused to converse with the sons of the Pelasgian women, but if any of their number was injured or abused by the Pelasgians, they all conspired to revenge the injury. By this means they gained such an ascendant over the sons of the the scorn of the priests of the country (50). The same author informs us, that he did all that lay in his power to dissuade Aristagoras from engaging in a war with the Persians, and sending colonies into Sardinia. Besides the lives of the two above-mentioned princes, he wrote, it seems, other books; for Stephanus cites the first and fourth books of his Genealogies, Harpocratian the second, and Athenæus the third. Stephanus, Athenæus, and Rufus Festus quote a description of Asia, Europe, and Libya compiled by Hecatæus; but Callimachus, in his catalogue of authors, ascribes this work to another Hecatæus, whom he surnames the Islander. Diodorus Siculus and Pausanias tell us, that the history of Hecatæus, as likewise those of Cadmus and Hellanicus, was full of fables.

Pelasgian

Pelasgian women, that they were obeyed by them, as masters are by their slaves. The Pelasgians, observing this their haughty behaviour, concluded, that if they began so early to usurp a superiority over the children of their lawful wives, they would not fail to treat them as their slaves when they attained to man's estate. This apprehension made so deep an impression in their minds, that they resolved to murder the children they had by the women of Attica; which they did accordingly, extending their cruelty likewise to the mothers. After this barbarous murder, their lands, as we are told, became barren, their wives unfruitful, and their flocks did not yield the usual increase; whereupon they sent persons to consult the Delphian oracle, about the means they might use to be delivered from their calamities. The Pythian advised them to give satisfaction to the Athenians in the manner they should require. Having received this answer, they dispatched ambassadors to Athens, declaring, that they were ready to undergo any punishment the Athenians should think fit to impose upon them, for the injuries they had received at their hands. The Athenians hearing their offer, prepared a magnificent feast in the Prytaneum, and shewing them the tables furnished with all kinds of provisions, commanded them to surrender their country in as good a condition. The Pelasgians answered, that they would comply with their command, when a ship should come in one day with a north wind from the territories of Athens to their island. This they conceived impossible, Athens lying to the south of Lemnos; but, in virtue of this solemn promise, Miltiades many years after summoned them to deliver up their island to the Athenians.

As to their government, it was at first monarchical; but Thoas is the only king of Lemnos we find mentioned in history. In his reign, and, if we believe Herodotus<sup>t</sup>, with his assistance, the Lemnian women killed all the males of the island, with a design to turn Amazons; from which action, and the murder of the Athenian women, which happened long after, any black treachery or cruel murder was called a Lemnian action<sup>u</sup>. Other writers tell us, that Thoas whom Homer honours with the epithet of divine, was no ways concerned in the above-mentioned murder, but saved by the piety of his daughter Hypsipyle in the common slaughter of all the other males, as we have related in a former volume<sup>w</sup>. Some writers tell us<sup>x</sup>, that she was banished the island for sparing her father ; others, that she was raised to the throne, and reigned in Lemnos when the Argonauts touched at that island. Jason, say they, by whom she had two children, and the other Argonauts, were so kindly entertained by her and her female subjects, that they stopt there two years, and almost forgot their intended expedition into Colchis for the golden fleece<sup>1</sup>. The Lemnians, after having enjoyed their liberty for many ages, were at last reduced by Miltiades, under the power of the Athenians, in the manner we have related elsewhere<sup>2</sup>. In process of time they shook off the Athenian yoke, but were again subjected to their antient masters by the Romans after the Macedonian war, and continued in that state till Sylla made them tributary to Rome.

Imbros, now Embro and Lembro, lies over-against the Imbros. Thracian Chersonesus from which it is divided by a narrow strait, being distant, according to Thucydides<sup>3</sup>, from Lemnos two and twenty miles, and two and thirty, as Pliny informs us<sup>4</sup>, from Samothrace. The same Pliny makes it twenty seven miles in circumference ; but the modern travellers only twenty. It had antiently a very safe harbour on the east shore, and a city bearing the name of the island. The whole island was sacred to the Cabiri and to Mercury ; whence it is stiled by Homer the divine Imbros. In honour of these deities an annual solemnity was kept by the Imbrians, Lemnians, and Samothracians ; and such as were initiated into their mysteries were thought effectually secured against storms at sea and all other dangers<sup>5</sup>. The chief ceremony was this : the person who was to be initiated, being crowned with olive-branches, and girt about his loins with a purple ribband, was placed upon a throne, round which the priests and persons already initiated danced and sported<sup>6</sup>. Imbros, like the other islands of the Ægean sea, was governed some time by its own laws, but afterwards subjected to the Persians, Athenians, Macedonians, and to the kings of Pergamus. At the peace concluded between Philip and the Romans, it was by the latter delivered up to the Athenians, who held it till Rome, becoming powerful in the east, reduced this and the other islands to a Roman province.

Thasos or Ibassus lies on the coast of Thrace, at a small distance from the mouth of the Nessus. It was formerly known by the names of Odonis, Æria, Æthria, Ogygia, Æte, Ceresis, and Chryse. This last name it borrowed from its rich mines of gold much spoken of by the antients. It was called Thasos from Thasus the brother of Cadmus, who settled here, and built a city of the same name, as Herodotus<sup>e</sup> and Conon<sup>f</sup> inform us. It is about forty miles in compass, and so fruitful, that the fertility of Thasos was used by the antients by way of proverb, to express a country yielding great plenty of all the necessaries of life<sup>g</sup>. The wine of Thasos is highly commended by Apuleius<sup>h</sup>, and the Thasian marble by Seneca<sup>i</sup>. This island was first peopled by the Phœnicians, whom Cadmus, while he was going in search of his sister Europa, left here under the conduct of his brother Thasus, as we hinted above. Some ages after, the inhabitants of Paros sent a colony hither, being directed by an oracle to build a city in the island of Æria, and to send thither a sufficient number of citizens to people it<sup>k</sup>. The city of Thasos was besieged in vain by Histiæus tyrant of Miletus; but afterwards taken and dismantled by Darius Hytaspis king of Persia. The Thasians did not continue long subject to the Persians, but laid hold of the first opportunity that offered to join the Greeks against the common enemy, entering into an alliance with the Athenians, from whom they revolted after the battle fought on the river Eurymedon in Pamphylia. The Thasians had made themselves masters of the gold mines in Thrace between the rivers Nessus and Strymon; these the Athenians laid claim to, and the Thasians refusing to part with them, Cimon was sent against them with a mighty fleet. That brave commander engaging them at sea gained a complete victory, and laid siege to their metropolis. The Thasians, not finding themselves in a condition to make head against so powerful an enemy, had recourse to the Lacedæmonians, who promised to make a diversion by invading Attica; but were prevented by their domestic troubles from performing the promise they had made. However, the Thasians with their own strength made a most obstinate defence, but, being without any hopes of relief, submitted to the Athenians in the third year of the siege upon very disadvantageous terms, viz. to raze their walls; to deliver up their galleys; to pay the usual tribute; and to quit the mines, and whatever else they possessed on the continent<sup>l</sup>. In the twenty-first year of the Peloponnesian war, they revolted anew from the Athenians, who were for establishing an oligarchy in their city, and with the assistance of the Lacedæmonians recovered their antient liberty, after having driven out all those who were attached to the interest of Athens<sup>m</sup>. They maintained themselves a free people till the time of Alexander, to whom they submitted of their own accord, and continued subject to the kings of Macedon, till they were delivered from the Macedonian yoke, and declared free by one of the articles of the peace concluded between Philip the father of Perfes and Flaminius the Roman consul<sup>n</sup> (D).

Samothrace was antiently known by the names of Melites, Leucasia, Samothrace, or Lucania, Saocis, Electria, and Dardania. It was called Dardania, according to Pliny<sup>o</sup> and Pausanias<sup>p</sup>, from Dardanus, who retired thither. The same authors add, that it changed the name of Dardania into that of Samothrace, from the time that a colony of Thracians, mixed with some fugitives from the island of Samos, settled there. But Diodorus Siculus<sup>q</sup> pretends, that the Amazon Myrina, in the course of her conquests on the coast of the Ægean sea, consecrated this island to Cybele under the name of Samothrace, a term, says he, then used to signify a consecrated place. Before, and in the time of, the Trojan war, it was called Samos, and distinguished from Samos on the coast of Ionia, and from Cephalenia named likewise Samos, by the epithet of Thracian, Imbrian, or Lemnian. It is by Homer constantly styled the Thracian Samos, which appellation the Latins, as Virgil<sup>r</sup> informs us, changed into that of Samethracia.

(D) Stesimbrotus, who is frequently quoted by Plutarch, was a native of Thasos, and contemporary with Cimon, as Plutarch observes in the life of that great commander. The same writer owns, that in his lives of Themistacles, Cimon, and Pericles, he took several particulars from the history of Stesimbrotus. Tatian mentions this historian in the book he wrote against the Gentiles. The etymologist on the word ἰδαῖος tells us, that this author's book was intitled, of the beginnings or origins, and that in the said book he maintained the Idæi Dactyli to be the sons of Jupiter, and the nymph Ida. Fulgentius (51) quotes Stesimbrotus the Thasian in his account of the death of Polycrates tyrant of Samos. He is also cited by Apollonius and others (52).

Strabo<sup>c</sup> is of opinion, that it took the name of Samos from a Greek word signifying high, this island being one of the highest in the Ægean sea. Hence Priscian styles it the high Samos, and Homer<sup>d</sup> tells us, that from this island mount Ida, the city of Troy, and the Greek and Trojan camps, might be seen. It is, according to Pliny<sup>e</sup>, about two and thirty miles in compass, two and twenty distant from Lemnos, two and thirty from Imbros, and eight and thirty from the coast of Thrace. The modern travellers place it only at three leagues distance from the coast of Thrace, and allow it but twenty miles in circumference. As to the first inhabitants of Samothrace, Diodorus tells us<sup>w</sup>, that there is nothing handed down to posterity relating to them, which we may depend on. Others say<sup>x</sup>, that it was first peopled by Thracians, and that after their arrival in the island, the Pelasgians, Sami, and Phœnicians, sent thither numerous colonies. They had antiently a peculiar language not understood by any other people of Greece, whereof some words were still used in the worship of their gods, when Diodorus Siculus wrote his history<sup>y</sup>. The island of Samothrace was famous on account of the worship paid there to the gods called Cabiri (E), who

(E) There is such a disagreement among authors in their accounts of these deities, that, notwithstanding all the mythologists have said of them, we are still in the dark as to many particulars, and can only form a confused idea of their nature, origin, and attributes. Bochart (53) derives their name from the Hebrew word Cabir, that is, great and powerful. This opinion he confirms with the authority of Euthymius and Cedrenus. The former tells us, that the Saracens, who had been idolaters, to the time of the emperor Heraclius, worshipped Venus under the name of Cabab, that is, the great or powerful; the latter observes, that the same people gave the name of Cubar to the constellation of Venus; whence Bochart infers, that the gods Cabiri were the great and powerful gods; and indeed they are frequently so styled by the writers of the earliest ages. But Stephambrotus, as quoted by Strabo (54), says they were called Cabiri or Cabires from Cabirus, a hill in Phrygia, where they were worshipped in a very solemn manner. It is no less perplexing to discover who the Cabiri were,

who were had in so great veneration, that it was thought an act of irreverence even to pronounce their names. All the great heroes than to trace out the origin of their name. Some confine the number of the Cabiri to two, viz. Jupiter and Bacchus; but Manesias enumerates four, Ceres, Proserpine, Pluto, and Mercury, whom he disguises under the mysterious names of Axioros, Axiokersa, Axiokersos, and Kasmilos; to these Dionysiodorus adds a fourth, whom he styles Casmilus, called by others Camillus, and the same with Mercury; but he was looked upon as one of an inferior rank, and, if we believe Varro (55), only as an attendant or servant of the Samothracian deities. The same author tells us, that by the great gods of Samothrace, were meant only the heaven and earth. Several writers have confined the appellation of Cabiri to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. Dionysius Halicarnassensis and Cassius Hemina, as quoted by Macrobius, took the Cabiri to be the same as the Dii Penates, or household gods. Dardanus, say they, brought them from Samothrace into Phrygia, whence they were carried into Italy by Æneas. In a Greek inscription quoted by Alexander ab Alexandro they are called Dioskouroi, which appellation being also given by the antients to Castor and Pollux, some have thought them the sons of Jupiter by Calliope or Proserpine. The most common opinion is, that they were the sons or grandsons of Vulcan; this the Egyptian priests held, as Herodotus informs us (56), and some medals are still extant, which seem to confirm this opinion. Galinius exhibits two, one of the city of Theffalonica, the other of the emperor Claudius, surnamed the Goth; on the reverse of both is a Cabir, as appears from the Greek inscription, with a hammer in his hand, which symbol signifies, as all the mythologists agree, his being of the race of Vulcan. Thus some writers make the Cabiri to have been the first who introduced and taught the art of working iron. A modern writer endeavours to prove, that the Cabiri were the same as the Curetes, Corybantes, and Telchines. The latter were called by the Greeks, Destroyers, being supposed to make use of the secrets of magic to hurt mankind. The Telchines were deemed the authors of all the miseries which laid waste the earth; and the ignorant populace imagined they could by their enchantments raise storms, and bring plagues, famines, and diseases, whenever they pleased (57). All we can infer from the various accounts of the antient mythologists, which are but an odd jumble of contradictions, is, that the Pagans themselves were ignorant of the origin of these imaginary deities. However, they were worshipped in several parts of Greece and Asia, chiefly in the heroes of antiquity were initiated into the mysteries of these deities. Such as were admitted to partake of the sacred ceremonies used to meet in a wood, which became a place of refuge for offenders, and was more respected than even the temple of Delphos, or the island of Delos. To this island Perſes king of Macedon fled for refuge, and took up his habitation in a temple dedicated to Caſtor and Pollux, hoping, that the Romans would not prophane a ſanctuary revered by all the nations of the world ; and indeed the Romans did not make any attempts upon his life or perſon ſo long as he ſtaid there ; for the pagans carried their prejudices ſo far in favour of the pretended deities, that they were ſtruck with an awful dread upon the bare mention of their names. Of all the oaths that were in uſe among the antients, that by the gods of Samothrace was deemed the moſt ſacred and inviolable. Such as were found not to have obſerved this oath were looked upon as the curſe of mankind, and perſons devoted to deſtruction. Diodorus<sup>2</sup> tells us, that theſe gods were always preſent, and never failed to aſſiſt thoſe who were initiated, and called upon them in any ſudden and unexpected danger ; that Jaſion, Di- cities of Lemnos, Theſſalonica, Thebes, Rhodes, &c. Pauſanias tells us, that the country of Pergamus was conſecrated to the Cabiri, and that they had a temple at Memphis in Egypt, which no one, except the prieſt who performed the ſacred rites, was allowed to enter (58). Lactantius ſpeaks of a god named Cabirius, to whom the Macedonians paid a particular worſhip. But the iſland of Samothrace was, as it were, the center of the ſuperſtitious ceremonies obſerved in honour of the Cabiri. There, and no-where elſe, people were initiated into their mysteries. Thoſe who were to be admitted were placed on a kind of throne, and crowned with laurel, having bands of purple tied round their bellies. Then the prieſts and others there preſent danced round them, and this ridiculous mummary ended in oaths and execrations on the perſon, who ſhould ever reveal what paſſed in their aſſemblies. Heſychius tells us, that even children were initiated, their parents fancying them, when under the protection of the Cabiri, ſafe from thunder, lightning, tempeſts, and all ſorts of dangers. Several writers, namely Clemens Alexandrinus and Dochart, have collected the various opinions of the fabulous ages concerning the names origin, number, mysteries, offices, and worſhip of the Cabiri, and their ſiſters, called the Caturiges ; to theſe we refer our readers for a more full account of what relates to the Samothracian deities.

oscurus, Hercules, Orpheus, &c. being initiated into their rites, prospered by their favour in all their wars, and that none ever duly performed their ceremonies without being amply rewarded for their piety.

Diodorus Siculus speaks of an inundation, which laid great part of Samothrace under water, drowned all the cities on the coast of Asia, and overwhelmed several islands in the Ægean sea, some of which never afterwards appeared. In Samothrace the waters rose to such a height, that they not only covered the champain country, but reached near the tops of the highest mountains, and changed the face of the whole country. This deluge is supposed to have happened before the Argonautic expedition, and is said to have been occasioned by the overflowing of the Pontic sea; which being swelled by the waters of the many great rivers that fall into it, discharged itself through the Bosphorus Thracius into the Propontis, and through the Hellepont into the Egean sea. When the waters abated, the inhabitants of Samothrace consecrated to the gods the places where they had been preserved, erecting altars, and offering up yearly sacrifices in memory of their deliverance. This they continued to do in Diodorus's time, who adds, that even then chapiters of pillars and other pieces of architecture were frequently found under water; which shews, says he, that this deluge is not a poetical fiction, but real truth<sup>a</sup>. In the opinion of the antients the Pontus Euxinus was only a lake or standing pool, which being overcharged with waters broke first into the Propontis, and then into the Egean, washing away by degrees the earth, which kept it within its first bounds, and forming the two channels of the Bosphorus Thracius and the Hellepont, which Hellepont in the sense of the antients is another Bosphorus, that is, an arm of the sea narrow enough for an ox to swim over. In the hypothesis of the antients the Palus Mæotis, the Pontus Euxinus, the Propontis, and Mediterranean were originally so many lakes, which, after having broke down, as it were, the dikes that parted them, with the impetuosity of their waters, opened themselves a passage between the mountains of Atlas and Calpe into the ocean. It is perhaps more likely, that the ocean, having with the impetuosity of its waters dismembered the mountain of Calpe from the lands of Africa, poured itself into that vast space now called the Mediterranean, and penetrating to the north produced the Propontis, the Pontus, and the Palus Mæotis.

AFTER the abovementioned deluge, one Saon a native of Samothrace, the son of Jupiter and Nympha, as some say, or as others will have it, of Mercury and Rhena, gathered the inhabitants, before living scattered and dispersed, into a body, made laws for their better government, and divided them into five tribes, which he called after the names of his sons. Some time after the government was thus settled, Dardanus, Jasion, and Harmonia were born in the island. They were the children of Jupiter and Electra one of the daughters of Atlas. Dardanus passed over into Asia, where he founded a new kingdom, which was afterwards called the Trojan kingdom from the city of Troy built there. Jupiter, desirous likewise to advance his other sons to a high degree of honour and reputation, discovered to them the rites of the sacred mysteries antiently observed, but then newly revived, in the island, which it was not lawful for any to see, but those who were initiated. About this time Cadmus, arriving in the island to seek after his sister Europa, was initiated into the sacred mysteries, and married Harmonia the sister of Jasion. Jasion married Cybele, by whom he had Corybas, who, after his father's death, passing over into Phrygia with his mother and Dardanus, taught the Phrygians the mysteries of Cybele. Corybas called those who celebrated the sacred mysteries of his mother, after his own name, Corybantes <sup>b</sup>.

THE island of Samothrace was in antient times governed by its own kings; for Coritus, Dardanus, and his brother Jasion are said to have reigned there, as we have related elsewhere <sup>c</sup>. The monarchical form of government gave place to the republican, which continued till the island was reduced by the Persians. Alexander restored this, as most of the other Greek islands to the enjoyment of their antient liberties; but his successors in the kingdom of Macedon brought the Samothracians again into subjection. The Romans after the defeat of Perfes declared them a free people; whence Pliny <sup>d</sup> styles Samothrace a free island. They lived according to their own laws from the reduction of the kingdom of Macedon to the reign of Vespasian, who reduced all the states of Greece to a Roman province <sup>e</sup>.

(F) The Ionian gulf, or the Ionian sea, lies between Sicily and Greece, extending from the island of Cyete to the Acroceraunian hills in Epirus, or, as others will have it, to the city of Apollonia in Macedonia.

coast of Greece, of which the most northerly is that of Sasón, lying between Aulon, now La Valona, a city of Macedon, and Brundisium in Italy at the entrance of the Ionian sea. Lucan counts it among the islands of Italy <sup>f</sup>, and Ptolemy <sup>g</sup> among those of Macedon. It is mentioned by Polybius <sup>h</sup>, Scylax <sup>i</sup>, Mela <sup>k</sup>, Pliny <sup>l</sup>, &c. and described by Silius Italicus as a barren, sandy, and inhospitable place <sup>m</sup>.

Corcyra, now Corfu, was in more ancient times called Corcyra, Drepane, Scheria, and Phæacia. The name of Corcyra, which was also given to another island lying in the Adriatic, over-against Illyricum, it took from a nymph so called, whom Neptune is said to have ravished in this island. It is about forty five miles in length, twenty two in breadth, and two hundred and ten in compass. Corcyra was once famous for the delightful gardens of king Alcinous, who with great courtesy entertained Ulysses after his shipwreck <sup>n</sup>. The southern parts of the island are barren, mountainous, and but indifferently provided with water; the northern coast is very fruitful, and yields all kinds of delicious fruit, excellent wines, olives, all sorts of grain, &c. whence it is stiled by Homer the fruitful Scheria <sup>o</sup>. It had antiently two cities of no small note, viz. Corcyra and Cassiope; the former was the metropolis of the island, and once very powerful, as appears from Thucydides and others, who have given us an account of their wars; the latter is commended by Pliny <sup>p</sup> and Ptolemy <sup>q</sup> as a wealthy and well-built city; but Cicero calls it only a haven <sup>r</sup>. This island is said to have been first inhabited by the Phæaces, whence it was named Phæacia; but afterwards the Corinthians sent thither a numerous colony, which made Thucydides <sup>s</sup> reckon Corcyra among the countries peopled by the Corinthians. The Corcyreans were skilful mariners, and, as the same Thucydides informs us, for some time masters of the sea. Their government was first monarchical; but afterwards they formed themselves into a republic, and made a very considerable figure in the flourishing times of Greece. Herodotus tells us <sup>t</sup>, that they were very powerful by land, and had more ships than any other people of Greece, except the Athenians. That author greatly blames them on account of their deceitful conduct with respect to the assistance they promised the Greeks against Xerxes; for, being invited by the Athenian and Lacedæmonian ambassadors to join in the common cause, they readily promised to send powerful succours, assuring them, that they would not neglect the safety of Greece in so imminent a danger, well knowing that, if the enemy prevailed, they should soon be reduced to the condition of slaves. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians departed well satisfied with this answer; but the Corcyreans having fitted out a squadron of sixty ships sailed to the coast of Peloponnesus, and having anchored about Pylus and Tænarus, waited in that station to see the event of the war, being resolved to join the party that should prevail. When news was brought them that the Persians were defeated at Salamis, they left their station, and joined the rest of the Greeks, pretending that they had been prevented by the Etesian winds from doubling the cape of Malea, and being present at the battle <sup>w</sup>. Their war with the Corinthians and Epidamnians, which brought on the Peloponnesian war, and the dreadful sedition which happened in their island (whence all seditions, when terrible in their effects, were stiled Corcyrean) we have related elsewhere *. The Corcyreans submitted to Alexander, and continued subject to his successors kings of Macedon, till they were delivered by the Romans in the reign of Perfes, from which time they enjoyed their liberty till the reign of Vespasian, when they underwent the common fate of the other islands and Greek states both in Europe and Asia.

Macedon. It was so called either from Ionius the son of Dyrrhacius, Hercules having given it that name to preserve the memory of his friend whom he had killed by mistake, and thrown into the sea; or from Ionia, a country, according to Solinus, in the extremity of Calabria; or from Io, the daughter of Inachus, as Lycophron has it.

BETWEEN Corcyra and the continent lie two small islands, called by Strabo <sup>y</sup> and Thucydides <sup>z</sup> Sybota; and at a small distance from the eastern coast of Corcyra, the island of Ptychia, which Ptolemy confounds with a city of that name in the island of Corcyra, but Thucydides describes it as a distinct island. Five miles east of Corcyra are the islands Paxi or Paxæ, mentioned by Pliny <sup>b</sup>, and other antient writers, but containing nothing remarkable. They are but two in number, and at present known by the names of Paschu and Antipaschu. Pliny enumerates several other islands on the coast of Epirus,

Leucas, now known by the name of Santa Maura, was Leucas. ] antiently a peninsula, joined to the main land of Acarmania by an isthmus, which was cut by the Carthaginians, or, as others will have it, by the Corinthians. We have described this island elsewhere<sup>c</sup>, and therefore shall only add here, that in the middle of it was a stately temple consecrated to Venus the mother of Æneas, who is supposed to have landed here on his voyage to Italy. Homer speaks of three cities of no small note in this country, viz. Nericus, Crocylea, and Agylipe. Isaac Vossius is of opinion, that in the time of Thucydides it was still a peninsula, since that historian, in describing the countries of Leucas and Acarmania, makes no mention of the isthmus being cut<sup>d</sup>. In Homer's time it was, without all doubt, joined to the land, since he calls it the coast of Epirus<sup>e</sup>. It is about seventy miles in compass, and was in antient times called Neritis, as Pliny informs us<sup>f</sup>.

THE islands known to the antients by the names of Taphiæ and Teleboides, lay to the east of Leucas, near the coast of Achaia. They were so called from Taphus and Telebous the sons of Pterelas, and grandsons of Neptune by Hippothoe the daughter of Nestor<sup>g</sup>. Bochart<sup>h</sup> derives the name of Taphiæ from from the Hebrew word bataph, which signifies to rob, the inhabitants of these islands being antiently famous pirates. The Echinades were five small islands on the coast of Acarmania over-against the mouth of the river Achelous, from which the farthest distant is but fifteen furlongs, and the nearest only five. They were thought to have been formed by the mud, which this river carried into the sea; whence arose the fable of their having been once sea-nymphs, but afterwards by the god Achelous changed into islands<sup>i</sup>. Some writers tell us, that they were called Echinades from the Greek word echinos, because that part of the Ionian abounded with sea-bogs. They are now known by the name of Curzolari. Dulichium, which formerly belonged to Ulysses, is counted by Strabo<sup>k</sup> among the Echinades.

Ithaca, between Dulichium and Cephalenia, was once famous for being the birth-place of Ulysses the son of Laertes. Ithaca.

It is about five and twenty miles in compass, and at present known by the name of Val di Compare. It had a town in former times bearing the name of the island, and situated, according to Homer<sup>1</sup>, at the foot of mount Neius, which by most geographers is thought to be the same with mount Neritus mentioned by Virgil<sup>m</sup>. Pomponius Mela<sup>a</sup> mistakes mount Neritus for another island in the Ionian sea.

Cephale-
nia.

Cephallenia, or Cephalenia, known in Homer's time by the names of Samus and Black Epirus, or Epirus Melæna, is about eighty miles in length, forty in breadth, and a hundred and thirty in compass. It had antiently four cities, but Ptolemy takes notice of one only, which bore the name of the island. Strabo tells us, that in his time there were only two cities remaining; but Pliny<sup>p</sup> speaks of three, and adds, that the ruins of Same, which had been destroyed by the Romans, were still to be seen. Same was the metropolis of the island, and is supposed to have stood in the place which the Italians call Porto Guiscardo. The names of the four cities were, according to Thucydides, Same, Prone, Cranii, and Palæ<sup>q</sup>. This island was subdued by the Thebans under the conduct of Amphitryon, who is said to have killed Pterelas, who then reigned here. While Amphitryon was carrying on the war in Cephallenia, then called Samos, one Cephalus, a man of great distinction at Athens, having accidentally killed his wife Procris in shooting at a deer, fled to Amphitryon, who, pitying his case, not only received him kindly, but made him governor of the island, which thenceforth was called Cephallenia. After it had continued long subject to the Thebans, it fell under the power of the Macedonians, and was taken from them by the Ætolians, who held it till it was reduced by M. Fulvius Nobilior, who, having made himself master of the metropolis after a four months siege, and sold all the citizens for slaves, added the whole island to the demesnes of his republic<sup>r</sup>. The island of Zacynthus, which lies twelve miles south of Cephallenia, we have described at length elsewhere<sup>s</sup>, and therefore shall proceed to the Strophades, which are two small islands lying over-against Arcadia in Peloponnesus, and now known by the name of Strivali. They are about thirty five miles south of Zacynthus, and, according to Strabo<sup>t</sup>, four hundred furlongs from the continent, the largest of the two being but five miles in compass. They were first called Plotæ, that is, swimming islands, as Pliny informs us <sup>u</sup>, and afterwards Strophades, from a Greck verb signifying to return, because Zethus and Calais, the winged issue of Boreas and O-rithyia, are feigned to have pursued the Harpyes to these islands, and thence to have returned, being admonished by Iris or Jupiter to give over the pursuit. Virgil describes them as frequented in the time of Æneas only by these ravenous monsters <sup>w</sup>. At present they are inhabited by Greek friars, who, to the number of thirty, live there, and enjoy the islands to themselves. In one of them there is a fine spring of fresh water, which is said to have its fountain in Peloponnesus, and to pass under the sea. The other islands mentioned by Pliny <sup>x</sup>, as lying between Zacynthus and the Asinean gulf, are Letoia or Letoa, now Cristina, near Cephalenia, the three Sphagiæ or Sphaçteriæ, opposite to Pylus of Messenia, and as many known by the name of Oriusæ, lying over-against the city of Messene. The islands of Sphaçteriæ are famous in history for a victory gained there by the Athenians over the Lacedæmonians, after which Cleon possessed himself of the islands, taking the Lacedæmonians who garisoned them prisoners <sup>y</sup>. These islands are now called Le Sapienze, and the sea round them the sea of Sapienza. In the Laconic gulf are, according to Pliny, the following islands Teganusa, Cothon, and Cythera. Teganusa, or Theganusa, is placed by Strabo <sup>z</sup> and Pausanias <sup>a</sup>, not in the Laconic, but the Messenian gulf, before the promontory Acritas, between Metho and Caron, two cities of Messenia. Pomponius Mela <sup>b</sup> places Cothon in the Ægean sea, and Salmasius on the coast of Africa, but Stephanus agrees with Pliny. Over-against Gythium in Peloponnesus lies the small island of Cranae mentioned by Pausanias <sup>c</sup>, and said by Homer to have been the first place, where Paris stopt as he was carrying off Helena <sup>d</sup>.

Cythera, now Cerigo, lies over-against Malea, a promontory of Laconia, from which it is distant, according to Strabo <sup>e</sup>, forty furlongs. It was named Cythera, if Stephanus is to be credited, from one Cytherus a Phænician, who is said to have settled here. Before his arrival it was known by the name of Porphyris or Porphyrißa, either because it abounded with porphyry, as Solinus is of opinion, or by reason the best scarlet was dyed here, as Stephanus affirms on the authority of Aristotle. It is about sixty miles in compass, blessed with a fruitful soil, and has several havens, one especially very safe and capacious, called antiently Scandea, about ten furlongs from the city of Cythera, a city once famous for the temple of Venus, surnamed Urania, or Heavenly. In this temple, which was believed to be the most antient which Venus had amongst the Greeks, was a statue of that goddess in complete armour, holding, like Pallas, a javelin in her hand. She is said, upon her first springing out of the froth of the sea, (for such was her origin) to have been by gentle zephyrs carried to this island, and from hence to Cyprus; on which account both islands were in a peculiar manner sacred to her. From Cythera Venus had the surname of Cytherea, often used by Virgil and other poets. We have already related how this island, formerly subject to Lacedæmon, was reduced by the Athenians under the conduct of Nicias †, and therefore shall pass to the other islands. In the Argolic bay Pliny places the following §, Pityusa, Irine, Ephyre, Tipareus, Aperopia, Colonis, Aristeria, and Calauria. This last lay, according to Strabo <sup>h</sup>, in the bay of Hermione over-against Træzen, a maritime city of Argia, from which it was distant four furlongs, being thirty in compass. It was famous for a temple consecrated to Neptune, and an asylum <sup>i</sup>. Here Demosthenes poisoned himself, and was buried within the inclosure of the temple <sup>k</sup>. The other islands contain nothing remarkable.

IN the Saronic gulf (G) are the islands of Ægina and Salamis, both equally famous in antient history. The former was antiently

It was named the Saronic gulf according to Pliny (60) from a grove of oaks called by the antient Greeks Saronides. Some derive this appellation from a city, others from a harbour, and some from a river, which fell into this bay (61). It was also called the bay of Salamis from the island of that name, tiently known by the names of Oenone or Oenopia<sup>1</sup>, and Myrmidonia; but Æacus, who reigned here, called it Ægina, from his mother the daughter of Asopus king of Bœotia (H). It was called Myrmidonia because inhabited by the Myrmidones, so famous among the poets. It lies between the territory of Athens and that of Epidaurus, a city of Argia, being distant eighteen miles from the coast of Athens, and fourteen from Peloponnesus. It is about twenty six miles in compass, and had antiently a city of the same name<sup>m</sup>, which being destroyed by an earthquake, the inhabitants were exempted by Tiberius for the space of three years from paying any kind of tribute<sup>n</sup>. Pausanias <sup>o</sup> speaks of two magnificent temples in this island, the one consecrated to Venus, the other to Jupiter; the ruins of a stately edifice, which are still to be seen at a small distance from the present village of Engia, are probably the remains of one of these temples. The country is said to have been at first very stony and barren, but being inhabited by a laborious and thriving people, who, digging up the earth, cleared it of the stones, it became very fruitful. From this their industry they were surnamed Myrmidones, that is, emnets, as Strabo informs us<sup>p</sup>, and not because the emnets, as the poets feign, were, at the prayers of Æacus, changed into men to repopulate the island, after all the antient inhabitants, king Æacus alone excepted, had been swept away by a plague. This island was first peopled by the Epidaurians, and bay of Elenfis from that city. The entrance into the Saronic gulf is formed by two promontories, that of Sunium on the side of Attica, now stiled Capo delle colonne, from certain columns that are still standing there, and supposed to be the remains of the temple of Minerva; and that of Scylla, now Capo di Scilli, on the side of Peloponnesus. The bay, where broadest, is three and twenty miles over, its length twenty five, and its compass fourscore (62). Strabo and other geographers call the islands in this gulf the Æacides, because they were held by the descendants of Æacus the son of Jupiter and Ægina.

who were originally Dorians, and afterwards by colonies from Crete and Argos<sup>a</sup>. These were in process of time driven out by the Athenians, who, making themselves masters of the island, divided the lands among themselves, but did not hold them long, being driven out by the Lacedæmonians, who restored the island to the antient proprietors<sup>c</sup>. The Myrmidones were not a distinct people from those we have already mentioned, this being only a surname given to the inhabitants on account of their industry. The Æginetes applied themselves very early to trade and navigation, and sent colonies into the neighbouring islands, namely Imbros and Crete, the city of Cydon in the latter having been built, according to Strabo<sup>d</sup>, and peopled by them. In the time of Amasis king of Egypt they erected a magnificent temple in Neucratis, a city of that country, to Jupiter, following therein, as Herodotus informs us<sup>e</sup>, the example of the Samians, who, in the same kingdom, had built one in honour of Juno. Ephorus, as quoted by Strabo<sup>f</sup>, tells us, that the first money was coined in Ægina by one Phidon. Pliny commends the brass of this island, preferring it even to that of Delos, and adds, that the famous statue of brass, representing an ox, which stood in the forum boarium at Rome, was carried from hence to adorn that capital<sup>w</sup>.

THE Æginetes were first governed by kings, and afterwards formed themselves into a republic, which in process of time became so powerful as to vie with Athens herself. The first king that reigned there was Actor, the son of Dioneus, and grandson, as the poets feign, of Æolus. He was born in Phocis, whither his father Dioneus, or, as others call him, Deion, had carried a colony out of Æolia; from Phocis he led a colony into Phthia, where he married Ægina, the daughter of Asopus king of Bæotia, and, by a second migration, went into the island of Oenone, where he settled. By his wife Ægina he had three sons, Æacus, Mænetius, and Irus. Æacus the eldest succeeded his father Actor in the kingdom of Oenone, which he called from his mother's name Ægina, and peopled with new colonies invited thither from the continent and neighbouring islands. His piety and justice in the administration of public affairs gave rise to the fable of his being appointed by Pluto judge of the Europeans after their death. He had by his first wife, named Endeis, Telamon and Peleus, and by Pfamathe, his second, Phocus. Telamon and Peleus, conspiring against Phocus, put him to death, on which account they were both banished the island by their father. Æacus is said to have assisted the Athenians against Minos king of Crete, and to have been the first who paid divine honours to Hercules. His descendants were called Æacidae, and are much spoken of by all the antients, having reigned in different countries, and most of them attained to a great pitch of power and glory. Cicero observes<sup>2</sup>, that they were for the most part better warriors than statesmen; and Justin, that few of them attained to the thirtieth year of their age. Æacus was, according to Arnobius<sup>1</sup>, about two generations older than the Trojan war, and the first who built a temple in Greece. As to the successors of Æacus in the island of Ægina, we are quite in the dark. The monarchical form of government being abrogated, the Æginetes became subject, on what occasion we know not, to the Epidaurians, depending upon them, as Herodotus<sup>2</sup> informs us, in all things, and particularly in matters relating to the administration of justice. But afterwards applying themselves to navigation, and the building of ships, they acquired great power by sea, revolted from the Epidaurians, ravaged their territory, and carried off, among other things, the two famous statues of Damias and Auxesias (I). This gave rise to

(I) The Epidaurians, seeing their country become unfruitful, sent to consult the oracle of Delphos about the cause of that calamity. The Pythian answered, that if they erected statues in honour of Lamia, or, as Herodotus calls her, Damias, and Auxesias, their affairs would prosper. Lamia and Auxesias were two virgins, who, coming from Crete to Træzen, a city of Argia, in time of a tumult, had fallen a sacrifice to the fury of the people, by whom they were stoned to death. The Epidaurians, having received the abovesaid answer, consulted the oracle anew to know whether the statues should be made of stone or brass; the Pythian replied, of neither, but of the wood of an olive-tree. Upon this answer, the Epidaurians desired leave of the Athenians to cut down an olive-tree in their territory, either because they believed thole of that soil to be the most sacred, or, as others say, by reason olive-trees at that time grew in no other country. The Athenians shewed themselves ready to grant their request, provided they promised to come annually to Athens, and there to offer sacrifice to Minerva and Erechtheus. This condition the Epidaurians accepted, and having obtained their request, they formed out of that wood two statues, which were no sooner erected than their country became fruitful aan irreconcilable enmity between the Æginetes and Athenians, the effects whereof we have elsewhere related at length<sup>a</sup>,

gain. In process of time the Æginetes having overcome the Epidaurians carried off these statues, and having erected them at a place called Oia, in the middle of their island, to render them propitious they appointed sacrifices accompanied with dances, to be performed by women in their honour, assigning to each statue ten men to preside in the solemnity. On this occasion the women who danced were allowed to abuse one another with opprobrious language, but not the men who presided. This they did in conformity to the former practice of the Epidaurians, who, besides these, used other ceremonies on this occasion not fit to be mentioned. After these statues were carried away by the Æginetes, the Epidaurians would no longer perform their contract with the Athenians, which they had religiously observed till that time, alledging that the Æginetes, who were in possession of the statues, and not they, who were, to their great sorrow, deprived of them, lay under that obligation. Hereupon the Athenians dispatched a messenger to Ægina to demand the statues, which the Æginetes refusing to deliver, they sent a ship with some of their citizens to Ægina, enjoining them, in case of a refusal, to use violence. These attempting to pull down the statues, were so terrified by a dreadful earthquake, accompanied with thunder and lightning, that they became outrageously mad, and fell upon one another with such fury, that one only remained alive, who made his escape to Phaleron in Attica. Thus the Athenians relate the story. But the Æginetes tell us, that the Athenians arrived in their island with a numerous fleet, and not, as is pretended, with a single ship, which they could have easily resisted. They add, that having landed their men without opposition, they marched directly to the statues, which, as they endeavoured to pull them down with ropes, fell on their knees, and ever after continued in that posture. Notwithstanding this miracle, the Athenians persisted in their resolution of carrying off the statues; but in the mean time the Argians, at the request of the Æginetes, having privately entered the island, cut off their retreat to the ships, and put them all to the sword, one man only excepted, who, as the Athenians affirm, soon perished in the following manner: Having, on his return to Athens, given an account of this disaster, the wives of those who had been killed in the island of Ægina, highly incensed that one man alone should be left alive of the whole number, crowded about him, and, asking for their husbands, killed him with the points of their pins. This action gave the Athenians more uneasiness than their defeat; and as they could not any other ways punish the women, they obliged them to change their dress, which was after the Dorian fashion,

The island was at last reduced by the Athenians, and continued subject to them, till it was at the end of the Macedonian war declared free by the Romans, enjoying its liberty till the reign of Vespasian, when it underwent the same fate as the other states of Greece.

Salamis, now Coluri, lies in the same Saronic gulf about three leagues west of Ægina, over-against the city of Eleusis, from which it is separated by a streight about a league over called antiently Porthmos, and at present Perama<sup>b</sup>. It was formerly known by the names of Cychria, from Cychereus the first king of the island, and of Pityussa, because abounding with pine-trees called by the Greeks Pytus<sup>c</sup>. The name of Salamis it borrowed from Salomine the daughter of Asopus king of Bœotia, whom Neptune is said to have ravished and carried into this island. By her he had Cychreus, or Cychereus; the first who reigned in the island. As Cychreus died without children, he was succeeded by Telamon, the father of Ajax, by Hesione, the sister of Priam and daughter of Laomedon king of Troy<sup>d</sup>; whence Salamis is stiled by Virgil the kingdom of Hesione<sup>e</sup>. It is according to Strabo between seventy and eighty furlongs in length, fifty miles in compass, and had antiently a city bearing the same name, and facing the island of Ægina. The city was destroyed, and another, called also Salamis, built on the coast over-against Attica, which was well peopled, and governed by its own laws in the time of Augustus<sup>f</sup>. This island will be ever famous in history for the signal victory gained here by the Greeks over the Persians. It was first peopled by the Ionians, and afterwards by colonies from different cities of Greece. The form of government which first prevailed here was monarchical; but monarchy and to wear the Ionian habit, that is, a linen vest not fastened with any pins. From this event a custom was introduced among the Argians and Æginetes of making pins by three-fourths larger than before. Of these pins consisted the chief offerings that were dedicated in the temples by the women of Ægina, who in despite to the Athenians used, even in our historian's time, pins of an extraordinary size (64). This was the original of the enmity between the Æginetes and Athenians, which at last ended in the ruin of the former, as we have related in the history of Athens (65).

was of no long continuance, Cychreus, Telamon, Euryfaces, and Philæus being the only kings who reigned over the Salaminians. Cychreus is said by Diodorus to have killed a dragon which infested the island; whence he had the name of Ophis; but Stephanus tells us, that he was so named on account of his crafty and inhuman temper. As Cychreus had no male issue, he appointed Telamon, the father of Ajax, his successor. Telamon was succeeded by Euryfaces, the son of Ajax by Tecmessa the daughter of Teuthras the Mysian, Teucer the other son of Telamon being on his return from the siege of Troy banished by his father, as we have related in the history of Cyprus, for not revenging on Ulysses the death of his brother Ajax. After the death of Telamon, Teucer attempted the recovery of his paternal kingdom; but Euryfaces, entering into an alliance with the Athenians, defeated his designs, and left the sovereignty of the island to his son, or, as others will have it, to his brother, Philæus, who of his own accord yielded the island to the Athenians, and retiring to Athens led there a private life. From him the tribe of the Philiadæ, of which was Pisistratus, borrowed its name<sup>b</sup>; but his descendants, among whom were Miltiades and Alcibiades, were called Euryfacidæ from Euryfaces. The island of Salamis was taken from the Athenians by the Megareans, and held by them till the time of Solon, who, being originally a Salaminian, prevailed upon the Athenians to attempt the recovery of that island. Their attempt was attended with success, and the Salaminians, again brought under subjection to Athens; in which state they continued till the reign of Cassander, whom they joined against the Athenians, and were on that account driven from their antient habitations, a new colony being sent from Attica to take possession of their lands and estates. After the reduction of Athens by Sylla, Salamis was declared free, and enjoyed its freedom till it was with the other states of Greece reduced by Vespasian to a Roman province.

Eubœa.

THE island of Eubœa went antiently by the names of Chalcis, Ellopiea, Aonia, Abantis, or Abantia, Macris, Oche, Bomo,<sup>c</sup> &c. The name of Chalcis, which was common to the island, with its capital, Stephanus derives from Chalce, the daughter of Asopus king of Bœotia, and Pliny from a Greek word signifying brass, which he supposes to have been first made use of here<sup>d</sup>. It was called Ellopiea from Ellops the son of Ion, who settled in this island; Aonia from the Aones; Abantia from the Abantes, or, as Strabo insinuates, from one Abas an antient hero; Macris or Maccra from its narrowness, that being the import of the Greek word, or from a nymph of that name, as the poets will have it, by whom they feign Bacchus to have been nursed in a cave of this island; Oche from a high mountain; Bomo from the cattle, with which it was well stored, the antient Arabian word Bomo or Bohmo, signifying, according to Hesychius, cattle or herds of cattle. This appellation is perhaps the most antient of all, the island having been first peopled, as Strabo informs us, by the inhabitants of Arabia and Phœnice. The name of Eubœa, according to some writers, was borrowed from an antient heroine, according to others from a famous cave on the eastern coast of the island, called by the Greeks Boos Aule, or the Ox-stall; but the common opinion is, that it was so named from its excellent pastures. The name of Eubœa was changed in latter ages into that of Egripos, which is perhaps a corruption of the word Euripus; from Egripos was probably formed the modern name of Negropont; for the Franks or western Christians, who first resorted to this island, being unacquainted with the Greek tongue, and hearing the inhabitants say, eis ton Egripon, that is, to Egripos, took the name of the country to be Negripon, or Negripont. In like manner from misunderstanding the words eis ton Delon, to Delos, they formed Sdelos, Sdillos, and Lisdelos, all modern names of the said island. Some have foolishly imagined, that Eubœa was called Negroponte from its being joined to the continent by a bridge of black stone, the word Negroponte signifying in Italian a black bridge. This island lies opposite to the continent of Attica, Bœotia, and Locris, extending from cape Sunium, now Capo delle collonne, in Attica as far as Thessaly *. It was formerly joined to Bœotia, as Pliny informs us †, by an isthmus, as it is at present by a bridge; so narrow in some places is the Euripus (K), which

(K) That canal, or streight, which divides Eubœa from Attica, Bœotia and Locris, was called by the antients Euripus. It is so narrow over-against the capital, that a galley can scarce pass through it. The agitations of the Euripus are, as every one knows, much spoke of by the antients. Some, among whom Antiphrastus of Byzantium, say, that the whole canal has a flux and reflux only six times in four and twenty hours; but Strabo, Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Seneca the tragedian, and Snidas agree, that it ebbs and flows seven times a day. Livy does not allow this flux and reflux to be so regular.

which divides it from the continent, It extends from north east to south-west a hundred and fifty miles ; but its breadth bears no proportion to its length, being, according to Pliny and most of the modern geographers, forty miles over where broadest, and only twenty where narrowest. It is three hundred and sixty-five miles in compass, and has several remarkable promontories stretching a great way into the sea. Pliny and Mela mention three, Geraſtus, and Caphareus to the south, and Cenæum to the north ; Geraſtus faces Attica, Caphareus the Helleſpont, and Cenæum the country of Locris and Thermopylæ.<sup>m</sup> Strabo mentions a fourth, which he calls Petalia and places over-against Sunium.<sup>n</sup> Artemiſium, which faces the Pegaſæan gulf and is famous for the first victory gained by the Greeks over the fleet of king Xerxes, is counted by Correlius Nepos<sup>o</sup> and Plutarch<sup>p</sup> among the promontories of Eubœa. The same writers tell us, that on the top of Artemiſium stood a temple or rather a chapel consecrated to Diana, surnamed Proſœa, that is eastern. Pliny speaks of Artemiſium as a town, and not a promontory. The doubling of cape Caphareus was in former times, when navigation was, we may say, in its infancy, reckoned very dangerous, on account regular. Father Babin, a jesuit of great learning, who made many observations on the spot, during his long abode in the island of Negropont, tells us, that the Euripus is regular in its ebbing and flowing the first eight days of the moon ; the same regularity he observed from the fourteenth to the twentieth day inclusively, and in the three last days ; but in the other days of the lunar month it is not so regular, for it sometimes ebbs and flows eleven, twelve, thirteen, and fourteen times in the space of a natural day. This irregularity, the causes of which both antients and moderns have sought for in vain, became proverbial among the Greeks ; whence the expressions Ἀνθρώπος Εὐριπός, Εὐριπὸς δ' ἀνοία, Εὐριπίστις, &c. to signify the caprices of an uncertain and fluctuating mind. In this sense Cicero compares the Comitia or assemblies of the Roman people to the commotions and agitations of the Euripus (66). Justin the martyr and Gregory of Nazianzum say, that Aristotle died of grief, because he could not discover the causes of the flux and reflux of the Euripus ; and the testimony of these fathers, uncertain as it is, gave rise to the fabulous tradition, that this philosopher leaped into the Euripus, out of vexation at his not being able to account for its irregular motions, saying at the same time, Since I cannot comprehend the sea, let the sea comprehend me.

of the many rocks and whirlpools on that coast much spoke of by the antients <sup>9</sup>. Among these rocks the Grecian fleet, returning from Troy under the command of Agamemnon, was shipwrecked by the treachery of Nauplius king of Eubœa, who, understanding that his son Palamedes had been unjustly condemned by the artifice and intrigues of Ulysses and Diomedes, resolved to revenge his death with the destruction of the whole fleet. To this end, as the Greeks were in all likelihood to sail that way on their return from Troy, he caused fires to be made on the tops of the most dangerous rocks, not doubting but they would take them, according to the custom of those times, for tokens of a safe harbour, and thither steer their courses. This malicious device had the desired effect, two hundred ships and upwards being dashed to pieces, and many thousands of men perishing in the whirlpools. However, Ulysses and Diomedes, whose ruin Nauplius chiefly designed, had the good luck to escape the common calamity, which so grieved the king of Eubœa, that he threw himself headlong from one of those very rocks, and perished in the sea. Caphareus is at present, according to Sophian and Niger, called Capo d'Oro, Capo Chimi, and Capo Figera. Cape Cenæum, now Capo Liter from a neighbouring town of that name, is supposed by the poets to have been called Cenæum from Cenæus an antient hero, whom Neptune, say they, rendered invulnerable. On this promontory stood a temple consecrated to Jupiter, surnamed from the place Cenæus. From Cenæum to Geraſtus, now Capo Rosso, Strabo measures the length of the island, these two promontories being according to him twelve hundred furlongs distant from each other, which measure agrees exactly with the length of the island, as set down by Pliny. In Eubœa are several high mountains covered great part of the year with snow; namely, Oche the highest of the whole island, Telethrus, Dryphis, Nedon, Cotyleus, and Chalcis, whence the city of that name, which stood under it, was called Hypochalcis. On mount Dryphis was a famous temple dedicated to Diana, worshipped there under the name of Dryphas. The following rivers are mentioned by Strabo, viz. Callas, Budorus, Circæus, and Neleus, or, as others call it, Melas. The two latter, if that author is to be credited, had very different or rather opposite qualities, the wool of the sheep that drank their waters turning white by those of the Circæus, and black by those of the Neleus <sup>1</sup>. same virtue Pliny ascribes to the Melas and Cephiſſus, two rivers of Bœotia. That writer ſpeaks of another river in Eubœa called Lelas, which watered the territory of Lelantum; and Strabo of a fountain in the ſame territory, which he calls Arethufa; but Stephanus will have Arethufa to be the name of a city, and not of a fountain. The champain country of Eubœa is exceeding fruitful, yielding great plenty of corn, oil, wine, and all ſorts of delicious fruit; but it was chiefly famous for its rich paſtures, which the Athenians, as Thucydides informs us<sup>r</sup>, made uſe of even before the Peloponneſian war to fatten their cattle.

THIS iſland had in former times many cities of great note, mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, and Mela. On the eaſtern coaſt, between the two promontories of Geræſtus and Caphareus, ſtood the cities of Geræſtus, Petalia, and Caryſtus. Petalia is mentioned only by Strabo<sup>t</sup>; and Geræſtus by Homer<sup>u</sup> and Livy<sup>w</sup>, who ſpeak of it not as a city, but a famous haven. In the time of Stephanus it was a village. Caryſtus, or, as Ptolemy writes it, Caryſte, now Caſtel roſſo, ſtood, according to Strabo and Livy, at the foot of mount Oche, and was ſo called from Caryſtus the ſon of Chiron. It was alſo known by the names of Chironia from Chiron, and Ægea from Ægon, who reigned here, and is ſuppoſed by Stephanus to have given his name to the Ægean ſea. The inhabitants of Caryſtus worſhipped the giant Briareus, who according to Homer was the ſame with Ægean, adored by the Chalcidians, the name of Ægeon being given him, as that poet informs us, by men, and that of Briareus by the immortal gods. Near Caryſtus were the two ſmall villages of Styra and Marmarium, and at a ſmall diſtance from the latter the famous quarries of marble in great requeſt among the Romans, to whom it was known by the name of Caryſtian marble<sup>x</sup>. Here alſo was dug up the wonderful ſtone called Amianthos or Aſbeſtos, whereof cloth was made, for it was ſpun and drawn into thread like hemp or flax, which, however ſtained, recovered, if Strabo is to be credited<sup>y</sup>, its firſt gloſs and beauty, if kept ſome time in the flames. Styra was firſt peopled by the inhabitants of Marathon, a city of Attica, and was deſtroyed in the Lamian war by Phædrus the Athenian commander, who, beſtowed its territory on the Eretrians. About five miles from Caryſtus, on the coaſt facing Attica and Bœotia, ſtood the village of Amarynthus, famous for a temple of Diana, ſurnamed from thence Amarynthia. Stephanus speaks of Amarynthus as a separate island, wherein he was certainly mistaken. On the same coast, over-against Oropus in Attica, stood the antient city of Eretria, the next, according to Strabo, in greatness, beauty, and wealth to Chalcis. It borrowed the name of Eretria from Eretræus the son of Phæton, one of the Titans, and was built, according to Strabo, by the Athenians before the Trojan war. Herodotus tells us<sup>a</sup>, that it was peopled by Æclus and Clothus, two Athenians, after the destruction of Troy. Other writers will have it to be a colony of another city in Attica bearing the same name. Be that as it will, Eretria was in the earliest ages a place of great renown, and at the height of its glory, as Strabo informs us<sup>a</sup>, in the reign of Darius Hystaspis. The same writer mentions a pillar erected by the Eretrians in the temple of Diana Amarynthia with an inscription, the purport of which was, that they had triumphed with three thousand soldiers, six hundred horses, and sixty chariots. They were long masters of the islands of Andros, Tenos, and Cos, and carried on a war with the Chalcidians, which Thucydides styles the antient war. Strabo mentions a school of philosophers founded here by Menedemus, and called the Eretrian school. The antient city of Eretria was destroyed by the Persians, and another, known by the name of New Eretria, built near the ruins of the former, which were still to be seen in Strabo's time. The new city was overstocked, as we read in Livy<sup>b</sup>, in proportion to its bigness and other riches, with pictures, statues, and ornaments of the like nature. The Eretrians in their speech used not only to add the letter R to the end, but insert it in the middle of their words; for which uncouth pronunciation they were ridiculed by the other Greeks<sup>c</sup>. The city of Eretria in Thessaly and those which stood in the neighbourhood of Pellene, and Athos in Macedonia, are said by Strabo to have been built and peopled by the Eretrians of Eubœa. In the territory of Eretria stood Oechalia, formerly a city, but in Pliny's time a village. Strabo likewise calls it a village, and adds, that the antient city was destroyed by Hercules<sup>d</sup>, which is confirmed by Ovid<sup>e</sup>. On the same coast, over-against Ægis in Bœotia, stood Chalcis the metropolis of the whole island, known to the antients by the names of Eubœa, Strophæa, Helicarna, and Hypochalcis. The name of Chalcis, which prevailed over all the rest, is supposed to have been borrowed from the daughter of Asopus king of Bœotia, called Combe, and surnamed Chalcis from her having first invented brazen armour. Chalcis was built by Æclus and Clothus, according to some before, according to others after the Trojan war, and is celebrated by all the antients as a most magnificent, populous, and wealthy city. The Chalcidians applied themselves early to navigation, and sent numerous colonies into Thrace, Macedon, Sicily, Corcyra, Italy, Lemnos, &c. in all which places were cities, as Aristotle quoted by Strabo informs us, built and peopled by the inhabitants of Chalcis *. The Chalcidians are more commended by the antients on account of their courage and bravery than for their morals, having been in all times infamous even among the Greeks for their unnatural lust. Their avarice was a standing topic of ridicule, as Hesychius informs us, among the ancient comedians†. Chalcis stood on the narrowest part of the Euripus, being joined to Bœotia by a bridge; which situation agrees with that of the present city of Negropont. It was one of the three cities, which Philip the son of Demetrius used to call the fetters of Greece‡. Between Chalcis and the promontory Cenæum stood the cities of Ædæpsus and Oreos. The former was famous for its hot baths mentioned by Pliny and Strabo, who commend them under the name of the hot baths of Hercules. Near these issued suddenly out of the earth, if Athenæus is to be credited, in the reign of Antigonus, a spring of cold water, which, as it performed most stupendous cures, drew crowds of people to it from the most remote nations. But the governors of Antigonus, to whom Eubœa was then subject, obliging those who used the waters to pay a certain tax, the spring immediately disappeared. The city of Oreos, built, according to Homer, during the Trojan war, was formerly one of the most powerful cities of Eubœa, the fourth part of the island belonging to the Oreans in the time of Philip the father of Alexander. In the several revolutions of Greece it became subject to different masters, and, after it had undergone many changes, was by Pericles brought under subjection to the Athenians, who sent thither a new colony, after having driven out the antient inhabitants, and obliged them to retire into a canton of Thessaly, called Hestiotides. The newly transplanted Athenians changed the name of Oreos, which was given it because built on a hill, into that of Istiaea on Hestiaea, which was the name of their tribe. The territory of Oreos was famous for its vineyards, whence it is by Homer distinguished with the epithet of Poly-staphylos, that is, abounding with vines. Goltzius produces a medal of Istiaea with an ox on one side, alluding to the excellent pastures of Eubœa, and bunches of grapes on the other, to shew the nature of the soil. In Pliny's time this city was no-ways considerable; and now it is only a small village called Oreo. These are the cities of note on the coast facing Attica and Bœotia. On the north-side of the island, over-against Thessaly and extending from Cenæum to Artemisium, stood Dia or Athenæ Diades, founded by one Dias an Athenian, who called it after his own name and that of his native city, Athenæ Diades. This Dios was, according to Stephanus, the son of Abas, and brother of Aleo and Arethusa. The inhabitants of Dia peopled the city of Canæ in Æolis. Ptolemy calls Dia or Dium only a promontory. On the coast, which is washed by the Ægean sea, stood the city of Cerinthus, built, according to Strabo, by Ellops the son of Ion, and brother of Æclus and Clothus. Pliny counts this among the antient cities of note in Eubœa<sup>h</sup>. Homer mentions both Dium and Cerinthus, calling the latter a maritime city, and the other a high town<sup>i</sup>. The inland cities mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, &c. are Ellopia, Nysa, Eubœa, Orabiæ, Rhamnus, Porthmus, Algæ, and Tamyne. Ellopia, according to Strabo, stood at the foot of mount Telebrium, and was so called, as was also the whole island, from Ellops its founder, who, as the same author tells us, was the son of Xuthus and grandson of Helleus. The inhabitants of this city after the battle at Leuctra were obliged by the tyrant Philistides to abandon their native country and settle at Istiaea<sup>k</sup>. Algæ stood over-against Anthedon, the last maritime city of Bœotia on the side of Locris. Strabo calls it the Eubœic Algæ, and also Æges, to difference it from two other cities of that name, the one in Achaia near the river Crathis, the other in Æolis. The same author is of opinion, that from this place, once famous for a temple of Neptune, the Ægean sea borrowed its name. In the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war the city of Orabiæ was in great part overthrown by an earthquake, and laid under water by the sea, which on that occasion broke in<sup>l</sup>.

THE most antient inhabitants of Eubœa were the Titans, according to Solinus<sup>m</sup>, who by the kingdom of the Titans understands the island of Eubœa. But this opinion is only founded on the religious worship which the inhabitants paid to Briareus and Ægeon, two of that race, or rather one known by two different names. Other writers, taking no notice of the Titans, suppose the Abantes to have first peopled the island. These took the name of Abantes from Abas a city of Thrace, whence they passed over into Eubœa, which from them was named Abantis and Abantia. This is the opinion of Aristotle, as quoted by Strabo; but others pretend, that they were called Abantes from Abas their leader, who was the first that reigned in the island. The learned Reinacius takes the Abantes to be the Arabians, who, according to Strabo, followed Cadmus into Eubœa and settled there. Herodotus counts the Abantes of Eubœa among the people of Ionian extraction<sup>n</sup>. Homer gives them the epithet of brave, and represents them with a long lock of hair on the back-part of their head; from which description his interpreter Eustathius concludes the Curetes and Abantes to be one and the same people; which was the opinion of Archemagus, an ancient Eubœan writer quoted by Strabo (L). 'Tis remarkable, that Homer, who often stiles the island Eubœa, yet never calls the inhabitants Eubœans, but constantly Abantes. The Pelasgians likewise abandoning Peloponnesus settled in this island<sup>o</sup>, which on that account is called Pelasgia by the scholiast of Apollonius. To these Diodorus Siculus adds the Dorians, Æolians, Eleans, and Dryopes. The latter being driven from Phocis by Hercules, after the death of their king Phylas, settled partly in Eubœa, where they built Carystus, and partly in Cyprus and Peloponnesus<sup>p</sup>.

Eubœa must have been formerly a very considerable state, since it is by the antients stiled the queen of the Ægean, and by Herodotus equalled to the island of Crete itself. The Chalcidians, Eretrians, and Carystians were deemed expert mariners, and courted by the contending powers of those days. They sent forty ships, a grand armada in those times, to the war of Troy under the conduct of their king Elephenor, and are said, at least by the poets, to have given on that occasion proofs of an uncommon valour.

(L) Archemagus was a native of Eubœa, wrote several books on the animals, and other remarkable things of that island, and is often quoted and commended by Athenæus. This ancient writer tells us, that the inhabitants of Chalcis and Eretria, disagreeing about a certain field called Campus Lelantus, came to an engagement, wherein the Eretrians closing with the Chalcidians, and taking hold of them by their long hair, easily overcame them. Whereupon the Chalcidians, to prevent misfortunes of the like nature for the future, cut off their hair, leaving out of superstition but one lock on the back part of their heads. From this manner of shaving they were called, according to Archemagus, Curetes; so that the Curetes, who are said to have once inhabited Chalcis, were originally Abantes.

THE first form of government which prevailed in Eubœa was monarchical. Solinus dates the beginning of the Eubœan kingdom from the time of the Titans, which it is no easy matter to define. Others, taking no notice of the Titans, suppose Abas to have been the first who reigned in Eubœa. He was, according to Homer and Eustathius <sup>a</sup>, the son of Neptune and the nymph Arethusa. By the sons of Neptune the antients meant expert mariners, or princes powerful by sea. Isaaci Tzetzes tells us, that he was killed inadvertently by his grandson Elephenor, who being provoked at seeing a slave, who led him in his old age, perform that duty without the due care, discharged a blow at him with a club; but missing the slave unfortunately killed the prince <sup>r</sup>. Abas, according to Homer and the scholiast of Apollonius, had by his wife Aglaia two sons, Chalcodon and Canethus. Chalcodon, who succeeded his father, made war upon the Thebans, reduced their city, and obliged them to submit to an annual tribute. He was afterwards overcome and killed by Amphitryon the father of the Theban Hercules. Upon his death the Thebans recovered their antient liberty. Plutarch, who mentions this war, calls the place, where the battle was fought and Chalcodon killed, Leucitra <sup>s</sup>. From this king Homer styles the Eubœans Chalcodontidæ <sup>t</sup>. Canethus, who, according to Apollonius <sup>u</sup> gave his name to a mountain of Eubœa, had a son named Canthus, who attended Jason in his expedition into Colchis, and lost his life in that enterprize. Chalcodon had by his wife Imonarete two sons, Elephenor and Pyræchmes. The latter renewed the war against the Thebans and Bœotians; but being overcome and taken prisoner by Hercules, he was tied to two horses, his arms to one, and his legs to the other, and cruelly torn asunder <sup>w</sup>. Elephenor was banished for killing his grandfather, as we have related above. But as his countrymen were preparing to set out for the Trojan war, he drew near the Euripus, and standing on a rock on the Bæotian side of the streight, he invited them to assemble, convinced the assembly of his innocence, and prevailed upon them not only to restore him to his native country, but to entrust him with the command of the fleet, consisting of forty ships, which was ready to set sail for Troy. In this war Elephenor, if we believe Homer *, gave proofs of an extraordinary valour; but was at last killed by Agenor. After the destruction of Troy the Abantes or Eubæans on their return home joined the Locrians of Thronium, and landing near the Ceraunian mountains possessed themselves of the adjacent country, and built there a city; the city they called Thronium, but the country Abantis, and held them both till they were many years after driven out by the inhabitants of Apollonia †. Some writers tell us, that, upon the death of Elephenor, Nauplius the father of Palamedes was placed upon the throne of Eubœa; but others are of opinion, that the Eubæans immediately after the Trojan war formed themselves into a republic, or rather into several small republics, most of their cities being governed by their own laws and quite independent of each other. In the reign of Darius Hystaspis the cities of Chalcis, Eretria, Carystus, and Oreos were so many distinct republics, governed by the nobles, whom they called Hippobates, that is, horsemen, none being admitted into the administration, but such as could maintain a certain number of horses; whence it is manifest, that oligarchy prevailed at that time in those cities. But this form of government was frequently disturbed, either by the unruly multitude introducing in its room a democracy, or by domestic tyrants, who, taking all the power into their own hands, ruled in their respective cities without controul. Among these we find the following tyrants mentioned by the antients as reigning in the city of Chalcis, Antileon, Phoxus, Menesarchus, Callias, and Taurosthenes. The two first are spoke of by Aristotle, who tells us, that Phoxus was put to death by the incensed multitude ‡. Menesarchus committed great devastations in the territories of the Athenians without any sort of provocation; but in the mean time the Thebans having made a descent in the island, with a design to drive out the tyrants, and restore the cities to their former state of liberty and independence, Menesarchus had recourse to the Athenians, who, notwithstanding the injuries he had done them, hastened to his assistance, and in the space of thirty days, obliged the

Thebans to abandon the island, and leave the tyrants in the possession of their usurped power. Menesarchus had two sons, Callias and Taurosthenes, and was succeeded by the former, who, unmindful of the favours his father had received from the Athenians, joined Philip of Macedon, their declared enemy ; but, being overcome by Phocion the Athenian general, and disgraced by Philip, he was obliged to sue for peace, which the Athenians generously granted him, and even assisted him to the utmost of their power against Philip and the Thebans, who had invaded his territories. When he saw himself attacked at once by two such powerful enemies, he went in person to Athens, and there in an assembly of the people pronounced an oration composed by Demosthenes, which had so good an effect on their minds, that they not only forgot his ungrateful behaviour, but resolved to send troops without delay to his assistance. By this means he withstood the efforts of his enemies, and maintained his power to his death<sup>a</sup>. Taurosthenes, according to some writers, succeeded him, according to others died before him. If he outlived him, he did nothing after he was vested with the supreme power, which authors have thought worth transmitting to posterity.

In the city of Eretria reigned the following tyrants ; Diagoras, who, as Aristotle informs us<sup>b</sup>, having driven out the Hippobates, took the whole power into his own hands : Themison, who took the city of Oropus from the Athenians, and stirred up the Thebans against them ; but afterwards changing his mind entered into an alliance with Athens, and assisted his new allies in the recovery of Oropus<sup>c</sup>. Plutarchus, who, being overcome in a pitched battle by the Macedonians, notwithstanding the succours sent him from Athens, was driven out by his own subjects, and obliged to abandon the island<sup>d</sup>. Upon his flight the Eretrians recovered their ancient liberty, which they did not long enjoy ; for divisions and parties arising among the citizens, some of them favouring Philip of Macedon, and others the Athenians, Philip took advantage of these disturbances, and by means of one Hipponicus having made himself master of the city, put the whole power into the hands of Hipparchus, Automedon, and Clistarchus, who were all at the head of the Macedonian faction.

But they were soon driven out by Phocion the Athenian, who restored the Eretrians to the enjoyment of their former liberty <sup>e</sup>. The city of Oreos was cruelly harrassed by one Philistides, who was supported in his tyranny by Philip. He held also the city of Ellopia, which he obliged the inhabitants to abandon, and retire to Oreos <sup>f</sup>. Besides the tyrants of particular cities, we find one Tynnondus mentioned by Plutarch <sup>g</sup> as lord of the whole island; but all we know of him is, that he was contemporary with Solon the legislator, and that he governed with great equity and moderation <sup>h</sup>. The wars of the Eubœans, with the Athenians, Persians, and Spartans, we have described in the foregoing Volume <sup>i</sup>; and therefore shall only add here, that they submitted first to Philip, and then to his son Alexander, after whose death they shook off the Macedonian yoke, but were by Antigonus brought anew under subjection. When the Romans first passed over into Greece, the island of Eubœa was subject to the kings of Macedon, but soon after declared free by a decree of the senate, in order to weaken the power of Philip in those parts. Antiochus, surnamed the great, and Mithridates king of Pontus were in their turns masters of Eubœa; but the Romans prevailing in the east restored the Eubœans to their former state of liberty. Mark Anthony subjected them to Athens; but Augustus, incensed against the Athenians for siding with his rival, declared free first the city of Eretria, and soon after the whole island, which was governed by its own laws, and continued in a flourishing condition till the reign of Vespasian, when it underwent the same fate as the other states of Greece.

In the Euripus, now gulf of Negrepont, Pliny places the island of Atalanta, which is mentioned also by Ptolemy and Strabo, and the Petalia, so called because they lie over-against the city of Petalia in Eubœa. They are four in number, but rocks rather than islands. Some writers rank Anticyra, famous for its hellebore, among the islands of the Ægean sea, and place it in the Pegasean bay between Eubœa and Thessaly over-against mount Oeta; but Strabo, a most accurate writer, though well acquainted with the other Greek islands, seems to have been quite a stranger to this. He mentions indeed two cities of this name, the one on the coast of Phocis near Cissa on the side of Bœotia * ; the other, which he commends for its hellebore, as Pausanias does the former †, on the banks of the Sperchius, at an equal distance from mount Oeta and the Maliac gulf ‡ ; but he no where speaks of an island bearing the name of Anticyra ; and his silence inclines us, notwithstanding the authority of Pliny, Gellius, and some modern geographers, to believe that there was no such island ; the more because neither Pliny nor Gellius give us any account of its situation, but only tell us, that the island of Anticyra was famous for its hellebore, mistaking in all likelihood one of the abovementioned cities for an island. But it is now time to dismiss this subject, and take our leave of the Ægean or Archipelago, having visited with Ptolemy, Strabo, and Pliny, the best guides of antiquity, all the islands of note in that sea, without suffering any thing to escape our notice, which those eminent antiquaries have thought worthy of observation. The present account, with that which we have delivered in the foregoing volumes, of the several Greek states in Europe and Asia, completes, we may say without presumption, the most distinct and extensive history of Greece that has hitherto appeared in any language.

The Description of MACEDONIA.

AS this country was antiently inhabited by various nations, so it was, in a long succession of ages, distinguished by different appellations, being sometimes <sup>a</sup> called by the name of one of its districts, and sometimes by that of another, as the nation inhabiting those regions prevailed. Thus in the most antient times it took its name from Æmathia <sup>b</sup>, which received its appellation from Æmathius, a prince of great antiquity; but afterwards the whole country, which the Greeks called Macedonia, received that denomination from king Macedo <sup>c</sup>, a descendant from Deucalion, as some think, or, as others affirm, by an easy mutation of Mygdonia, the name of one of its provinces, into Macedonia (A).

(A) The antient names of countries are, generally speaking, various, and hardly to be traced to their sources. It is the opinion of many commentators on the holy scriptures, that by the כְּתִיִּים Chittim, or the descendants of Cheth, we are to understand the inhabitants of this country (1). The learned Bochart is of a different sentiment, and will have the Chittim to be the people of Italy (2). The judicious Mr. Shuckford supports the former notion,

THE bounds of this country are not very easily assigned, because, according to the fortune of its princes, they have been sometimes esteemed larger, and sometimes less. We shall, however, endeavour to accommodate our description to the succeeding history in such a manner, as that the reader may easily perceive what accessions it received from time to time from the valour of its antient kings. And as to the alterations which it sustained, after it fell under the dominion of the Romans, and was reduced into a province, we shall consider them in another place<sup>d</sup>. Of old then it was bounded on the east by the Ægean sea, on the south by Thessaly and Epirus, on the west by the Adriatic or the Ionian sea, and on the north by the river Strymon and the Scardian mountains, afterwards by the river Nessus or Nestus (B).

and hath offered many probable reasons in justification of his reviving it (3). Some critics have fancied, that the old name might easily be reconciled to the new thus, ἡντίτοι Μακέται, Μακεδόνες; but whether in length of time this permutation of names might really happen, the reader's judgment must determine. As to Cluverius his conjecture, that Macedonia was derived from Mygdonia, through the different pronunciation of the Greeks, we can affirm nothing concerning it (4). The old opinion, however, seems preferable, that it was so called from the antient hero Macedo, whom Diodorus asserts to have been the son of Osiris (5); but Solinus will have him to be a descendant from Deucalion (6). They agree, however, in this, that from him this country received its name, which was before called Æmathia. Concerning the antient king Æmathius, from whom this appellation came, we find nothing in history, except that he lived in the oldest times, and was probably the first king of that little district which retained his name, though it was a province only of Macedonia (7). It is from Livy that we learn Pæonia was once the general name of this country, which afterwards became peculiar to a people thrust up in the northern part thereof lying under mount Scopus (8). Thus much may suffice on this subject, which, however dry, the intelligent reader will find to have its uses.

(B) The accessions of territory which Macedonia received, from the wisdom and virtue of its kings, were made at different times, and on account of their different wars. Caranus and his immediate successors were pent up in the very midst of Macedonia, and the conquests they made were either towards the north, at the expence of the Pelagonians, Edonians, and other nations, or on the south, where they gained some very rich and fruitful countries from the Thessalians (9). In process of time, when the Persian king came to have great affairs in this part of the world, the tributary princes of Macedon found their account in it, and, as the reward of their attachment to that crown, had several of the western provinces bestowed on them (10). This enabled them to contest the possession of the sea-coasts with the most powerful republics of Greece, who, under pretence of settling colonies, fought by all possible methods to establish large principalities, and to draw immense riches to themselves. The jealousy the Macedonian kings had of this, their art in procuring supplies from one republic to distress another, and their dexterity in negotiating treaties, when they were no longer able to carry on war, restored them to the possession of the eastern coast, and left them on that side no other boundary but the sea. On the west they had still many nations between them and the Adriatic, when Philip the father of Alexander came to the throne ; but he, contemning all limits not set by nature, forced all those nations to submit to his sway ; and having conquered all the country to the sea on this side, turned his arms to the south-east, where driving out the Athenians, Thracians, and other nations, he added all the rich and plentiful regions between the rivers Strymon and Nessus or Nestus to Macedonia, adorning the old city of Crenides with rich and stately buildings, and calling it from his own name Philippi (11). This account will free the reader from those difficulties, which otherwise in the perusal of this work might frequently give him trouble. He will therein meet with accounts of wars carried on by the Lyncestians, Almopians, and other nations against the Macedonians, tho' it should seem that the countries inhabited by these nations were within the limits of Macedonia ; he will find the Athenians, Corcyrians, and Corinthians holding large districts in this country ; and he will hear the river Strymon sometimes, at other the river Nessus, named as the boundary of Macedonia on the east, and the authorities of the antients quoted for both (12) ; all of which this short account will render perfectly clear and intelligible.

ponius Mela confirms the multitude of different states in this country, by saying it had as many nations as cities. Of those the <sup>b</sup> Taulantii inhabited the western part on the coasts of the Adriatic sea. Within this territory stood the city <sup>a</sup> Epidamnum or Epidamnus; which, for its unlucky name, the Romans afterwards thought fit to change into Dyrrachium; it is now called Durazzo <sup>c</sup> (C).

(C) The city of Epidamnus was seated on the entrance of the Ionian gulph (13). It was a colony of the Corcyrians, but settled under the command of Phalius the son of Heratoclidus, a Corinthian by birth, and, as to family, descended of Hercules. At the time of their settlement here, the Taulantii looked upon the territory they seized as justly belonging to them; on which account the rising city and its inhabitants were frequently disturbed by them and other barbarous nations; but by degrees the Epidamnians grew powerful, and stood in little awe of their neighbours, till their own seditions furnished both with opportunity, and force the Taulantii their antient enemies. This happened about the second year of the eighty fifth olympiad, when the commons having expelled the nobility, constrained them to fly to the barbarians. These excited by the exiles, presently invaded the territories of the Greeks, and shortly after besieged the city, which they reduced to great straits. The Epidamnians in great distress applied themselves for assistance to the Corcyreans, but were refused. They then, at the instance of the oracle, made suit to the Corinthians, who furnished them speedily and effectually with all things they desired. This terribly incensed the Corcyrians, who thought the Corinthians, in relieving their colony, had meddled where they had nothing to do, notwithstanding that they themselves were a colony from Corinth, and that part of the original colony settled at Epidamnus were Corinthians also. The next year therefore after the Corinthians had relieved this city, the Corcyrians fitted out a great fleet, attacked the Corinthians and their allies, and also besieged Epidamnus; which proceeding of theirs induced what was called the Corinthian war, of which we have given the reader an account elsewhere (14). In succeeding times this, like the rest of the Macedonian cities, laid hold of every opportunity of asserting its freedom; and tho' we cannot be very particular as to the accidents which befel it in so long a series, yet we know, that the fact was so ; for we find Diodorus Siculus setting down the reduction of this place by Cassander, who left a garison therein ; however, in a short time afterwards the city dismissed the garison, and sided with Glaucias king of the Illyrians (15). After Epidamnus fell under the jurisdiction of the Romans, they are said, to have changed its name into Dyrrhachium, on account of the unluckiness of its former appellation (16), tho' Appian says, that the Corcyrians made this change ; holding its antient name Dyrrachium, to be ominous, they called it Epidamnus (17) ; however, the former seems to be the more probable opinion of the two, since Plautus gives us the reason why the last mentioned name was thought unlucky, it being expressive of the nature of the inhabitants, who were, generally speaking, knaves, sycophants, and prostitutes ; his words are these.

*Nunc ita est hæc hominum natio Epidamnia ;
 Voluptarii atque potatores maximi ;
 Tum sycophantæ & palpatores plurimi
 In urbe hac habitant ; tum meretrices mulieres
 Nusquam perhibentur blandiores gentium.
 Propterea huic urbi nomen Epidamno inditum est :
 Quia nemo ferme hac sine Damno divortitur* (18).

Some have thought, that Dyrrachium was rather the name of the port than the city ; and others again have suggested, that the antient city of Epidamnus stood on the continent, whereas Dyrrachium was seated in a peninsula (19). It is now without doubt called Durazzo, and is a port of considerable note, that is, considering the condition of other maritime places on this coast, which once made a considerable figure in story (20).

(D) Apollonia stood seven miles from the sea on the river Laus. It was a colony of the Corinthians, and also of the Corcyrians, perhaps in the same manner as Epidamnus. It had some time the name of Gylace from Gylaces a Corinthian, who probably was the leader of the first colony (21). There is a very remarkable story relating to this city related by Herodotus ; and, inasmuch as we

When he awaked, and saw what was done, he said “ nothing to any man, thinking to purchase the like number, “ and to put them among the rest; but the Apollonians, being “ soon informed of the thing, caused him to appear without “ delay before the court of justice, and sentenced him to lose “ his eyes for sleeping when he ought to have watched. Never- “ theless, when they had thus punished Euenus with blindness, “ the sheep brought forth no more lambs, nor the earth its usual in- “ crease, as the oracles of Dodona and Delphi had predicted. And “ when they applied themselves to the prophets to know the “ cause of the present calamities, they told them, that they “ had unjustly put out the eyes of Euenus the keeper of the sa- “ cred sheep; that they themselves had sent in the wolves, and “ would not discontinue their vengeance till the Apollonians should “ make him full satisfaction, and such amends for the injury as he “ himself should chuse and judge sufficient; after which they would “ make so valuable a present to Euenus, that the greater part of “ men should think him happy. These predictions the Apolloni- “ ans kept secret, and appointed some of their citizens to act in “ conformity to their intentions; which they did in this manner: “ Having found Euenus sitting on a chair, they sat down by him, “ and, after other discourse, expressed their sorrow for his afflicti- “ on, taking occasion from thence to ask him what reparation he “ would chuse, if the Apollonians were disposed to give him satis- “ faction. Euenus, who had not heard of the oracle, said, if they “ would give him the lands of inheritance belonging to two citi- “ zens he named, and which he knew to be the best of that “ country, and would moreover add to that gift, the most mag- “ nificent house of the city, he would be reconciled to them, and “ contented with that satisfaction. Those who sat by him, “ immediately taking hold of his answer, Euenus, said they, the “ Apollonians offer you the reparation you demand for the loss of “ your eyes, in obedience to an oracle they have received: Which “ when

“ first satisfied the possessors, made him a present of the lands he “ demanded, and in a short time he obtained the spirit of divina“ tion, and acquired a considerable name (22) ” In the days of Cassander king of Macedon, it ran the same risque that Epidamnus did, that is of being reduced under his dominion ; but, by the help of the Illyrians, it threw off his yoke (23). Under the Ro- mans it flourished and was very famous, particularly on account of its pleasant situation, which invited many persons to settle therein and form a kind of academy. It is now (as we think) call-

(E) The little district in the kingdom of Macedonia, which retained for ages the denomination of Orestes's kingdom, is said to have derived that title thus : Orestes the son of Agamemnon, after he had been acquitted of his mother's murder and had stolen away Hermione, retired with such Greeks, as, out of regard to his virtue, were content to follow his fortunes, through Thessaly and Epirus into this region, which lay on the borders of the latter, and there settled himself. *Here by Hermione he had a son, whom after his own name he called Orestes, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and by his just and gentle sway so endeared himself to his people, that, in memory of his and his father's goodness towards them, they called their country and themselves after the name of these princes (25). This people, tho' they lived within the bounds of the Macedonian kingdom, and were obedient to its kings, at least after the reign of Philip, yet they preserved such privileges, and vindicated their liberty with such firmness, that when the Romans, after the overthrow of Perseus, possessed themselves of Macedon, they left this people in freedom, and allowed them to set up the form of a dependent commonwealth, acknowledging the Roman protection, but not the jurisdiction of the provincial magistrates ( 26 ).

To the north of these lay the territory of the Dassareæ <sup>p</sup>, whose chief cities were Lychnides and Evia. Polybius <sup>q</sup> indeed calls the former Lychnidia. It was a place remarkable for its fine situation near a lake of the same name, and is at this day called Ochrida <sup>r</sup>. East of this country lay Æmæthia <sup>t</sup> properly so called, a region from whence, as we have said, the whole country since called Macedonia derived its most antient name. It stretched itself quite to the Sinus Thermaicus, or, as it is now called, the gulph of Salonichi, and contained several famous cities, particularly Ægæa or Edessa, the antient capital of the Macedonian kingdom, of which we shall have hereafter occasion to speak at large, it having been the royal seat of Caranus the first king of Macedon, and the burial-place of the kings of his line to the time of Alexander the great <sup>u</sup>. Pella, antiently called Bunomos or Bunomia, seated at the mouth of the river Actius, famous for being the birth-place of Philip and his son Alexander, and for having in its neighbourhood the tomb of Euripides the celebrated tragic poet <sup>v</sup>. Eurofus, a place seated, as Pliny tells us, on the river Actius <sup>x</sup>, and Beræa, where a sedition was raised against the apostle Paul by the Jews <sup>y</sup>. Its chief cities were Pydna, antiently called Citron, standing between the mouths of the rivers Aliaemon and Lydius, in which Olympias the mother of Alexander, Roxana his wife, and Alexander his son were put to death by Cassander <sup>a</sup>. In its neighbourhood was fought the decisive battle between Paulus Æmilius the Roman consul and Perseus king of Macedon, wherein the latter was utterly defeated <sup>b</sup>. Polyce and Dion or Dium, a strong town, in which Alexander the great is said to have seen a vision, wherein he Even at this day it makes a very great figure under the name Salonichi, and is not only very remarkable for the great trade carried on there, by which its inhabitants are ſtill rich, at leaſt in proportion to their neighbours, but alſo for the noble ruins which teſtify its antient magnificence. There are the remains of ſeveral triumphal arches, as well as one which is ſtill almoſt entire, erected in honour of the emperor Antoninus. There are alſo churches now turned into moſques of ſurpriſing beauty, particularly that which was conſecrated to St. Demetrius, containing two churches, one over the other, both of excellent marble, and adorned with upwards of a thouſand columns of jaſper, porphyry, &c. In it stood the cities of Amphipolis, Scotusa, and Berga; the first famous for being a colony of the Athenians<sup>o</sup>; and some think that the antient city Crenides stood also within its bounds, which Philip the father of Alexander rebuilt and called Philippi<sup>p</sup>. It is very probable, that the excellent situation of Theffalonica hath been the chief cause of that respect which all conquerors have shewn it. *The use of

scription.*

THE reader may possibly think he might have been spared so particular a detail of nations and cities now no more; but he will easily perceive from the following history, that an accurate description of the ancient Macedonia was absolutely necessary to render it intelligible; and he will be the better satisfied, when we assure him, that the foregoing description was not collected without great pains taken, not only in comparing antient historians, but modern geographers also, and the relations of such travellers as have seen the ruins of those cities, which make such a figure in antient history, and are yet very differently placed in our maps.

*The extent
donia.*

Macedonia, according to M. del' Isle's map of Greece, lies between the 40th and 42d degrees of north latitude, and between the 37th and 42d degrees of longitude. Brixius reckons from mount Orbelus to Pindus, that is, from north to south 2000 stadia, and from Epidamnus to mount Athos 2500 stadia <sup>v</sup> from west to east. According to the map before mentioned it is from north to south about 160 miles, and from west to east about 220. Its form is very irregular; but its situation is excellent, in respect that it is washed on the east by the Ægean sea, and on the west by the Ionian; which advantages, however, were never cultivated as they might have been, nor were the Macedonians ever powerful at sea, notwithstanding that many noble bays and excellent harbours are to be found in their country.

AMONGST the most considerable mountains in this region, we may reckon that great ridge running across the north part thereof, stiled the Scardian mountains. In this part also of Macedon stood mount Pangæus, lofty and well covered with wood, yet infinitely more valuable from its contents, which were both gold and silver, as we shall shew elsewhere <sup>2</sup>. Hæ-

The Greeks, struck with its singular situation, and the venerable appearance of its towering ascent, erected so many churches, monasteries, and hermitages thereon, that it became in a manner inhabited by devotees, and from thence received the name of the holy mountain, which it still retains, tho' many of those consecrated works are now decayed (G). Olympus, another

(G) This mount Athos is thought to have received its name from a giant, who, the scholiast on Theocritus informs us, was the son of Neptune and Rhodope; but in this there is a concealed meaning, because he is said to have removed this mountain from the neighbourhood of a lake of the last-mentioned name: Hence he is called the son of Rhodope, because from her he came; and the son of Neptune, because he came to him. There are coins, which on their reverse have the summit of mount Athos, with a man of a gigantic size lying on the rocks, with his right hand over his head. Whether this be the Giant, the Genius of the Mountain, or Jupiter Athous, is not clear (21). As to the cutting of the isthmus which unites it to the land, Herodotus gives us the following account of it, and therein an admirable description of the mountain: “ Athos is “ a mountain of great fame and magnitude, leaning upon the sea,
 “ and well inhabited. It terminates to the landward in the form “ of a peninsula, and makes an isthmus of about twelve stades in

 “ the canal, carried it away to another place ; but by digging “ in a perpendicular manner, and making the bottom of equal “ breadth with the top, all the workmen, except the Phœnicians, “ drew double labour upon themselves, because the earth, as is “ natural, fell down continually in great quantities from the upper “ parts. The Phœnicians alone shewed that ability on this occasi“ on, of which they are so much masters at all times ; for they “ opened the part which was assigned to their care twice as large “ as others had done ; and sloping the ground gradually till “ they came to the bottom, they then found the measure equal “ with the rest. In a meadow adjoining to this place they had a “ court of justice, and a market furnished with a great abundance “ of corn brought over from Asia. My conjectures lead me to “ think, that Xerxes undertook this enterprize upon a motive of “ ostentation, in order to shew the greatness of his power, and “ to perpetuate the memory of his name ; for tho’ he might have “ caused his fleet to be conveyed over the land without much “ difficulty, yet he would rather command the isthmus to “ be cut, and a canal to be made to receive the sea of such “ a breadth as might be sufficient to carry two ships sailing in “ front (22).” From Thucydides we learn, that the inhabitants of the five cities abovementioned were barbarians, speaking two tongues, that is, the Greek and a language of their own. Plu- tarch and Pliny have both written, that this mountain is so high, as to project its shade, when the sun is in the summer solstice, on the market-place of the city Myrrhina in the island of Lemnos.
 On account of this it is said, that the inhabitants of this city erected a brazen calf at the termination of the shadow, on which was inscribed this Monosfic :

Ἄθος καλύψει πλευρὰν Ἀημνίας βοός.

Half Lemnos’ calf doth Athos shadow hide.

Pliny asserts the distance between the foot of mount Athos and the island of Lemnos to be 87,000 paces. He does not tell us at what hour of the day this shadow was observed, yet this may be supplied by supposing it to have been a little before sun-set, the sun being then in the vertical circle, which passeth over Athos and Myrrhina ; or rather it may be supposed two degrees higher, because otherwise the shadow could not be so exactly observed in Lemnos (23). These points settled, it will appear from the principles of trigonometry, that the altitude of Athos is thirty two furlongs, which, however, is not very consistent with truth. The reason in all probability is, because Pliny hath assigned too great a distance between the mountain and the island. The best maps we have make that distance but 55 Italian miles ; which being assumed reduces it nearer the true height, viz. of eleven furlongs, or a little more (24). As to the modern state of this celebrated mountain, we cannot inform the reader better thereof, than by translating the accurate description of a French traveller : “ As I staid a “ good while at Salonichi, and as that city is not far distant from “ Monte Santo, which is mount Athos, so much celebrated by the “ antient poets for its height, and so famous among the modern “ Greeks for the monks and hermits residing thereon, I could not “ be satisfied without going to see it. In the space of a few “ days I examined this wide and so much talked of field of “ wonders, leaving no part of it unexplored, no not even the “ chapel on the summit, which is very little visited. As I ascended,

“ I found a good deal of snow ; but as it was in the finest “ season of the year, (in the month of June) the sun began to “ operate upon it every where, and to turn it into water. Its “ summit is a perfect rock and absolutely naked ; but the snow “ did not lie there so long as in the vallies. Passing to the south-“ side, we found it shady. Arriving at the chapel, which was “ seated on a high rock, we were informed, that it was consecrated “ in memory of the transfiguration, and that on the sixth of August
“ they sung a solemn mass in the presence of a multitude of people, “ who out of devotion remained there all night. As to other things, “ we found them in pretty good order, considering that it is a place
“ not to be visited but in summer weather. The building too was well “ enough, especially if we consider its situation, it being not a little “ surprizing to find a chapel erected, where one cannot stay a quarter “ of an hour without a great fire. That which our geographers call “ Monte Santo comprehends not only mount Athos, but the whole chain “ of mountains which unites it to the continent of Macedonia. This “ chain is seven or eight leagues long, and three or four broad,
“ and it is true, that the Greeks call this ridge Oros Agion, or “ the holy mountain ; but when they speak of mount Athos in “ particular, they call it still Athos. Of the twenty monasteries “ erected in this solitude, there is but one, which stands on this “ mountain, and that is dedicated to St. Laura, which is indeed “ richer and more considerable than all the rest ; and it is owned, “ that from the monks inhabiting therein, the rest took the rule imaginations conceived it no impossible task to measure it. This Xenagoras attempted and performed with success, where-

“ under which they live. These convents, generally speaking “ resemble fortresses rather than religious houses. They are “ surrounded with good walls, flanked with towers, or at least “ surmounted by a vast donjon, well furnished with artillery, and “ all things else necessary for defence. This is a very necessary “ precaution, considering their situation in the midst of thieves.
 “ As these monasteries are generally five or six stories high, the a“ partments in them are numerous and very large, but not over “ well disposed. They are covered with lead, which by the re“ flection of the sun-beams shines like silver ; and all things consi“ dered, we may rather wonder at their being in so good a state, “ than at their being in no better. These monasteries are inde“ pendent of each other in point of government ; and though in “ the center of these monasteries there is an episcopal see in a “ pretty large town called Kapiarb, yet the monks pay no sort of “ obedience to this bishop. The cathedral, however, is stiled A- “ crotaton, i. e. the most high, and is served by monks sent by the “ superiors of the respective convents for that purpose. There is “ also on mount Athos a considerable church, dedicated to St. Anne, “ where the Anchorites resort for the performance of their devo“ tions at certain festivals, and other settled times. These poor “ people are quite secluded from the rest of human race. They “ may be about sixty in number, and live most of them alone ;
 “ the rest, two in a cell ; they live by the labour of their hands,
 “ as did the antient monks, and are under the direction of a chief,
 “ who is called Dicaïos, i. e. the Just ; yet he himself is depend“ ent on the monastery of St. Laura, because their cells are built “ on the ground belonging to that religious house. All the mo“ nasteries have little farms belonging to them, which are ma“ naged by certain monks for the benefit of the house. All these “ religious, as has been said before, live under a common rule, “ which rule consists chiefly in the strict observance of the follow“ ing points : 1. The keeping certain stated fasts, which they re“ commend vehemently in their sermons, and which, to do them “ justice, they recommend no less by the severity with which they “ keep them. 2. The passing whole nights in certain churches “ consecrated to the honour of God, where they either make “ solemn prayers, or else join together in chanting psalms, con“ forming herein to the practice of the antient church, in which “ these devotions were stiled Vigils. 3. They suffer no woman “ to approach the holy mountain, which they carry yet farther, “ by excluding all kind of animals of the feminine gender ; and on “ this principle they were wont also to cause their younger monks “ to be instructed in separate houses, as if youth itself had some “ thing in it feminine (25.)”

by he found, that its height did not much exceed an English mile. Many geographers reckon this mountain to Theffaly, but we think it belongs rather to Macedonia (H).

WE have heretofore observed, that the Scardian hills and mount Athos were well covered with woods; and indeed the whole kingdom of Macedonia, being every-where intermixed with mountains, hills, and rising grounds, abounded with all sorts of trees, which are valuable in Europe, either on account of timber, fruit, or shade. As to deserts or large wastes, we find not that there were any such in antient times; on the contrary, it appears, that no part of Europe was more thoroughly peopled; but since it has been in the hands of the Turks, great part of it is become uninhabited, a thing not unfrequent in other parts of the Ottoman empire.

THE peculiar happiness of Macedonia, in having the sea on each side of it, we have already remarked. It is our duty

(H) As Athos astonished by its height and bulk, so the mountain Olympus struck the beholder with reverence by its amazing loftiness, and at the same time invited his ascent by the beauty and variety of prospects which it afforded. The river Peneus, one of the clearest, gentlest, and most beautiful streams in the universe, ran at its foot, dividing it from Ossa, and making a multitude of small but charming isles, covered with shady trees, and adorned with magnificent temples, grottoes, porticoes, and other stately buildings (26). Its height is certainly very great; but as we observed above, not near so great as it was imagined by the antients. As to the notion of its being above the second region of the air, it depended intirely upon a fact, viz. that letters traced on the ashes of Jupiter's altar, remained undefaced for a long space of time. This altar stood on the very summit of Olympus, and the god was worshipped there with peculiar devotion. On the south east side of the hill ran the famous river Helicon, and near it stood a noble temple of Jupiter, in the midst of a shady grove. The mountains Ossa and Pelion were in its neighbourhood, much spoken of in antient authors, and very considerable for their height, tho' they come far short of Olympus. Desfarchus Siculus, at the command of some of the neighbouring princes, measured mount Pelion with great exactness, and found it to be in height 1250 paces, or about an Italian mile and half. It is now called Pelras, and has some little forts on its sides (27). There is some doubt amongst geographers, whether this region ought to be reckoned to Macedonia or Theffaly; but, as we make the river Peneus their common boundary, Olympus and the territory about it falls under our cognizance here.

here, however, to be a little more particular. The Adriatic washes its western coast, and, besides the great haven of Epidamnus, now Durazzo, makes several safe ports, which are now most of them neglected. On the east the Ægean sea was still more advantageous, opening to Macedonia not only the trade of Greece, but that of Asia also; which commerce was especially forwarded by the spacious bays every-where formed on the coast. Four of these were chiefly remarkable, viz. Sinus Strymonicus, having on its north-side part of Thrace, and on the south the long extending promontory of Athos, including in its bosom the island of Thasus. It was called the Strymonic bay, because the river Strymon ran there into the sea. It is now called Golpho di Contessa. Sinus Singiticus, having on one side mount Athos, and on the other a long slip of land, once full of rich and populous towns, of which there is now no appearance; the bay therefore takes its present name from a neighbouring mountain, and is stiled Golpho di Monte Santo. Sinus Toronaicus, having the ridge of land before-mentioned on the one side, and part of the region Paraxia on the other. It received its old name from the city Torone, but is now called Golpho d' Aiomama. Sinus Thermaicus, having on the one side Macedonia, on the other, for the most part, Thessaly. It is at least sixty miles in length, and received its name from the antient city Therma, called afterwards Thessalonica, now Salonichi. In speaking of the rivers of Macedon, we will begin with those which run into the Adriatic, and after speak of such as run into the Ægean sea. Panyasus rises not far from the city Pitheum, and, after a winding course of upwards of a hundred miles, from the southern borders of Macedon to Epidamnus or Durazzo, near it discharges itself into the Adriatic<sup>2</sup>. The Apsus, rising not far from the city of Eordea, after a short course of thirty miles, discharges itself about ten miles below the mouth of the Panyasus. The Laous, called also Æas and Aous, has its source near the city of Antigonis, and, after a north-west course of forty miles, enters the Adriatic a little below the city of Apollonia. Celydnus or Pepylichus running from the Acroceraunian mountains directly into the Adriatic, would not be worthy of mention, if it were not regarded as the boundary between Macedon and Epirus. The rivers running into the Ægean sea, are, The Aliacmon; it rises in the mountains lying above the city Elymea, and running for some time parallel to the Panyasus, after a course of seventy miles almost due east, enters the bay of Theſſalonica, between the cities of Pydna and Dium. The Erigon riſes in the country of the Lynceſtæ, and running directly north about thirty miles, turns then to the eaſt, and declining by degrees to the ſouth, falls, after a farther courſe of forty miles, into a lake formed by the waters of the river Axius, and with them runs into the ſea. The Axius, which is by far the greateſt river in Macedon, riſes from two fountains in the Scardian mountains, and, after a courſe of eighty miles, it ſpreads itſelf into a large and noble lake below the city of Edeſſa, and having received the Erigon there, falls into the bay of Theſſalonica almoſt over-againſt that city. The river Strymon riſes in Thrace, and rolling with a rapaid ſtream almoſt directly ſouth, after a courſe of ſeventy miles, it enters by two broad and deep mouths that bay, which from it was ſtiled the Strymonic. This river was the antient boundary of Macedon towards Thrace; but Philip the father of Alexander took in all the country between it and the river Neſtus, or, as ſome write it, Meſtus; which running almoſt parallel to the river Strymon, falls into the ſame bay near the city of Abdera, about forty miles diſtant from the mouths of the Strymon. Smaller rivers there are many, ſuch as the Chidorus, Aſtræus, Pontus, &c. As to lakes, beſides thoſe formed by the overflowing of the river Strymon, and the junction of the rivers Axius and Erigon, there is almoſt in the heart of Macedon, not far from the Candavian mountains, a large and famous lake called the lake of Lychnidus, or the lake of Preſpa. There is another famous lake in the province of Mygdonia, and another near the antient city of Sintia, called afterwards Heraclea Sintica. As for ſprings and fountains, they are innumerable; ſuch as on account of their properties are remarkable, we ſhall mention elſewhere.

THE air of Macedonia is, generally ſpeaking, clear, The climate, ſoil, commonly to a very great age. This is eaſily accounted produce, for, when we conſider, that it lies in the middle of the north riches, &c. temperate zone, and in the fixth and ſeventh climates, its long-eſt day containing about fifteen hours. The ſoil is every-where tolerable, in moſt places fruitful, on the ſea-coaſt eſpecially abounding with corn, wine, and oil, and indeed with every thing that could be deſired either for the uſe or convenience of men; but the principal riches of Macedonia conſiſted in its mines, of which it had many, and of almoſt all kind of metals, but of gold particularly. In Pieria under its antient kings there were found large quantities of this precious metal in the ſand, in lumps of conſiderable bignets<sup>b</sup>. There were also gold mines in the country between Theſſalonica and Stagira, which mines are ſaid to have been wrought by the Turk ; but by far the moſt conſiderable were in the mountain Pangæus, which king Philip added to his dominions. The Thaſians, inhabitants of a little iſland lying in the Strymonic bay, had rendered themſelves very conſiderable by the wealth they drew from them. This made the Athenians ſo covetous of this tract of country, which, after many expeditions and much-ado, they attained, and loſt it to the Thracians afterwards. Philip drove them out, and having rebuilt the antient city of Crenides in a magnificent manner, called it by his own name Philippi ; and carefully eſtabliſhing perſons ſkilful in the art of refining there, he made much greater advantage of thoſe mines than any of their former poſſeſſors had done ; nay, it is ſaid, that he obtained the empire of Greece chiefly by means of the treaſures extracted hence ; which muſt appear very probable, if what Diodorus tells us be true, that he received annually a thouſand talents of gold<sup>l</sup>. The Romans, when they reduced Macedonia into a province, reſtrained the inhabitants from digging or refining gold or ſilver, leaving them at liberty, however, to manufacture any other metal<sup>k</sup>.

Animals.

As there are not in Macedonia any animals peculiar thereto, we are under no neceſſity of entering into a detail of thoſe common to it and to the reſt of Greece ; we ſhall content ourſelves therefore with mentioning only one thing which is very remarkable, and that is the abundance of horſes which were in Macedonia under its antient princes. This will be ſet in a clear light by a ſingle fact : There were kept in the royal ſtud near Pella three hundred ſtone-horſes and thirty thouſand mares<sup>l</sup>. It is evident from hence, that it was the military prudence of the Macedonian kings which determined them to place their hopes not in horſe but in foot, which might be ſerviceable in all countries, whereas cavalry could act only in plains. Their inordinate love of hunting engaged them, however, to keep up ſo large a breed of horſes, which were excellent in their nature, fleet, high-mettled, ſtrong-hoofed, and able to ſubſiſt on very little and very ordinary provender. We need not wonder therefore, that the Macedonian armies were ſo terrible, when their horſe were extraordinary good, and their foot excellent.

As to the rarities of Macedonia, which, according to the order obſerved in this work, ought to cloſe the deſcription, we will begin with the Picrian hills and ſhades, which, on account of their lovely verdure and pleasant solitude, were stiled the habitations of the muses, who thence also were called Pierides. Amongst them rose the fountain Pimplia, from whence they were called Pimpliades<sup>m</sup>. Vitruvius tells us, that near the sepulchre of Euripides there flowed from a fountain waters of so poisonous a nature, as if swallowed brought on immediate and inevitable death<sup>n</sup>. A modern traveller informs us, that in passing mount Jougous, which seems to be part of that ridge formerly called the Scardian mountains, he found a certain flower, which he takes to be a kind of Lunaria major, which produced, as he apprehended, a stem or button according to the increase of the moon, till those buttons equalled the days of the moon's age. He brought some roots and seeds of this flower with him into France, that this curiosity might be more leisurely observed and considered<sup>o</sup>. We might add to these abundance of other curiosities, if we could give credit to all the fragments of natural history left us by the antients, or to the ordinary collections on the same subject which have been made by the moderns; but as many of these relations are apparently absurd, many more very injudiciously recited, and the authorities in most cases but very weak, we shall content ourselves with reporting these, and so conclude a chapter, wherein the reader hath at least a more complete description of Macedonia than he can find else-where; for though its kings subdued so great a part of the known world, yet hath no historian, antient or modern, written explicitly of this country; but have contented themselves with brief and general descriptions, such as might suit well enough with the form of their histories, but were absolutely incompatible with the nature of this, which is universal, not in title and shew only, but in a particular consideration of all the kingdoms, empires, and states treated therein.

Of the antiquity, government, customs, laws, manners, and military discipline of the Macedonians.

IT has been heretofore observed, that Macedonia was originally inhabited by many nations. In our geographical descriptions, we have recorded their names, pointed out originally their seats, and delivered whatever remarkable passages we Argives.

could find about them in antient authors. Those from whom that race sprung, which from small beginnings became lords of Greece and afterwards of the world, were Argives. Under the leading of Caranus, who was descended from Hercules by his son Temenus, they came into this country, and with their swords carved out themselves fair possessions<sup>a</sup>. By degrees they enlarged their dominions, not more by their valour than by their prudence and condescension; for erecting no trophies after victories, and treating those they subdued with the tenderness of brethren, they vanquished not only their persons, but their minds; and thus taking away all distinctions, they in time reduced various tribes into one nation, which of course became too potent for its neighbours, and continually made incroachments upon them, unless restrained by their united force, or the fear of provoking the Persian monarch, or some of the most powerful Greek republics. As the Macedonians, whose history we are now writing, were composed of many nations mixed with each other, and as all those nations were remarkable for bravery, hardiness, and contempt of luxury, it is easy to conceive, that the Macedonians were not unlike them. If we were to follow the method hitherto used, we should be obliged to repeat many things already said of the Greeks; to avoid which, and at the same time to deliver all that the reader can expect under this section for clearing the subsequent history, we shall reduce what we have to offer under three general heads: The first shall regard the government of Macedon and the administration of its princes: The second the customs of the people religious and civil: The third their military discipline.

of government.*

THE Macedonians had always kings; yet under their administration they preserved as great or greater liberty than was enjoyed under most of the Grecian commonwealths<sup>b</sup>. Their monarchs ruled but they ruled according to law, or rather according to the maxims of natural equity, and did not commit any flagrant injustice merely to gratify their wills. This was the original constitution, and it may be said to the glory of this nation, that it was not subverted but with the kingdom. On this account Lucian introducing Philip and Alexander in his dialogues, makes the former call the Macedonians, Freemen<sup>c</sup>. In cases where the punishment was capital, the cause was heard by the army, or by the people ; and, till they condemned the party, the king did not pretend to put him to death. We shall meet with many instances of this in the reign of Alexander, who maintained the customs of his native soil when far from it, and did not think, that all his victories could release him from the obligations he was under of acting according to the constitution of his country. When in his passion he killed Clitus, he on recollection would have punished himself with death, if the army had not interfered and taken his guilt upon them<sup>d</sup>. Polybius informs us, that when king Philip, the last but one of the Macedonian princes, had caused Leontius, whom he suspected of conspiring against him, to be seized, a body of targeteers, who were advanced before the army, sent deputies to desire that he might not be proceeded against till they should rejoin it, that the king might not seem to have no regard for them or their sentiments<sup>e</sup>. It is true, the same author tells us, that the king provoked by this message, put Leontius sooner to death than he would have done ; but he excused himself from the necessity of the thing, and punished the rest of the conspirators after the antient manner, By verdict of the army. It is not to be concluded from hence, that the Macedonians were always jealous of their liberties, and quarrelling with their princes about them, for that was not the case. They did not call themselves a free people, but acknowledged that they were subject to their prince ; yet with this hope, that he would govern them as he ought, which when he did, they were most loyal ; but were not so obedient, when he digressed from the paths of reason : They clamoured loudly at Alexander, when he began to affect the eastern mode of governing ; nor would they be reconciled to him by gifts and fair speeches, but shewed a visible dislike, not of the king, but of such actions as he committed unworthy of his royal dignity<sup>f</sup>. The throne was hereditary, and continued in the race of Caranus till the slaughter of Alexander's family ; but it does not appear, that the Macedonians were very strict as to the succession, so it was of the royal house, though generally speaking the eldest son succeeded. The antient kings of Macedon were very modest in the ensigns of their dignity ; for Alexander the great seems to have been the first who wore a diadem and rich robes of state ; which, however, he transferred to his successors, yet the old kings had what was sufficient to distinguish them from their subjects, splendid armour, and a chair of state<sup>s</sup>. The generality of the people were always wonderfully loyal, and not only chearfully obeyed, but were zealously addicted to the service of, their prince ; nay, they seem to have carried their affection towards his person too far, by making a law, or else adopting it from the Persians, that not only conspirators, but all who were related to them, should be put to death, with which, however, Alexander dispensed<sup>h</sup>. Their love for their princes, however, did not carry them into any indecent or idolatrous submission, when they approached them ; on the contrary, they conversed with them freely, and saluted them with a kiss<sup>i</sup>. When therefore Alexander would have introduced the Persian custom of adoring him, the Macedonians were extremely displeased, and did not forbear declaring their sentiments, that reverence was due to kings, but adoration to the gods<sup>k</sup>. In point of marriage the Macedonian kings seem not to have been very strict ; for it appears from history, that they had frequently many wives, and concubines not a few<sup>l</sup>. In the education of their children they were exceedingly strict ; their sons were brought up under the best masters in the love and knowledge of all things great and glorious ; their daughters in the practice of all things virtuous. What Alexander said to Sisygambis will better demonstrate this than any description ; Mother, the robe I have on was not only the gift of my sister, but the work of her hands<sup>m</sup>. In the conduct of their affairs the kings of Macedon were remarkably moderate, and behaved with the greatest prudence ; they did not affect magnificent entertainments, but eat plainly with their friends. They admitted all sorts of persons to their presence, and by a continual habit of business made themselves at once necessary and agreeable to their subjects<sup>n</sup>. Hunting was their chief diversion, and Alexander was so addicted to it, that he would follow it for a whole day without taking refreshment<sup>o</sup>. These princes were generally speaking learned, or at least favourers of learned men. Archelaus was the great patron of Euripides, and not only honoured him living, but mourned for him when dead. Philip the father of Alexander was one of the best speakers of his age ; he was generous to such men of learning as sought his friendship, because he thought himself honoured thereby ; and he pardoned libellers, because he would not punish wit even in an enemy <sup>p</sup>. If his son Alexander had not been the most active prince in the world, he would have been celebrated for being the most knowing <sup>q</sup>. As in the ordinary occurrences of life the kings of Macedon did not affect that pomp which in those days was frequent enough with princes, so in the most solemn acts of their administration they preserved such a modest decorum as rather endeared than awed their subjects. They heard causes in person, and suffered those who pleaded before them to speak with the utmost freedom. Thus, when Philip after drinking hard had decided contrary to right against a poor woman, she cried out, I appeal. To whom, said the king ? Why, replied she, from Philip, with his head disturbed by the fumes of wine, to Philip, when he shall be sober and in his right senses <sup>r</sup>. Which the king received as a just rebuke, and without the least resentment. This custom by a felicity peculiar to this people continued as long as they had kings ; for Livy tells us of Perseus, the very last of them, that, after the manner of his ancestors, he sat in an ivory chair, and heard all sorts of causes, even those which were of little consequence <sup>s</sup>. The kings of Macedon spoke even to private soldiers with great freedom and condescension ; they took as much care of them as if they had been their children, or at least their intimate friends, and such of them as were slain in the wars were always carefully interred with all military honours. Such as behaved themselves with extraordinary valour were honoured with particular marks of distinction ; and it is especially recorded of Alexander the Great, that he suffered no one to go without a just recompence of his merit <sup>t</sup>. The great men of the kingdom were honoured with the titles of the king's friends and counsellors, nor were they so in name only, but in reality ; they gave their advice as statesmen, but they gave it with all the freedom the most intimate friendship should confer <sup>u</sup>. Hephestion the friend of Alexander was not afraid even of the resentment of the queen mother, answering her angry letters with a manly freedom, telling her, that, secure in his innocence, he was in no pain from her threats, since Alexander was to judge of all things<sup>a</sup>. And that this was not peculiar to Hephæstion or Alexander, we may guess from the observation in Justin, that the friends of the Macedonian kings were not only companions in war, but associates in empire<sup>2</sup>. They were allowed to wear purple, were intrusted with armies without instruction, and when the Macedonian greatness triumphed over kingdoms, they were appointed governors of them with the court and state of kings<sup>3</sup>. The king's life-guard, which consisted but of a small number, was a post of high honour; Oxathres the brother of Darius was received into this number: Besides these there were other household troops, the commanders of which were not only honourable persons, but even the private men, who, as occasion served, were from thence preferred to great commands<sup>b</sup>. With respect to civil officers, we find that the king's secretaries were very much considered; they not only drew up orders, but saw them executed<sup>c</sup>. The king's seal, or signet, which was on his ring, remained generally speaking in his own custody; but sometimes he delivered it for special purposes to one of his friends, because whatever was sealed therewith was by the Macedonians held sacred and inviolable. Alexander, when dying delivered his signet to Perdiccas, which was thought to explain an expression he had before made use of, that the government should be vested in the most worthy. Not that he meant to disinherit his own family, but that by this act he constituted Perdiccas protector of the kingdom; and in this sense Perdiccas understood it, when in the presence of the Macedonians he desired to decline that mighty load of business, which the king in his last moments would have laid upon his shoulders<sup>d</sup>. The royal physicians were highly considered in the court of Macedon, and were treated by their masters as if they had been their intimate friends<sup>e</sup>. When the kings were sick, the whole nation made prayers and vows for their recovery, the meanest people shewing the same sorrow in their looks, their habits, and their speeches, as if their nearest relations were on their death-beds<sup>f</sup>. When Alexander lay ill at Babylon, the grief of the soldiers some days before his death was so tumultuous, that he condescended to shew himself, and, notwithstanding his great weakness, extended his hand and suffered every one of them to kiss it <sup>a</sup>. After their deaths the Macedonian kings were interred in the royal sepulchre, built by Argeus at the command of his father Perdiccas, with this assurance, that while the kings were buried there, his race should never fail, and after their interment the people mourned for them as for their common parents <sup>b</sup>. Such was the ease, such the excellent constitution of Macedon, such the paternal piety of its princes, and such the filial obedience of their people. Let us now proceed to the second head.

THE Macedonians in point of religion followed the opinions embraced by the rest of the Greeks, worshipping many gods, and indulging a vast variety of vain and ridiculous rites. Jupiter, Hercules, and Diana were especially revered by them, the first as their protector; the second as the patron of the brave; the last as the goddess of hunting, to which they were universally addicted <sup>c</sup>. As they were strict in their morals, so according to the mode of those times they were very religious. Their princes disdained not to act on special occasions as priests, and to offer sacrifices for themselves and their people. All the historians who have wrote of the life of Alexander agree in furnishing us with many instances of his devotion, not only in sacrifices, but in erecting altars, instituting games, dedicating statues, and many other things. Omens were greatly heeded by this people; two eagles fluttering the whole day over the royal palace when Olympias was in labour was construed to portend, that the two empires of Europe and Asia would center in the child of which she was then delivered <sup>d</sup>. Many other instances of a like nature occur in the history, as the reader will observe; and therefore we need not anticipate them here.

IN their ordinary manner of living this nation was remarkably temperate; but when they feasted, they were always magnificent, and loved to eat well and drink hard. Caranus the king of Macedon, is recorded to have made a marriage feast remarkably splendid <sup>e</sup>, and the same taste appeared in his successors, particularly in Philip, who was a prince of high spirit. At these feasts the young men were admitted to sit down as soon as they had killed a wild boar fairly, that is with their spears, without toils or nets <sup>m</sup>. From their very infancy they were accustomed to ride, to hunt, and as soon as they were able to go into the field. At their banquets no women were admitted, and it was an inviolable rule with them, that nothing said at them should be repeated. At marriage-feasts they had an extraordinary custom, a piece of bread was cut in two with a sword, one part of which was given to the bridegroom, and the other to the bride, which had no doubt some concealed meaning <sup>n</sup>. Their captives they made use of as concubines, but it was held dishonourable to marry them; yet Alexander broke through this by his marriage with Roxana, and numbers followed his example. It is certain his victories changed the manners of his soldiers as well as his own; for whereas before they were content with plain and light arms, they afterwards adorned themselves with the spoils of the vanquished, and became not only well, but richly, clad, at the expence of the Persians <sup>o</sup>.

IN affairs of government we have shewn them to be wise and prudent; in one thing, however, they were very defective, viz. in their care of maritime affairs, which, notwithstanding the great advantage they had, they neither practised nor understood, as is evident from the accounts we have of Alexander's fleets and naval expeditions, and the fright and terror his seamen were under at every new sight they saw <sup>p</sup>. We can account for this no otherwise than from their being continually engaged in wars with their neighbours upon the continent, and having their ports at the same time either in the hands of, or blocked up by, the maritime powers of Greece. Philip, who first freed his country from these inconveniencies, had not time to think of naval affairs before he was cut off by an immature death; his successor, amongst other great designs he had formed, had that of settling and increasing his fleets in his mind when he died at Babylon <sup>q</sup>. Whatever contributed to make them strong and warlike was particularly affected by the Macedonians, which was the true reason why hunting was their great exercise and prime diversion; besides this, they were addicted to all the

Grecian exercises, particularly wrestling and boxing, for which sports there was a place set apart in all their camps, and their commanders, when the business of the war allowed them leisure, diverted themselves with seeing the activity of their soldiers in these exercises <sup>r</sup>. They also practised a kind of military dancing, which was at once both pleasant and wonderfully graceful <sup>r</sup>.

WE have already said, that their laws consisted only in the decrees of their princes, which were, however, founded on <sup>Their laws.</sup> the principles of natural equity, or otherwise would have exposed him, whose decisions they were, to the hatred and ill-will of his subjects. We have likewise observed, that in capital cases judgment was given by the people of the army; here it will be fit for us to observe, that the accused was always suffered to defend himself with the utmost freedom, though even at his trial he appeared bound in a habit of distress and without any ensigns of dignity, let his quality be what it would. In doubtful cases the torture was permitted without any respect to birth or former services, of which we shall find frequent instances in the history of Alexander, whose reign, as it was tinged purple with the blood of his enemies, so it was also stained with the gore of his countrymen. The punishments among them were of different kinds; sometimes the criminal was thrust through with darts, at other times crucified with his head downwards: Sometimes they were thrown chained into rivers; yet these seem to have been either foreign customs or punishments inflicted in extraordinary cases; that which was most frequent, and which consequently seems to have been legal, was stoning <sup>t</sup> to death, wherein the army, as they had been made judges, were executioners, which perhaps was no ill expedient to prevent rash judgments.

THE Macedonian year, or, as it is usually called, the Greek year, to distinguish it from the Attic year, was composed of twelve months; but as to the number of days in each of these months and the method of the Macedonian calendar, there are great disputes, we shall set down the scheme of the judicious archbishop Usher, and shall inform the learned and inquisitive reader where he may receive further satisfaction in a note <sup>u</sup>.

A TABLE of the MACEDONIAN Months.

Dius consisted of thirty days, the first of which answered to the 24th of September, the last to the 23d of October.

Apellacus, containing thirty days, the first of which answered to the 24th of October, the last to the 22d of November.

Audynaenus, consisted of thirty one days, the first answering to the 23d of November, the last to the 23d of December.

Peritius, containing thirty days, the first answering to the 24th of December, the last to the 22d of January.

Dysstrus, consisting of thirty days, the first answering to the 23d of January, the last to the 21st of February.

Xanthicus, containing thirty one days, the first answering to the 22d of February, the last to the 24th of March, excepting the intercalated year, when it answered to the 23d. In this month there was a lustration solemnly performed, which from the name of the month was called Xanthica, in this manner : They divided a bitch in the middle, laying one side with the intrails on their right hand, the other on the left ; between marched the army in battalia, and after they had passed, they separated into two corps, and maintained a mock fight.

Artemisius, consisting of thirty one days, the first answering to the 25th of March, and the last to the 24th of April.

Daesius, containing thirty days, the first answering to the 25th of April, the last to the 24th of May ; this month the Macedonians held to be extremely unfortunate, which Alexander observing, and knowing how dangerous superstition is, when strongly seated in vulgar minds, he as a remedy in the present case decreed, that this month should not be for the future called Daesius, but, by a repetition of the name of the former month, called it the second Artemisius.

Panemus, consisting of thirty one days, the first answering to the 25th of May, the last to the 24th of June.

Lous, containing thirty days, the first answering to the 25th of June, the last to the 24th of July.

Gorpiacus, consisting of thirty one days, the first answering to the 25th of July, the last to the 24th of August.

Hyperberetæus

Hyperberetaes, containing thirty days, the first answering to the 25th of August, the last to the 23d of September.

THUS the Macedonian year consisted of seven even months, that is of months of thirty days each, making in all two hundred and ten days, and of five unequal months consisting of thirty one days each, making in all a hundred and fifty five days, together three hundred and sixty five days; but every fourth year the month Hyperberetaes, consisted of thirty one days, which answered the end of our leap year (A).

As there were very rich mines in Macedonia, so under several kings there were great variety both of silver and gold pieces coined; of the latter sort were the Philippics so called from bearing the bust of Philip the father of Alexander, which are so often mentioned in antient authors, and were for a long time the most current money in Greece; and such were many others, descriptions of which are to be found among the writings of antiquaries, as some of the pieces are yet extant in the cabinets of the curious. There is a singularity in the Macedonian coins, which ought not to be passed

(A) Lalamantius wrote three dissertations on the antient methods of computing time, the second of which relates only to the Macedonian year, which he tells us consisted of twelve months, making Xanticus the first, and Dysstrus the last. One half of these months he asserts to have consisted of twenty nine days, and the other half of thirty; taken together, the Macedonian year according to him consisted of 354 days; to reconcile which to the solar year, at the end of each third year they intercalated a month of thirty three days. He does not attempt to support all he says by authorities, but contents himself with laying them down as matters of fact. The very learned and judicious primate Usher in his excellent work, intitled, A Dissertation on the Macedonian and Asiatic solar year, has examined this matter to the bottom; and, with all the skill of a learned astronomer, and all the knowledge of a critic in the Greek literature, hath made this matter as plain as can be made, supporting every thing which he advances by reason and authority; to him therefore we have adhered in this hitherto intricate matter, and to his most excellent treatise we must refer the inquisitive reader for a perfect account of the construction of the Macedonian calendar (1).

over, and it is this ; they not only bear the busts and inscriptions of the princes under whom they were coined, but also the names of the cities in which they were coined, and the figures on their reverses frequently refer to those cities <sup>a</sup>.

Their language.

THE Macedonian tongue differed very much from the Greek, that is, from all the several dialects of that language, as is evident from Strabo <sup>y</sup> and Athenæus <sup>z</sup> ; but especially from Curtius in his account of the proceedings against Philotas ; from whence it is clear, that the natives of Greece, who served in Alexander's army, were not able to understand a discourse delivered in the Macedonian tongue <sup>a</sup>.

WE come last of all to the military discipline of the Macedonians which was their peculiar glory, and which raised them from a mean and obscure people to be lords of Greece. They were in their first beginning obstinately brave, as well as naturally warlike ; by degrees they acquired knowledge in discipline, and became at last invincible from a happy mixture of superior courage with superior skill. We are indebted for these observations to Polybius, an author of equal character for veracity and penetration, who, in his description of the military virtues of the Macedonians, does them all the justice that the best of writers could afford the bravest men <sup>b</sup>. But it may be objected, if the Macedonians were always so fierce and so unconquerable a nation, how they came to be so long under the dominion of the Persians, to be awed by the Illyrians, Thracians, and other neighbouring nations, and to be tributary to the Athenians even to the time of Philip ? The reader will find an answer to all this in the course of the succeeding history, whence it will appear, that these were so many obstacles placed in the way of the Macedonian greatness from the natural situation of things, against which they continually struggled, and in the end overcame them all. True it is, that the Macedonians were often less powerful, though never less brave than their neighbours, that till the time of Philip they were far from being rich, and that till his reign they had not either shewn hopes or ambition of assuming the sovereignty of Greece ; but when once the genius of their prince had opened a path to empire, they seconded his efforts by undertaking chearfully the most arduous expedition, and undergoing, in order to their accomplishment, the severest discipline. War from this time forward was the business of the whole nation, insomuch, that the youth of Alexander's army were not only bred but born in the camp ; but it is necessary for us to be more particular, and therefore we will subdivide the remaining part of this head into five considerations.

THE first shall relate to the choice of the army, that is, the troops of which it was made up ; and these, after the Macedonian kings became considerable, were, first, their natural-born subjects ; secondly, their allies ; and thirdly, mercenaries. The natural Macedonians served at their own expence, and contented themselves with the spoil of their enemies <sup>c</sup>. The allies were composed of the respective quotas of Thessaly, Pæonia, and other dependent provinces, as also of the auxiliary troops furnished by Greece after the kings of Macedonia were elected captains general <sup>d</sup>. The mercenaries were soldiers of fortune, who never inquired the cause, if they stood in no doubt about their pay <sup>e</sup>. When Alexander marched on his grand expedition, his infantry consisted of thirteen thousand Macedonians, seven thousand auxiliaries, and five thousand mercenaries <sup>f</sup>. The Thessalians furnished, generally speaking, horse, and there were also many troops of Macedonian cavalry ; their discipline was strict, for in case the private men lost their horses, either by sickness or in action, their officers were obliged to furnish others out of their own stables, if they had any in them, from an old-fashioned notion, that the good of the public was to be preferred to the pomp of private men <sup>g</sup>.

SECONDLY, let us speak of the order of the Macedonian troops ; the foot were composed of three sorts, viz. the light-armed <sup>h</sup>, the Peltastæ, who were better armed <sup>i</sup>, and the heavy armed soldiers, of whom the phalanx was composed <sup>k</sup>. These troops were suited to all sorts of enterprizes ; for if a post was to be attacked suddenly, the light-armed foot were employed ; if steadily, and in expectation of an obstinate resistance, then the Peltastæ or targeteers were sent ; the heavy armed foot were generally drawn up in the centre of the army in a square body, which was called the phalanx <sup>l</sup>. Polybius tells us, that it consisted of sixteen in flank and five hundred in front, all pikemen, the soldiers standing so close, that the pikes of the fifth rank reached their points beyond the front of the battle. It is evident from hence, that the pikes of the last ranks were of no use according to this disposition ; they had, however, an excellent remedy for this, which was thus ; the hindermost ranks leaned their pikes on the shoulders of those who were before them, and locking them fast pressed briskly against them when they made the charge, so that the first five ranks had the impetus of the whole phalanx, which was the reason why its shock was, generally speaking, irresistible <sup>m</sup>. It is not very clear into what corps the gross of the Macedonian infantry was divided ; but that they were divided into many small bodies, is apparent. But as in all wars the king was commander in chief, so, generally speaking, he had the greatest trouble upon his hands ; for in camp, in sieges, and in battles, he went every-where, and directed all things, affecting neither in pomp of habit, in easiness of life, or by a large train, to distinguish himself from other commanders, but, on the contrary, fared as meanly as any of his soldiers, and exceeded them all in his labours ; nor is this to be understood only of Philip and Alexander, those great and shining lights in the Macedonian empire, but of their predecessors and successors also ; the last Philip is recorded by Livy to have trod the same steps, and to have disdained, that either the lustre of empire, or the load of upwards of threescore years, should excuse him from any part of that fatigue which he required of the meanest Macedonian <sup>n</sup>. Happy nation, in which the royal diadem was known and revered, not from the splendor of its jewels, but of the virtues of him who wore it !

THIRDLY, we will consider the arms of the Macedonians offensive and defensive. At first their targeteers were furnished only with wooden bucklers, or such as were made with a kind of wicker ; but in process of time they had them of leather and brass, as we learn from a speech of Alexander's when his soldiers were about to mutiny, wherein he reproaches them with their being in a manner naked, in his father's time, being furnished only with wooden arms, and bucklers made of hurdles <sup>o</sup>. It is a difficult thing to write clearly on this subject after Curtius, because he uses words as synonymous which have very different significations. Arrian therefore is a better guide ; from him we discover, that the Macedonians had a large strong shield called in Greek Aspis, and a small light buckler called Pelte, the former belonging to the heavy-armed troops, the latter to those who were between the heavy and light-armed, who were from thence called Peltastæ or Targeteers <sup>P</sup>. As to the Macedonian swords, we do not find that they differed from those of the rest of the Greeks; they were made both for pushing and cutting, as will appear from various incidents in the succeeding history; their hilts were wrought in various forms, and that pretty early, as appears from the murder of Philip the father of Alexander, which was performed by Pausanias with a sword, on the hilt of which was engraven a chariot drawn by four horses; the Macedonians also made use of daggers; as to their spears, they were of different kinds, viz. long and short; the former were used by the soldiers composing the phalanx, and were sometimes sixteen, at the least fourteen, cubits, or one and twenty feet in length; the shorter spear was used by the light-armed troops <sup>Q</sup>. The head-piece was made of a raw ox's hide, that is, untanned, we may suppose, for the sake of its toughness; Livy speaks of horns to it. 'Tis very probable that these were the wings of a double crest, one of which, as Plutarch tells us, was struck from the head-piece of Alexander at the battle of Granicus. They had also breast-plates made of linen quilted to a proper thickness, and a particular kind of military shoe <sup>R</sup>. The horsemen wore the same defensive arms as the foot, except that their bucklers were lighter and smaller, and their spears shorter. All these things were well contrived for the times in which they were used; and it is observable, that the Roman authors all speak of the Macedonian discipline as very complete, and acknowledge that the phalanx was almost an equal match for the legion.

Fourthly, let us turn our thoughts on the Macedonian ar- Their di- mies when in the field. The phalanx was drawn up generally discipline in in the centre; the horse and light-armed troops in two lines the field.
on the right and left. In all engagements the phalanx marched slowly, but was particularly quick in its motions; that is to say, it did not press precipitately upon the enemy, but receiving its orders from the king, took what form he directed, sometimes extending itself in front, at others deepening its files till it had the shape of a wedge, fighting steadily and obstinately, till the force of the enemy was entirely broken, who were then pursued by the light-armed forces and the horse, the phalanx remaining in the field of battle, and carefully preventing the enemy's reassembling their troops <sup>S</sup>. It is not evident from any of the antient historians, that the phalanx

Antiquitat. Macedon. lib. iii. c. 4.      PERRIN: Antiquit., Vol. II. lib. iii.

was divided into very small corps; a phalanx of sixteen thousand men consisted but of ten battalions; and as they were seldom intended to march in separate bodies, there was no great occasion for those subdivisions which were in use in other armies<sup>t</sup>. When the armies drew near, the charge was sounded by trumpets; after which the king or general was wont to make an oration, exhorting the people to consider the glory which their ancestors had won, and to shew themselves worthy of such ancestors by their own conduct. Curtius tells us, that after the fight was begun, as often as occasion offered, the king addressed himself to the army, and endeavoured by all means to excite them to the performance of great things<sup>u</sup>. If the soldiers were pleased with the king's speech, then they signified it by the clashing of their arms; but if it did not affect them, then they remained silent. When they charged, they cried out, Alala, Alala, a word which has no proper signification; but may be properly enough rendered into English by a word used to the same purpose, viz. Huzza. Lastly, when they desired quarter, their method was to hold their spears aloft in the air<sup>v</sup>.

In the fifth place, their general discipline, or rather the Macedonian art of war, falls under our cognizance. With respect to the hardiness, frugality, and good order of the Macedonian troops, all authors are agreed; and though, it may be, their discipline was in some measure relaxed, when Alexander distributed amongst them the spoils of the east, yet by degrees the antient rules were restored, so that the very last Macedonian armies were much admired for the regularity of their discipline. When the army was in the field, the king, assisted by his generals and by such officers of the army as were best acquainted with those matters, marked out a place for a camp, which was immediately fortified with a good ditch and retrenchment. When the army was to march, part of this retrenchment was levelled, that they might march in order; an excellent maxim, if we consider the structure of their phalanx, which could not well have borne passing through several openings<sup>w</sup>. The tents were small, as being intended to supply only a necessary covering against the inclemency of the weather. They were made of skins, and therefore, when they were bundled up, they sometimes made use of them in passing rivers; two soldiers lay in a tent. As for the king, his tent was pitched in the centre, wherein he lay by himself; it seems to have consisted but of two apartments, one where the king slept, the other where he saw company, before the door of it his guards did duty <sup>a</sup>. The military signals among the Macedonians were either trumpets or fires. On a march the cavalry and light-armed troops took post in the van, the phalanx in the centre, and the baggage in the rear, except when there was reason to apprehend a sudden engagement; then they marched in order of battle; every soldier had a kind of knapsack, and there were also carts and waggon which attended on the army, but not in such numbers as were used by other nations, because among the Macedonians neither women nor useless servants were indulged <sup>a</sup>. As to plunder, it was sometimes distributed amongst the soldiers, at others collected together and sold for the use of the king, or for the army <sup>b</sup>. When in quarters, to keep up discipline, and to preserve the army from corruption, military games were instituted, wherein rewards both honorary and lucrative were bestowed. After victories obtained, their kings were wont to reward all such as particularly distinguished themselves; as for such as died in the service, they were honoured with public monuments, and their children and relations freed from tribute; in all other respects, they were treated with the greatest humanity and condescension, and when the time limited for their service expired, or their wounds rendered them incapable of serving, they were dismissed, not to seek a living where they could, but with ample provision for themselves and families, that they might enjoy the fruits of their labours, and by living in ease and peace excite younger and more robust men to serve chearfully in their stead <sup>c</sup>. We have insisted the longer upon this head, because the Macedonians were rendered considerable by nothing so much as their abilities in war; their empire was gained and preserved by arms, and of consequence the Macedonian history would be unintelligible, if the nature and discipline of their armies were not fully and properly described; for want of it the exploits of Philip have been ill understood, and those of Alexander wear too often the air of romance. We hope that in the subsequent sheets they will appear in the light of true history.

The History of the Macedonian kingdom, from its foundation to the reign of Philip the father of Alexander.

THE great obscurity of the Greek history, arising chiefly from the want of antient historians, and the variations which are visible in the works of such authors as have attempted to give us the story of those antient times, have already sufficiently appeared from the account we have given of the fabulous and heroic times, and of the antient states of Greece. The history of the Macedonian kingdom wants not many difficulties of the same kind, and flowing from the same causes ; however, the series of its antient kings is pretty well settled, and though we have no regular account of them in any one antient historian, yet from the scattered relations in Herodotus, Thucydides, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Justin, Pliny, Solinus, and other antient writers, we have been able to assemble such a number of passages, as, when ranged in their just order of time, afford us a very passable account of the Macedonian affairs, during the period assigned at the head of this chapter ; and thenceforward we shall meet with fewer doubts and obstacles, and scarce any chasms in the narration to the very end of the Macedonian monarchy under Perseus the son of Philip. But, in the first place, it would be necessary to exhibit a scheme of those kings and the years of their reigns, as they are set down by the learned Petavius, who has adjusted these intricate points with wonderful judgment and perspicuity.

Caranus the founder of this kingdom was an Argive by Caranus. birth, and a descendant from Hercules, though authors are not well agreed at what distance. An antient Greek writer cited in Eusebius's chronicon places him in the eleventh degree <sup>a</sup>; but Velleius Paterculus says, that he was the sixteenth from Hercules <sup>b</sup>. It is, however, owned, that he derived his line from Temenus one of the sons of that hero, and that this Caranus was the brother of Phidon, the brother of Argos, who is reported to have been the inventer of weights and measures. On what account Caranus quitted his native country, no authors inform us; but all agree, that he left it at the head of a considerable body of Greeks, with whom intending to settle, as the custom of those times was, in some other country, he consulted the oracle as to the measures which he ought to take; he was answered, that he should establish his empire according to the direction of the goats. It is very probable, that Caranus, when he received this response, knew not what to make of it; however, in pursuit of his first intention he entered that country, since known by the name of Macedonia, and particularly the little kingdom of Æmathia, at that time governed by king Midas, and drew near to its capital, which was then called Edeffa. On a sudden the sky being overcast and a great storm coming on, Caranus observed a herd of goats running for shelter to the city; immediately recollecting the oracle, he commanded his men to follow them closely, and entering the city by surprize, he possessed himself first of it, and after of the kingdom. In gratitude to his conductors, he changed the name of the place into Ægea, and called his people Ægeates; he likewise made use of a goat in his standard, in order to perpetuate the memory of this extraordinary event. Telegonus the son of Astriopæus, the friend of Priam and one of the heroes in the Trojan war, governed Pæonia, and other little princes the several regions of which Macedonia is composed <sup>c</sup>. Caranus subdued by degrees such of his neighbours as were inferior to him in force, and added their dominions to his own, laying by this means the foundation of that kingdom which his successors afterwards raised to such splendor. Pausanias has recorded an exploit performed by this prince, which deserves consideration, inasmuch as it confirms what we have said before, and shews also how maxims come to be established in particular kingdoms. Caranus, among other princes against whom he turned his arms, attacked Cissæus the sovereign of a small territory south of the new kingdom Ægæa, and conquered his country ;<sup>a</sup> whereupon, according to the custom of the Argives, Caranus erected a trophy ; but a lion, coming out of a forest in the neighbourhood of Olympus, destroyed it ; of which the conqueror being informed, understood it as a caution from the gods not to irritate his barbarous neighbours by erecting monuments to their shame ; whence he made it a rule to himself, and left it as an inviolable maxim of state to his successors, never to treat any vanquished people as enemies, but to receive them immediately into their protection, as if they had been born their subjects<sup>d</sup>. Chronologers are by no means agreed as to the beginning of this prince's reign ; but, after considering what has been offered on all hands, and comparing the conjectures of the learned in this science with the facts mentioned by antient historians, the most probable opinion seems to be, that he founded this kingdom about seventeen years before the first olympiad, that is to say, about the year specified in the margin, according to the tables of the judicious archbishop Usher<sup>e</sup>.

To Caranus succeeded his son Cænus, of whom we know very little more, than that his mother was the daughter of one Cnopis a Colchian, who on some account or other came into Macedonia, and lived with Caranus, who married his daughter ; this Cænus began his reign in the last year of the third olympiad, and having governed twenty eight years as well as his father, he left his throne to Thurymas or Thurimas his son<sup>f</sup>.

Thurymas.

Thurymas, Thurimas, or Thyrmas, succeeded to the Macedonian throne about the eleventh olympiad. As to the particulars of his reign, we are totally in the dark, no antient author having recorded any thing about it. In order, however, to give the reader some idea of the time in which this Macedonian prince swayed with so little noise the sceptre of his fathers, it may not be amiss to take notice of some few remarkable things which fell out in his days in the neighbouring parts of the world. He was contemporary with Abaz and Hezekiah kings of Judah ; in the eighteenth year of his reign Salmanazar carried away captive the ten tribes of Israel. In his twentieth year Candaules king of Lydia was slain by Gyges his servant, and thereby the race of Hercules

Perdiccas the first began his reign in the twenty second Olympiad, a monarch of great parts, and happy in his fortune ; he extended his dominions at the expence of his neighbours, and did so many great things, that, like most other heroes, the light of his glory hath received some diminution from the shade of fiction which hath followed it *. When full of years, he is said to have shewn his son the place where he desired to be buried, and where he likewise exhorted him to order his own body to be laid, and those of his posterity, signifying at the same time, that till this custom was abolished, there should not want one of his line to sit upon the throne ; and some have been superstitious enough to imagine, that this prediction was fulfilled on the interring of Alexander the Great's body elsewhere †. Herodotus hath recorded many things which have indeed the air of fable in relation to this prince ; but as it is fit the reader should be acquainted with them, they are placed below in a note (A).

(A) The relation of Herodotus runs thus: “ Perdiccas obtained the monarchy of Macedonia in the following manner; Gavanes, Æropus, and Perdiccas, three brothers, descendants of Temenus, fled from Argos to Illyria, and from thence passing into the upper Macedonia, arrived in the city of Lebæa, where they entered into the king’s service for wages. One of them had the care of his horses, another of his oxen, and Perdiccas, who was the youngest, kept the lesser cattle; for in antient time, not only the people, but monarchs too, had little wealth. And as the wife of this king made their bread, she constantly perceived that of Perdiccas encreased to double the quantity of the rest; which when she had long observed, she acquainted her husband with what she had seen. The king having heard, and taking the thing for a prodigy, portending some considerable event, sent for the brothers, and commanded them to depart out of his territories. They answered, that in justice they ought to receive their salaries, and then they would readily go. But the king hearing them mention their salary, and at the same time seeing Argæus the son of Perdiccas succeeded his father about the thirty fourth olympiad ; he was a prince of great affability and goodness, whereby he gained the love of his people, and governed with much tranquillity and applause. In his time the Illyrians, a fierce and barbarous nation, invaded the Macedonians, and did them considerable mischief ; but Argæus, who was a wise and valiant, as well as a mild and peaceable prince, put himself at the head of his troops in order to oppose them ; and having, by a stratagem, drawn them into his power, he fell upon them, and put them to the sword with great effusion of blood. In the last year of his life he was contemporary with Ancus Martius king of Rome, and having then enjoyed the royal sceptre thirty two years, he died, and left the kingdom to Philip <sup>k</sup>.

 “ the gardens that are said to have belonged to Midias the son of “ these gardens, which are sheltered by a mountain called Bermion, inaccessible in winter. Here they began their first enterprises ; and after they had reduced these parts, they reduced

 “ the rest of Macedonia (1).

(1) Herodot. Hist. lib. vi.

Philip

Philip the first became king of Macedon about the entrance Philip I. of the forty second olympiad; he was a very good, as well as very valiant monarch; but, as to the transactions of his reign, there is little or nothing recorded about them, farther than that he fought with great courage in defence of himself and his people against the Illyrians, by whom he was slain in battle, and so left the crown to his son, an infant in his cradle<sup>1</sup>.

Æropas became king of Macedon, about the beginning of Æropas. the fifty first olympiad, at which time the Thracians and Illyrians ravaged all his country, and were continually successful in their battles against his subjects, till the Macedonians, enraged by the misfortunes they had suffered, and superstitiously conceiving that they could never fight successfully but under the auspice of their king, caused the young Æropas to be carried into the midst of the battle in his cradle; and, either encouraged by the presence of their infant prince, or disdainingly to leave a child in danger, they fought with such obstinate resolution, that they intirely defeated the Illyrians, and obliged them to retire. What were the future fortunes of a prince so prosperous in his infancy, no antient historian has told us; and therefore we can only say, that, after ruling Macedon forty two years, he yielded to fate, and left his dominions to his son<sup>m</sup>.

Alcetas began his reign over Macedon at a time when the Alcetas: several states of Greece exerted their increasing power, and sought to extend their fame and their dominion both by sea and land; when the affairs of Asia and the whole east were strangely altered by the fall of the Assyrian empire, and the conjunction of the Persian and Median power in the person of the great Cyrus; and when the petty princes in his neighbourhood began to feel the effects of the Greek power on the one side, and of this new-erected empire on the other, what precautions this king of Macedon took, either to preserve his own dominions from insults, or to extend their boundaries by subduing his neighbours, is not to be distinguished in the Greek histories now extant; but, if we may conjecture from what they relate of the transactions happening in his son's time, it will appear most probable that he contented himself with the kingdom left him by his ancestors, and fought rather to preserve that in peace, than to run the hazard of war through an ambitious desire to encrease it<sup>n</sup>.

Amyntas saw the power of the Persian empire encrease Amyntas. daily; for a while the ambitious views of Cambyses and Da- rius were either directed another way, or checked by seditions at home ; but after the reduction of Babylon, Darius, either envying the power of the Scythians, who some time before had made themselves lords of Asia, or being incensed against king Iancyrus for refusing him his daughter in marriage, he determined to march with a prodigious army into that country, and utterly to destroy the people ; accordingly having drawn together, as some authors report, an army of seven hundred thousand men, he caused a bridge to be laid over the Bosphorus whereon his army passed over from Asia to Europe, himself, however, going by sea ; then he gave instruction to the Ionians, and other his subjects, to sail to the mouth of the river Ister, over which they were commanded to lay a bridge ; which having passed, he gave them leave, after waiting for him sixty days, if he returned not in that time, to retire back again into their own country *. While the Persian emperor and all his mighty army were wandering about the deserts of Scythia, sometimes having an enemy in sight, and yet seeing nothing which might give them to believe the country, in which they travelled, was inhabited at all ; the Ionians, with the rest of the nations who were left to guard the bridge over the Ister, were consulting among themselves, whether they should still remain there in expectation of the Persians, or whether, breaking up the bridge, they should leave Darius and his army to perish by want, and by the arms of his enemies.

THE Scythians strongly solicited them to return into their own country, and the famous Miltiades, at that time prince of the Chersonese, conjured them not to lose so fair an opportunity of delivering themselves from the Persian yoke. But Histiæus, tyrant of Miletus, a city of Ionia, considering with himself, that, the Persian power destroyed, he should no longer be able to keep his city in subjection, took pains to possess the other reguli or petty kings, who were present, with the same notion, and so drew them all to concur with him in remaining firm to the interest of Darius. That the Scythians, however, might be pacified, and give them no disturbance, he advised them to break up so much of the bridge as was within bow-shot of their coast ; which when they began to do, the Scythians, conceiving that they had gained their purpose, immediately quitted the shore, and went in pursuit of Darius. The sixty days being expired, that prince made all the haste he could to the banks of the Ister, fearing that the bridge was broken, and that he and his army should find no passage ; but when they had reached it, and, as their custom was, set up a great shout, to give notice of their arrival, Histiæus instantly brought together the vessels which had been taken away, and so the army passed over into Thrace, from whence Darius, with the far greater part of it, made all the haste he could into Asia <sup>P</sup>.

To conceal, however, the want of success in this expedition as much as the thing would allow, he left behind him Megabyzus in Europe with an army of eighty thousand men, giving him orders to reduce all the neighbouring nations. In pursuance of these instructions he sent seven of the principal commanders of his army into Macedonia, to require Amyntas to acknowledge king Darius. Herodotus has preserved to us a very exact account of this negotiation ; we are of opinion, that the reader will not be displeased in having it as near as may be in his own words. When the Persians arrived in Macedon, they went and demanded earth and water in the name of Darius. Amyntas not only gave them what they required, but received them for his guests ; and, having prepared a magnificent feast, entertained them with great humanity. But, as the Persians were beginning to drink after supper, “ Macedonian friend, (said they) when we “ make a great feast in Persia, our manner is to bring in “ our concubines and young women to the company ; and “ therefore, since you have received us so affectionately, “ treated us with such magnificence, and owned king Darius
“ by the delivery of earth and water, we invite you to “ imitate our custom.” Amyntas answered, “ The man“ ner of our country is quite different ; for we keep our “ women separated from our men ; Nevertheless, because “ you are our masters, and require their attendance, we “ will do as you desire.” Having finished these words, he sent for the women, who, coming in as they were ordered, placed themselves on the other side of the table opposite to the Persians. But when they saw the women were very beautiful, the Persians told Amyntas that they were not placed with discretion ; and that he would have done better not to send for them at all, than to let them sit at that distance only to offend their eyes. Upon this Amyntas, compelled by necessity, ordered the women to sit down among the men : Which when they had done, the Persians, when full of wine, began to handle their breasts ; and some would have proceeded to kisses. These actions Amyntas saw with indignation ; yet seemed unconcerned, because he was afraid of the Per- sian power. But his son Alexander, who was present, and observed the same thing, being a young man, and unacquainted with adversity, was no longer able to endure their insolence; and therefore said to Amyntas: “Father, consider your age; and, leaving the company, retire to your rest. I will stay here, and furnish these strangers with all things necessary.” Amyntas perceiving that Alexander had some rash design to put in execution, “Son, (said he) I pretty well discern by thy words, that thou art angry, and art resolved to attempt some imprudent action in my absence. I charge thee therefore to do nothing against these men, that may turn to our disadvantage: But be contented to observe their actions with patience; and, for my own part, I will comply and retire.” When Amyntas had given him this counsel, and was gone out, Alexander spoke to the Persians in these terms: “Friends (said he) these women are at your command: You may lie with all, or as many of them as please you best; and therefore I desire you to declare your intentions with freedom: For I see you are inclined to sleep, and abundantly replenished with wine. Only permit them, if you think fit, to go out to bathe: and in a little time you may expect their return.” The Persians applauded this proposal, and Alexander sending away the women, ordered them to their own apartment: And having dressed a like number of smooth young men in the habit of women, he furnished every one with a ponyard, and introducing them to the Persians said, “We have treated you with all manner of variety: We have given you not only all we had, but whatever we could procure: And, which is more than all the rest, we have not denied you our matrons and daughters to complete your entertainment, you may be abundantly persuaded we have paid you all the honours you deserve; and, at your return, may acquaint the king who sent you, that a Grecian prince of Macedonia gave you a good reception both at table and bed.” Having thus spoken, Alexander placed at the seat of every Persian a young Macedonian in the disguise of a woman; who, when the Persians attempted to caress them, immediately dispatched all the seven. This was the fate of these Persians and of their attendants, who together with the chariots and all the baggage presently disappeared<sup>4</sup>.

Megabyzus hearing nothing of the messengers he had sent into Macedonia, and disdaining to march against so poor a kingdom himself, sent thither Bubaris one of his principal officers with a considerable body of troops, instructing him, as soon as he entered the frontiers of Macedon, to send for Amyntas, and make a strict inquisition after the ambassadors sent him before. This had certainly been the ruin of the Macedonian kingdom in the house of Caranus, if Alexander, who had been the author of the death of the Persians, had not likewise contrived a method how to pacify Eubaris; in order to this, he went directly to confer with him as soon as he entered the country, carrying with him Gygæa his sister, a very beautiful woman; with whom Bubaris became so much in love, that for the sake of obtaining her for a wife, he adjusted all things to the satisfaction of Amyntas. Thenceforward the kings of Macedon became dependent on the Persian emperors, but were always regarded as faithful allies, and therefore worthy of good usage and esteem<sup>r</sup>. It fell out in the reign of Amyntas, that Athens recovered her liberty, by expelling Hippias the son of Pisistratus, who had assumed the sovereignty. This exiled prince the king of Macedon (or his son) offered a retreat in his dominions, and the revenues of the city Authymus for his support; but Hippias thought fit to refuse this favour, as he did also an offer of the same sort from the Thessalians, who would have given him the city of Iolchus, chusing to retire first to Sigeum, and afterwards to Darius<sup>s</sup>.

MANY circumstances about this time concurred to influence the Persian emperor with a desire of making war with the Greeks; the Athenians, without staying till any injuries were offered them, sent a fleet to the assistance of the Ionians, who had revolted from Darius, merely because he had given a kind reception to Hippias; while that tyrant used all the eloquence, of which he was master, to persuade Darius to restore him to the sovereignty of Athens; in which he at last prevailed, for, the rebellion in Ionia being suppressed, the great king determined to send Mardonius to chastise the Athenians, and to put Hippias again in possession of the sovereignty he had usurped. This general, having crossed the Hellepont, marched with his land-forces into Macedonia, which as Herodotus tells us, he added to the Persian dominions: but this must be understood in a restrained sense; for it is universally agreed, that the Persians did never deprive Amyntas or any of his posterity of the kingdom, but on the contrary treated them always with kindness and respect.

While Mardonius lay here, the Persian fleet endeavouring to double the cape of mount Athos, was surprized by a storm, which drove more than half the ships ashore, whereby there perished no less than twenty thousand men. Nor did the land-army escape all misfortunes in these quarters; for the Bryges, a bold and barbarous people of Thrace, suddenly attacked Mardonius and his army in the night, with such advantage, that they slaughtered a great number of his men, and wounded himself, which provoked him so much, that he quickly made their country the scene of war, and reduced them under the Persian yoke. After which, and some other inconsiderable conquests on the north and north-west of Macedon, he marched back into Asia. Spurred on rather than checked by these disappointments, Darius still meditated the destruction of Greece; in order to which, he sent a new army, under the command of Datis a Median and Artaphernes the son of his brother, with whom went Hippias, who conducted them to the plains of Marathon, where they were shamefully defeated by Miltiades at the head of the Athenian army. Even this misfortune could not cure Darius of the malice he had conceived against the Greeks; on the contrary, it heightened and inflamed it; he ordered new preparations to be made for war throughout all his wide dominions, and especially directed all the Greeks, who were tributary to him, to provide ships and men, which gave the Macedonians an opportunity of exerting themselves with uncommon diligence, and thereby meriting the favour of their masters. But while these things were doing, Egypt revolted, against which Darius finding it necessary to march in person, he appointed Xerxes his successor, not long after which he died, without seeing either the Egyptian or Grecian war so much as begun†.

Xerxes, pursuing the schemes of his father notwithstanding the remonstrances of the wisest men about him, determined on a war with Greece; but previous to his grand expedition, he resolved to cause two things to be performed, which might strike his enemies with terror, and thereby induce submission without the expence of blood; these were the cutting a canal or passage for his ships through the isthmus, joining mount Athos to the continent, which was twelve furlongs, or a mile and a half broad; the other erecting a bridge cross the Hellepont, where the sea was about a mile broad. The first of these enterprizes was committed to the care of Bubaris and Artachæus, and as soon as all things were ready, the great

king marched with his prodigious host into Macedonia, his fleet being also stationed on this coast. The diligence and fidelity of Amyntas, his son Alexander, and their subjects, appeared in so fair a light to the Persians, especially through the representation of Bubaris who had married Alexander's sister, that he thought fit to add to the Macedonian kingdom the country lying near the mountains Hæmus and Olympus; at the same time Amyntas the nephew of Alexander obtained the city of Alabanda in Phrygia. It would be foreign to our purpose, should we enter here into a long detail of what happened in the famous war carried on at this time by the Persian emperor against the Greeks; we shall therefore take notice only of such points as immediately concern the princes whose history we are writing. When the Greeks first heard of Xerxes's invasion, they had thoughts of sending a body of forces into Thessaly in order to check him there, and to prevent his easy entrance into Greece; but the Alluade, princes of Thessaly, and Alexander of Macedon adhering to the Persian interest, the Greeks were constrained to abandon this scheme, and content themselves with disputing the passage at Thermopylæ. After the battle of Salamis, in which the mighty fleet of Xerxes was beaten in his fight by that of the Athenians and their confederates, and the hasty retreat of Xerxes, on a supposition that the Greeks would attempt the ruin of his bridge over the Hellepont, Mardonius, was left with an army of four hundred thousand men, to try if he could conquer the Greeks by land, whom his master had found invincible by sea. This Mardonius was an accomplished courtier, one who sought to accommodate himself to his prince's humour, and to preserve himself in honour and power by giving pleasing counsels; this man had been a principal instrument in supporting Xerxes in this destructive scheme, and therefore, to avoid the odium and punishment due to that offence, he had promised the performance of mighty things, provided the command of the army was given to him. As soon as Xerxes was gone, he sent for the principal persons of the adjacent countries, to whom he represented what a mighty confidence the great king reposed in them, and exhorted them, by their zeal on this occasion in bringing troops to join his army, to demonstrate their being worthy of the friendship of the great king. This made such an impression on the Macedonians and the rest, that, exerting themselves to the utmost, they in a short time augmented the Persian army with two hundred thousand men. However, the city of Potidea in Macedonia, in the midst of these preparations, ab-

olutely refused to send any succours to the Persians; but on the contrary declared for their enemies the confederate states of Greece; with these the Pellenians joined, and the Olynthians shewed some inclination to increase the defection, which began now to become formidable to the Persian power. Mardonius, that he might as soon as possible put a stop to this evil, detached Artabazus at the head of sixty thousand men to reduce these rebels. Against the Olynthians and Pellenians this commander was very successful, but the Potideans gave him a very great deal of trouble; it is highly likely that the inhabitants of this place being free, and subsisting chiefly by their traffic with the Greeks, were better disciplined, and consequently more capable of defending themselves against the Persians. At first Artabazus contented himself with blocking up Potidea, because he at the same time besieged the city of Olynthus, then inhabited by the Bottiæans, who had been driven out of the coast of the bay of Therma by the Macedonians. But after the taking of this city, and putting most of the inhabitants thereof to death, he came with his whole army before Potidea, and entered in earnest on the siege. How strong soever the place might be, and whatever valour its citizens might exert, it narrowly escaped the fate of Olynthus; for Timoxenus the commander of the Scyonæans entered into a conspiracy to betray the city; the manner in which he carried on his correspondence with Artabazus was, by putting a letter into the head of an arrow, afterwards affixing the feathers, and then shooting it to a certain place. But Artabazus having the misfortune to shoot when the people were about the place, it so happened, that his arrow struck into the shoulder of one of the Potideans; upon this several gathered about him, and drawing out the arrow, the letter was discovered, and thereby the conspiracy defeated. But this was not the only misfortune; after Artabazus had continued the siege three months, the sea broke into his camp, upon which he raised the siege, and marched as expeditiously as he could to Pellene; but before they had reached half way to that city, the waters overtook them, and, what was no less fatal, the Potideans in their boats, so that such as could not swim were drowned, and such as could were slain by the enemy; only, Mardonius lying in Thessaly, Artabazus found means to march the small remainder of his army, which had taken the higher road to his camp, and thereby finished this unfortunate expedition, which inasmuch as Potidea is a city of Macedon, fell properly within this section of our history <sup>u</sup>.

IN the beginning of the spring, Mardonius sent one Mus of European extraction to consult the most famous oracles on the present state of affairs. At his return, he took a sudden resolution of treating with the Athenians, whom he justly looked on as the most dangerous enemy his master had. In order to negotiate a separate peace with them, and thereby weaken the force of Greece, he made choice of Alexander, the son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, to be his ambassador. What were the motives that determined him to this are not very exactly recorded; but it is not difficult to discover them with some degree of certainty. Alexander was a prince of great genius, strictly allied to the Persians, and at the same time not a little esteemed by the Greeks; for he, when a very young man, being present at the olympic games, and challenged there as a barbarian who had no right to assist, had proved himself by descent an Argive, on which being admitted, not only to see, but to strive, he carried off the prize, and had the honour to be victor. When he came to Athens, that wise and then virtuous people, though they received him with great hospitality and kindness, yet they delayed giving him audience, till the Lacedæmonian ambassadors arrived. Then in a solemn assembly, he was permitted to speak freely, and to acquaint them with the propositions with which he was entrusted by Mardonius. Herodotus having given us the speech which he made on this occasion, the reader will probably be well pleased to see it in the words of that author; whose harangues are not the least admired parts of his work. “ Men “ of Athens, Mardonius has sent me to tell you, that he has “ received a message from the king containing these words :
“ I forgive the Athenians all the injuries they have done “ me ; and therefore, Mardonius, observe the following “ orders : Reinstate them in the possession of their own “ territories ; give them moreover whatever other country “ they shall chuse ; let them govern by their own laws, and “ rebuild all their temples which I have burnt, if they will come “ to an agreement with me. Having received these orders, “ I am obliged to put them in execution, unless you prevent me : And now I myself would ask you, What “ madness pushes you on to make war against a king you “ will never conquer, nor always be able to resist ? You are “ not ignorant of the numerous forces and great actions of “ Xerxes ; you have heard of the army I have, and if you “ should happen to be victorious, and to defeat us, which “ you can never hope so long as you have the use of reason, “ another much more powerful will come against you. Suf“ fer not yourselves then to be dispossessed of your country, “ and continually alarmed for your own lives, by measur“ ing your strength with the king ; but be reconciled to him, “ since you have now so favourable an opportunity in your “ hands from the present disposition of Xerxes. Enter “ therefore into an alliance with us, sincerely and without “ fraud, and continue to be a free people. These, O “ Athenians, are the words which Mardonius ordered me “ to say to you : For my own part, I shall not mention my “ constant affection to your state, because you have had suffi“ cient proof of that in former time : I beseech you then, “ hearken to the counsel of Mardonius ; for I see you will “ not be always able to make war against Xerxes. Had I “ not known this, I should never have undertaken to “ bring you this message ; but the king’s power is incom“ parably greater than that of all other mortals, and his “ reach so extensive, that, unless you immediately accept “ the favourable conditions he offers, I dread the consequen“ ces to you, who lying in the way of danger more than “ any other of the confederates, and possessing a country “ placed as a prize between the contending parties, must be “ always most exposed to ruin. Let these reasons prevail with “ you, and consider the important advantages you will re“ ceive, if the great king forgives you alone among all the “ Grecians, and becomes your friend”. The Lacedæmoni-ans, in answer to the arguments offered by Alexander, insisted, First, on the dishonour which the Athenians would sustain, if they made a separate peace with the common enemy : Secondly, they took notice, that the commencement of this war was wholly owing to the Athenians, in whose cause the other confederate states had armed : Thirdly, they promised, that the allies would provide for the subsistence of the Athenian women, and such as were unable to bear arms as long as the war continued : Lastly, they let fall some bitter expressions in regard to the ambassador himself. “ Be “ not therefore (said they) seduced by the delusive colours

 “ which Alexander the Macedonian has put upon the words “ of Mardonius. He acts in conformity to his condition ;
 “ he helps the tyrant, because he is a tyrant himself. But “ you ought to act in another manner, if you judge rightly, “ because you know the Barbarians have no regard either “ to truth or justice”. The Athenians acted as became them on this occasion, they told Alexander, “ They were “ sensible, that the power of the Medes was far superior to “ theirs ; but that liberty was to be defended against any “ force,

“ force, bidding him therefore tell Mardonius, that they “ would never make peace with his master as long as the “ sun continued his course, adding by way of caution to “ the ambassador himself ; Appear no more in the presence “ of the Athenians with such messages, nor exhort us to “ detestable actions under colour of doing us good offices ;
 “ for we are unwilling to use methods that may be uneasy “ to you, who are our friend, and engaged with us in a “ reciprocal hospitality”. Alexander, having received his answer, returned to Mardonius, who, when he found that the Athenians would not hear of a treaty, immediately determined to march his mighty army into their country, and destroy Athens a second time *. Having performed this, and gratified his revenge, he quitted Attica and marched into Bœotia, because, being a champain country, it was more proper for his horse. Here he encamped on the banks of the river Asopus. The confederate states of Greece, having drawn together their army, marched towards the enemy, and encamped over against them in the neighbourhood of mount Cithæron. For some time the armies looked upon each other, neither of them caring to act offensively, it having been declared by such as inspected the sacrifices, that the victory would be on that side that should be attacked. Mardonius, at length growing weary of this lingering kind of war, whereby they were reduced to the want both of provisions and of forage, resolved, against the opinions of Artabazus and the Thebans to fight the Greeks. Having one day discovered his opinion, and ordered all things to be disposed for the attack early in the morning, Alexander of Macedonia, when the night was far spent, mounting on horse-back, advanced to the Athenian guard, desiring to speak with their leaders, whom he named distinctly : Notice being given them, they came immediately to the barrier ; then Alexander addressed himself to them in these terms : “ I come to deposit a “ secret with you, O Athenians, on condition you will con“ ceal it from all men, except only Pausanias, lest you “ should ruin me. I would not make this discovery to you,
 “ if I were not extremely concerned for the safety of Greece ;
 “ and, being myself of Grecian original, were not very un“ willing to see the liberty of Greece oppressed. Know “ then, that Mardonius, would have fought long before this “ time, if the sacrifices offered for him and his army had “ been found favourable ; but now he has taken a reso“ lution to have no regard to the sacrifices, and to attack

 “ you at the break of day ; fearing, as I conjecture, that “ more forces may come in to your succour. Be there“ fore in readiness to receive him. But if Mardonius should “ defer the execution of his purpose, and not come to a “ battle, continue in your camp ; for his provisions are not “ sufficient to last many days. And if this war terminates happily “ on your side, some of you ought to remember me ; who,
 “ for the sake of the Grecians, and out of a desire to pre“ serve their liberty, have voluntarily undertaken so danger“ ous an enterprize, and acquainted you with the intenti“ ons of Mardonius ; to the end, that the Barbarians may “ not surprize you, and fall upon your forces before you “ are prepared to receive them”. Of this advice the Greeks made great use, and no doubt retained a grateful sense of Alexander’s favour. Not long after a decisive battle was fought, in which Mardonius was slain, and his prodigious army cut to pieces, excepting only a body of forty thousand men commanded by Artabazus, who retired as soon as he saw that victory declared against him. With these he passed safely, though with great haste, thro’ Thessaly and Macedon, dissembling the defeat which the Persians had received, and affirming that Mardonius with the gross of the army was marching after him †. The subsequent actions of Alexander’s life are most of them covered with oblivion, because we have no antient writer left, who treats expressly of the Macedonian affairs before the time of Philip, and therefore we are forced to join such circumstances from general historians as regard that people, in order to fill up, as well as we may, that obscure period, between the accession of Caranus and that of the famous monarch we have before mentioned. An antient historian informs us, that in the beginning of the LXXVIIIth olympiad, the Argives, moved by ambition and a thirst of revenge, made war against the Mycenians, a brave and free people, whom by degrees they mightily distressed ; and at last, taking their capital city, drove them out of their native country and obliged them to seek habitations among strangers. Drawn by the fame of his generosity and virtue, numbers of these distressed people fled into Macedonia to king
Alexander, who received them with much kindness and hospitality, assigned them a region to dwell in, and thereby gained immortal honour to himself. As he was extremely useful to the Persians, so we need not question that he took the necessary measures in order to make them useful to him, by procuring from time to time, as their circumstances would allow, such additions to his dominions, as made him before his death a great and formidable prince. But, however, extended his territories might be, his soul was yet superior to his fortune; he lived with such magnificence, made such noble presents to the oracles, and gave on all occasions such testimonies of generosity and munificence, that he was by the Greeks surnamed the rich, and is always very respectfully spoken of by their authors. He had three sons, Perdiccas, Alcetas and Philip; the first succeeded to his throne, but the latter kept up for a long time a claim thereto, and thereby created great disturbances in their native country <sup>2</sup>.

Perdiccas the son of Alexander, in the very beginning of his reign, discovered such prudence and forecast as seemed to demonstrate, that he succeeded to his father's abilities as well as to his dominions; he found himself environed on all hands either by open enemies or suspicious friends. The inhabitants of Thrace, and other barbarous nations, looked on his increasing kingdom with an envious eye; the Persians treated him as their vassal, and, on the other hand, the Athenians became so powerful by their colonies and allies on the sea-coast, that he was in no small danger from them. A while he amused them with a shew of friendship; but when he found, that they treated him with an air of superiority and haughtiness, he resolved to check their progress in this part of the world, nor did he long want an occasion. The city of Epidamnus or Epidamnium, being alike distracted by seditions at home and terrified with the approach of foreign enemies, was in the utmost distress; the weaker party had called the Illyrians to their assistance, by which the government was brought so low, that they sent first to the Corcyrians, after to the Corinthians, for aid; they being a colony immediately from the former, who were themselves a colony of the latter. The Corinthians sent relief to Epidamnium, which the Corcyrians resented and sent a fleet on the coast of Macedonia, in order to compel the Epidamnians to submit to such terms as they were pleased to prescribe them. Thus a war was begun between the two states, in which the Corcyrians had the better in the beginning; for they beat the Corinthians by sea, and took the city of Epidamnium by storm. The Athenians, also took part in this business, and assisted the Corcyrians; whereupon the Corinthians tampered with the city of Potidea to revolt from Athens, at the same time that king Perdiccas declared himself against that state, and persuaded the Chalcidians to abandon their sea-ports, and to inhabit and fortify the city of Olynthus. The Athenians, highly provoked at these proceedings, determined to revenge themselves on those who had deserted them, and especially on king Perdiccas, whom they looked upon as the principal author; to which end, they sent Agnon with a fleet and a considerable army on board it to besiege Potidea, and to reduce the Chalcidians; but the plague infecting his army, he was able to effect little, and therefore sailed quickly back to Athens, leaving Potidea as he found it, blocked up by a small army the Athenians had there before. By the end of the winter the Potideans, finding themselves reduced to the utmost extremity, insomuch, that they had been obliged to eat one another, treated with Xenophon, Hestiodorus, and Calimachus, the Athenian generals, to render the place on honourable terms, which were granted them, so that they had leave to depart with their wives and children, every man having one suit of cloaths, and every woman two, with a small sum of money to bear their charges into Chalcidia, and other places whither they thought fit to retire<sup>a</sup>. The next year the Athenians under the command of Xenophon, made war against the Chalcidians, but with ill success. Perdiccas in the mean time, foreseeing that in the end the Athenians would be too powerful for him, endeavoured to reconcile himself to that state, or rather make a shew of reconciliation, in which he was assisted by Sytalces king of Thrace, a very potent prince, and one who sought to augment his dominions at the expence of his neighbours. But how artfully soever the Macedonian managed his affairs, the Athenians suspected him anew, and Sitalces, took umbrage at his behaviour. The Athenian ambassadors, then at the Thracian court, solicited this king to make war upon Perdiccas, and exalt Amyntas the son of Philip his brother to the throne of Macedon, into which project Sitalces was easily drawn. That the invasion might be attended with all imaginable success, the several nations of Thrace and all its allies were invited to contribute their quotas to the war, which in hopes of plunder they readily did; the Athenians also promising to send a strong fleet with a considerable number of land-forces on board. Sitalces, taking with him the embas-sadors and young Amyntas, entered Macedon at the head of 150,000 men, two-thirds foot and one cavalry. Perdiccas, knowing it was impossible for him to make any resistance in the field against so great an army, withdrew his forces into strong towns, that he might spin out the war into the greater length. At first Sitalces went on as prosperously as he could with; for the principal cities in that territory, which formerly belonged to Philip, readily yielded to his son; Mygdonia, Grestonia, and Anthemus he wasted without opposition; Europus, however he attacked in vain, and the Macedonian horse, falling on him in defiles and other advantageous places, where his numbers could be of no use, did him considerable mischief; in the end, however, it appeared, that though the Macedonian horse were excellent, yet numbers would overpower them, and therefore Perdiccas would not hazard any longer his forces in these skirmishes. He found indeed an easier and safer way of getting clear of this formidable enemy; for having engaged one Seuthes the king's near relation in correspondence with him, he offered him his sister Stratonica with a vast fortune, in case he could bring about a peace. He immediately applied himself to the work with an eagerness suitable to the reward which was promised him, nor did he want very plausible topics to induce Sitalces to enter into the measures which were to be profitable to him. In the first place, he insisted, that the Athenians instead of a fleet had sent ambassadors only with inconsiderable presents, notwithstanding the war was entered into at their request, and was carried on chiefly for their advantage: He observed next, that though this war had not profited the king much, yet it had stirred up a multitude of enemies; for the Theffalians, not knowing what turn this war might take, were all in arms in the south, and in the north all the Thracians, inhabiting the plain country, with the Panæans, Odomentians, Dreans, and Derjæans, were likewise in arms, fearing this humour of conquest might lead him their way; but above all, he argued from the situation he was in, unsupported by his allies, harassed by his enemies, and already straitened for victuals, as well as pinched with cold. After eight days consideration, Sitalces yielded to his kinsman's arguments, and quitting the Macedonian territories, marched with all imaginable speed into his own. Within a short space after this, Seuthes had his wife given him with a large sum of ready money, and Amyntas, in support of whose title the war was undertaken, was left in the same melancholy state in which he was before. Perdiccas, being rid of this formidable enemy, retained, however, a most implacable enmity against the Athenians, who had stirred him up to this invasion ; he therefore privately negotiated with the Lacedæmonians to send an army into those parts, promising to do all in his power to drive the Athenians out of all their colonies and conquests in Thrace and Macedon. This was in the beginning of the eighth year of the Peloponnesian war, and the Lacedæmonians, having had lately many and great misfortunes therein, gladly accepted his offer, in hopes of retrieving the honour of their arms ; in order to which, they dispatched Brasidas, one of their best and bravest captains, with a well provided army to march through Thessaly into Macedonia. The Thessalians, when he first entered their country, were in great confusion ; they were well inclined to the Athenians, but had never done any thing to provoke the Lacedæmonians, and therefore looked upon Brasidas's coming amongst them as an invasion. But this general, being a person of a very moderate temper, as well as invincible courage, entertained them with soft words, and general assurances of friendship and kindness, till he reached Dion, a small city in the neighbourhood of mount Olympus, and the first in the Macedonian dominions ; of which when he had given Perdiccas notice, that prince declared openly against the Athenians, and owned that he had called Brasidas to expel them out of his own country and Thrace. But there was still more at the bottom, Perdiccas had framed a design of subduing the Lyncestheans, a bold and warlike people, very troublesome to himself, as well as his ancestors ; and tho' he had given out, he sought only to protect his own dominions and the Chalcidians, who at his persuasion had revolted from the Athenians ; yet when Brasidas arrived, he would have immediately employed him and his forces against Arrhibæus king of the Lyncestheans ; but Brasidas desired to be excused, till he had sent a herald to that prince, to acquaint him of his arrival, and to demand whether he would be a friend or foe to Sparta. Perdiccas took this very ill, and could not forbear saying, that he did not send for him thither to be an arbitrator, but to fight against such enemies as he should shew him. The Chalcidians, however, hoping to attach Brasidas more strongly to themselves, commended his conduct much ; and Arrhibæus, laying hold of this favourable opportunity, declared himself the friend of Sparta, upon which Brasidas removed from his frontiers ; which so offended the king of Macedon, that whereas before he had furnished half the expences of the army, henceforward he would furnish but a third. This moderate behaviour of Brasidas wrought greater effects than an army twice as numerous as his could possibly have

have done, and many cities opened their gates to him, for where-ever he had an opportunity of treating, his words rendered his sword unnecessary. About this time died Sitalces king of the Odryfians, and was succeeded in all his dominions by Seuthes the brother-in-law of Perdiccas. In the winter, Brasidas with the confederate army blocked up Amphipolis, a famous city ; for the possession of which the Athenians and Thracians had struggled long, but was at present in the hand of the former, who had also an army not far from it under the command of Thucydides. Brasidas after some time determined to attempt surprizing the place, having very good intelligence therein ; and he marched with such expedition towards it, that he had well-nigh effected what he proposed ; as it was, he put the inhabitants into such a confusion, that they sent to Thucydides the historian, who, as we said before, then commanded in Thrace, to intreat him to come to their relief. Brasidas, having intelligence of this, offered the townsmen their liberty, either to reside in the city under their own government, or to remove in five days, if they thought fit ; which proposition they accepted, notwithstanding all that Eucles the Athenian general, who commanded in the place, could say to prevent them. After this success, Perdiccas joined him, and they together made many other conquests ; after which they marched to reduce the country about mount Athos, which in a great measure they effected, and then turned their arms against Torone, a strong city in Chalcidia, which was still held by the Athenians, and which Brasidas surprized in the night, but without fighting. After this the campaign ended, and the Athenians procured a truce, designing to make use of the time afforded them thereby, to put their affairs in Thrace into better order, and to contrive the utter destruction of Perdiccas, whom they now held for their most bitter and most formidable enemy. On the other hand, Perdiccas, having a just idea of the situation in which his affairs stood, neglected nothing which might restore them, or tend towards establishing the Macedonian power so effectually, as to leave him for the future without apprehensions either of Greeks or barbarians d.

WITH this view he strongly solicited Brasidas, to undertake now that expedition, which he had so much pressed on his first coming into Macedonia, viz. against king Arrhibanus, which, on account of that prince's not performing his promises, the Lacedæmonian general readily yielded to. The expedition once resolved on was immediately put into execution, Brasidas leading his own army, and Perdiccas his, but with promise to act for each other's benefit, and to unite their forces, if there should be any occasion. When they came into the country of the Lyncestheans, they found Arrhibæus very strongly encamped on the brow of a hill, with a plain before him; whereupon Perdiccas and Brasidas encamped on the descent of an opposite hill, having the same plain before them. In this situation the armies did not continue long before an engagement ensued. At first only the horse fought; but Arrhibæus sending some of his men at arms to support his cavalry, Perdiccas and Brasidas did the same; upon which the battle became general, in which the Lyncestheans were defeated with very great slaughter, and constrained to betake themselves to their fortresses. Thither the king of Macedonia would have pursued them; but Brasidas would not consent, because his heart was set on a speedy return to the sea-coasts, from an apprehension that the Athenians would attempt somewhat during his absence. During some days the army was in suspense, Brasidas consenting to march on, in case a body of Illyrians, whom Perdiccas had taken into his pay, joined them; but it was not long before they were constrained to think of a retreat, by reason that the Illyrians, fearing to aggrandize Perdiccas, deserted to the Lyncestheans, and thereby enabled them to take the field the second time, which they did with such vigour, that on the first news thereof the Macedonian forces, being not well disciplined, and having with them as auxiliaries several thousands much worse disciplined than themselves, were struck with such a panic, that they fled in the night, carrying their king with them by force, without so much as suffering him to confer with Brasidas. The Lacedæmonian, however, made a retreat with some difficulty, and much loss; and from this time forward there was no right understanding between the king and that general, each conceiving himself to be ill treated; Perdiccas resenting his refusal to prosecute the war after their victory, when he conceived it to have been intirely in their power to have subdued Arrhibæus; and Brasidas having been much offended with the Macedonian army's quick retreat, which left him and his troops exposed to so much danger. The state things were now in gave the advantage to Perdiccas, because it inclined the Athenians to court him, notwithstanding all the injuries he had done them; and he, on the other hand, beginning now to dislike the Greeks in general, from an apprehension that they all sought their own interest.

interest, and to aggrandize themselves at the expence of others, determined to lay hold of this opportunity of closing with Athens, in hopes that it would enable him to rid himself both of it and of the other party <sup>e</sup>. He accordingly began to treat with Nicias, and at last concluded peace; but the Athenian general suggesting, that it would be proper for him to give some open proof of his sincerity, the king resolved to gratify him, and at the same time do himself a kindness; he therefore undertook to stop a body of Spartan troops under the command of Ischagoras, which was ordered to march through Thessaly to join Brasidas. This he effected by his great interest in Thessaly, and thereby prevented such an accession of strength to the Lacedæmonian army, as would in all probability have rendered them far superior to their enemies; whereas a short time afterwards, the Athenians sending over fresh troops, under the command of Glcon, Brasidas was forced to fight in defence of Amphipolis; and tho' he gained the victory, yet he was slain in fight, which determined the Lacedæmonians to make peace, and ridded Perdiccas of his apprehensions on that subject. Some time after the Athenians began to have new jealousies as to the intentions of Perdiccas. They charged him with treachery, or at least with coldness, in their affairs, and especially with his not assisting Nicias so much as they thought he might have done; for which reason they posted troops in such a manner, that Perdiccas had no communication with the sea, which was exceedingly detrimental to his affairs. The next year they carried matters farther; for they ordered a body of horse to be transported to Methone, from whence they made inroads into Macedonia, and did much mischief. The Lacedæmonians had it not now in their power to assist Perdiccas much; however, they did all they could, which was to send orders to the Chalcidians their allies to assist him; but the Chalcidians, being not a little afraid of the power of Perdiccas, did not think fit to act as they were directed *. From this time we meet with very little concerning him in the Greek historians; because, as we have more than once observed, there is not one of them who treats professedly of the affairs of Macedon; all therefore that we can add of this Perdiccas the second is, that he died after a long reign full of years and glory <sup>f</sup>. He ruled at a time when all Greece was in commotion, when the Athenians were most ambitious and most powerful, and when the Lacedæmonians, who had never attempted it before, began to think of establishing garisons in Thrace. He had also long and sharp contests with his barbarous neighbours, equally fierce and perfidious, ever ready to make war when occasion offered, and seldom to be depended upon when they thought fit to make peace; yet, in spite of all these difficulties, and, which added not a little to them, the imbecillity of the Persian government, which had been the chief support of his predecessors, Perdiccas maintained himself in a state of independency, was formidable to all parties, and left his kingdom both in a better condition and larger in extent, than he found it. It is true, that those authors, from whom we have collected our history, seem to charge him with art and falshood; but if we consider who these historians were, and what king Perdiccas was, we shall not think their authority of any great weight. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians sought to aggrandize themselves, by making conquests in, or upon the borders of, his dominions; and in their turns they endeavoured to make use of him for that purpose. Perdiccas, as far as in him lay, eluded their designs, and, under colour of fulfilling them, used their forces to strengthen himself. Here was art and falshood on both sides; but the king was true to the interest of Macedon; and therefore, as all authors acknowledge him to have been a great king, so, with respect to his own subjects, we must allow him to have been a good one*.

us.

It is certain, that Perdiccas was succeeded by his son Archelaus, a prince of great parts and wonderfull industry; but with respect to his title to the crown, his personal character, and the number of years that he reigned, authors speak so differently, and so obscurely, that it is next to an impossibility to deliver with tolerable clearness the story of his reign. Some say, that he was not the legitimate son of king Perdiccas, but that he obtained the kingdom by throwing his brother, who was its lawful heir, into a well, and passing it upon his mother that he tumbled in by chance, as he was following a goose. They alledge likewise, that he invited Alcetas the son of Alexander the rich, with his young son Alexander, to return into Macedonia; and that when he got them into his power, he put them to death, for fear lest, at some time or other, they might set up a claim to the crown, and give him some disturbance‡. All dread of rivals being now removed, he bethought himself of fortifying some of his principal cities, that his neighbours, who were powerful in horse, and who could easily draw assistance from Athens, might not over-run Macedonia with the same facility they did in the days of his father, when Sitalces king of Thrace ravaged the richest provinces, without risking a battle, or running any great hazard in his retreat. He likewise took other measures for raising the courage and reputation of the Macedonian monarchy, which did not a little disturb his neighbours. The city of Pydna, more apprehensive than the rest, after soliciting the aid of the Athenians, declared against him, upon which he raised a very puissant army, and laid siege thereto. The Athenians, according to their promise, sent a fleet and army, under the command of Theramenes, to relieve Pydna; but that general found king Archelaus's army in so good a condition, and so advantageously encamped, that he was forced to retire without succouring the place, which, after a long siege and a very brave defence, fell into the hands of the king, who obliged its inhabitants to remove twenty furlongs farther from the sea, that their friends the Athenians might not so easily visit them. Archelaus was for nothing more distinguished than for his love of learning and learned men. He had always many about his court, whom he not only maintained with a magnificence worthy of a prince, but conversed with them as familiarly as if they had been his equals: insomuch, that many of his sayings at table are recorded; for it was the peculiar wisdom of the Greeks to preserve from oblivion such sentences as were either remarkable for their sprightly wit, or for the solid sense contained in them<sup>b</sup>. Amongst others Socrates was of the number of the learned, whose friendship was strongly solicited by Archelaus; but on account of the violences he had committed in the beginning of his reign, it is said that great philosopher declined corresponding with him<sup>c</sup>. Euripides the tragic poet was his guest, and lived with the greatest intimacy with this king, who is thought to have honoured his memory with a tomb, deservedly commended by antient authors<sup>d</sup>. It is clear from these passages, that Archelaus spent his days in peace and honour. It seems to us most probable, that he reigned fourteen years, and that he was succeeded in the throne by his son Orestes. As for the manner of his death, it was by treason, Craterus his favourite conspiring against him; but he also was murdered in four days, and so reaped little benefit from his treachery<sup>e</sup>. Others again affirm, that he reigned but seven years, and that he was succeeded by another Archelaus, who was the elder brother of Orestes; which Archelaus the second they will have to be the person murdered by Craterus. Diodorus Siculus indeed says, that Archelaus reigned but seven years, and that he was killed by Craterus; yet he does not mention two princes of that name; and he places the death of Archelaus where it ought to be placed, according to our table<sup>m</sup>.

Orestes.

Orestes being but a child, Æropus, one of the royal blood governed as protector, and by degrees he increased this power of his so much, that he acted as absolutely as if he had been king. It was in his time that Agésilas king of Sparta returned by land out of Asia into Greece. He sent to Æropus, as he had done to the rest of the princes whose dominions lay in his way, to desire the liberty of passing. Æropus answered his messengers, That he would consider of it; which answer being reported to Agésilas, Let him consider, said he, but let us march<sup>n</sup>; which accordingly he did through the heart of Macedonia, without waiting for any farther permission; which so struck Æropus, that he gave orders for the treating him and his army with the utmost civility, by which he preserved his country from being pillaged; for in Theffaly, where the people were not so tractable, Agésilas suffered his troops to live at discretion. The only reason assigned for transferring the regal authority, from the family of Perdiccas to this Æropus, was, that the kingdom could not bear the want of a prince, or, which to the Macedonians seemed all one, that the sceptre should remain in the hands of an infant; however, it is very likely, that the family of Perdiccas had many friends; and that after the death of Orestes, Æropus stood so much in fear of them as to act very cautiously; for we hear of nothing he did against any of his neighbours; but that, after a troublesome reign of six years, he was succeeded by his son.

Pausanias.

Pausanias held the sceptre of Macedon by no better title than his father had done; and therefore Amyntas, the son of Philip Tharaleus, conceiving that neither possession nor succession could sanctify an usurpation, cut off Pausanias before he had reigned a year, and placed the crown on his own head<sup>o</sup>.

Amyntas.

Æropus had several sons besides Pausanias, and of these one named Argæus, who was the most capable. He, on the murder of his brother, immediately began to intrigue, both with the Macedonian nobles and with the neighbouring princes, by whose assistance he quickly raised a numerous army; and having put himself at the head thereof, entered Macedo- nia, and asserted his right to the crown, which Amyntas not being able to contest, he was forced to abandon it almost as soon as he had assumed it <sup>P</sup>.

Argæus remained in possession of Macedon about two years. Argæus. We are not informed either how he governed, or what it was that induced his people to wish for Amyntas again; but at the expiration of that term, the Theffalians furnishing that exiled prince with an army, he entered Macedon therewith, and forced his competitor to retire.

Amyntas, being restored to his kingdom, found himself Amyntas quickly engaged in a quarrel with the Olynthians, on this ac- restored. count: At the time he quitted his kingdom, he made over to them part of his territories which lay next to their city, being in doubt whether he should ever come into Macedon again; but now, when he was thoroughly re-established on his throne, he demanded the restoration of these lands, which the Olynthians peremptorily refused, and prepared to defend their title by force. Amyntas saw clearly, that, as things stood, he should not be able alone to contend with so powerful a people; he therefore determined with himself to call in the Lacedæmonians to his assistance, which accordingly he did; and that republic, having long had a jealous eye on the power of the Olynthians, readily yielded to his request, and sent Phæbidas with ten thousand men to support the king in this war. Soon after they appointed his brother Eudamidas general, and dispatched him with three thousand men into Macedonia. The Olynthians, not at all frightened at these formidable armies, prepared to defend themselves; and, having assembled a very great body of troops, an engagement ensued, wherein Amyntas and his allies were beaten. The Spartans, as soon as they received the news, raised forces afresh, and sent a new army, under the command of Teutias the brother of king Agésilas, to join Amyntas. This general, being a man of great courage, immediately entered upon action; and, before the Olynthians were ready to take the field, wasted their country, and enriched the soldiers with the distribution of the booty; but when the Olynthians had received the succours they expected, immediately they quitted their city, and offered Amyntas and Teutias battle. The battle was very long, and very obstinate; but in the end the Olynthians were victors, Teutias, with 1200 Spartans, being killed upon the spot. This slaughter served only to exasperate the Lacedæmonians, by whom a third army was raised, and Agésilas their king intrusted with the command thereof. The Olynthians, perceiving plainly that they should be at last besieged, raised strong fortifications, and laid up vast quantities of corn and other provisions in their magazines. They found means, however, to protract the war for a year, without coming to an engagement. About the end of this space king Ageſipolis died, and Polyudas was sent from Sparta to command in his ſtead. This new general gained ſeveral victories, and at laſt ſhut up the Olynthians in their city, preſſing them with ſo cloſe a ſiege, that they were at length conſtrained to ſubmit themſelves to the Macedonians, and accept of ſuch a peace as they were pleaſed to give them<sup>4</sup>. Amyntas was not only happy enough to engage Lacedæmon ſo heartily in his cauſe, but he was alſo ſucceſſful in his negotiations with the Athenians, who had not hitherto ſhewn any great kindneſs to the kings of Macedon. He artfully declared, that, in his opinion, Amphipolis belonged to them, and promiſed to do all in his power to put it into their hands, whereby he procured their friendſhip without any expence to himſelf<sup>5</sup>. In all other reſpects he behaved like a great politician, ſtrengthening the intereſt of his family, raiſing the credit of the Macedonian monarchy, and binding moſt of his neighbours, particularly the Theſſalians, to his intereſt, by good turns, till, after a reign of twenty four years, he died much reſpected by all the Grecian ſtates, and greatly beloved by his own ſubjects. He left behind him three legitimate ſons, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, under the tuition of Euridice their mother, as alſo an illegitimate ſon, called Ptolemy, ſurnamed Alorites, and ſeveral others.

Alexander.

Alexander, being the eldeſt, ſucceeded his father, and proved a prince of great parts, though of little probity. The Theſſalians were at that time oppreſſed by Alexander of Phærea, who ſought to make himſelf abſolute lord of the whole country; the nobility applied themſelves to Alexander king of Macedon, who was not backward in promiſing them aſſiſtance. Alexander the Phærean, having intelligence of theſe negotiations, immediately raiſed an army, and therewith entered Macedon. The king met him with another army, and a brisk engagement enſued, wherein the Macedonian gaining the victory, he marched ſtrait on to Lariſſa the capital of Theſſaly the inhabitants of which opened their gates to him, and their example was followed by the moſt conſiderable places in that country, the king promiſing to reſtore them all to their liberty; which, however, he was ſo far from performing, that he put garisons into every one of them, so that the Theffalians quickly found they had only exchanged one tyrant for another<sup>c</sup>. Upon this they applied to the Thebans to deliver them from both. Pelopidas was chosen to command a body of troops sent for this purpose; and the reputation of so great a captain effected almost as much as could have been expected, if the whole power of Thebes had been employed in this enterprize; for Alexander immediately began to execute the treaty he had formerly made with the Theffalians, and to quit Lariſſa, and other cities which had been put into his hands. Alexander of Phærea also began to act with greater moderation, and the presence of Pelopidas diffused a quiet hitherto unfelt in these parts<sup>c</sup>. In this time Ptolemy Alorites, the base son of Amyntas, began to plot against king Alexander, and drew such a number of the Macedonian lords to his interest, as made the king's authority very precarious; he therefore applied to Pelopidas, intreating him, since he had quitted Theffalia, to act as umpire in the disputes between him and Ptolemy in Macedonia. Pelopidas, consenting to what he desired, marched immediately into Macedonia; and, having there settled all things to the satisfaction of both parties, it was agreed, that Philip, the king's youngest brother, should be put into his hands as a hostage, and, with some other young noblemen of Macedon, be carried to Thebes, whither Pelopidas at present departed, and immediately after king Alexander was slain, and the kingdom transferred to his brother<sup>u</sup>. What were the original sources of these disputes in Macedon, historians do not inform us; but it is most likely that the factions, formerly subsisting in this kingdom, and which Amyntas so hardly kept under, began to revive. However it was, of this we are certain, that on the death of Alexander, all things fell into great confusion, insomuch that the queen-mother thought neither herself nor her children safe, even as to their lives and private fortunes.

Perdiccas should have mounted the throne on the demise of Alexander, and he did accordingly claim it; but was far from obtaining a peaceable possession. Pausanias, a prince of the royal house, set up for the kingdom as well as he, and was at first so grateful to the people, that the whole family of Amyntas were in the utmost danger. It happened fortunately for them, that the Athenians about this time sent Iphi-

crates with a small fleet to prepare things for the siege of Amphipolis ; to him therefore on his arrival Eurydice applied herself ; and on her intimation to him of the difficulties she was under, Iphicrates with great alacrity repaired to the place of her residence. After the first civilities were over, Eurydice placing her two sons upon her knees, shewed them to Iphicrates, and then putting the eldest into his hands, and placing the other upon his knee, she spoke to him thus : “ Generous Athenian, you know perfectly well how tenderly “ Amyntas the father of these orphans loved your country, “ and how sincere an affection he had for yourself, whom “ he adopted for a son ; by this double tie therefore you are “ bound to succour my distressed family. The friendship my “ husband had for the Athenians his dear allies, and his peculiar tenderness for you, must conspire to fill your breast “ with the sentiments of a brother in respect to these orphans”. Iphicrates, moved by the queen’s tears and intreaties, espoused her cause, turned his arms against Pausanias, and compelled him to retire out of Macedon *. Perdiccas had little more quiet from this friendly interposition of the Athenians ; for scarce was Pausanias retired before Ptolemy Alorites pretended to the throne, and by degrees wrought himself into favour so with the people, that he outed his brothers, assumed the ensigns, and discharged the functions, of a king. Perdiccas did not, however, quit his title, tho’ only a small part of the country owned it. He had always hopes, that either the Athenians or Thebans would support him ; but they, being much embarrassed at home, neglected all his solicitations ; till at last Pelopidas, moved with compassion towards the brother of a king with whom he had treated, drew together a few mercenaries, and, with no other authority than what he derived from the reputation of his virtue, marched towards Macedonia, in order to restore this deprived prince. Ptolemy raised an army to oppose him, and when their forces drew near to each other, he made privately such offers to Pelopidas’s mercenaries, that they immediately deserted him, and went over to Alorites ; yet this desertion did not quiet Ptolemy’s fears, who looked upon this as an escape only for the present ; and fearing the resentment of Pelopidas much more than many armies, he, of his own motion laid down his arms, and referred the difference between himself and his brother to that general’s decision. He having declared, that the crown belonged to Perdiccas, the Macedonians so readily came into his sentiments, that Ptolemy was forced to submit<sup>y</sup>. Pelopidas, fearing that, as soon as he was withdrawn, all things might fall again into confusion, took hostages on both sides; from Perdiccas his brother Philip, who was to have been sent to Thebes before; from Ptolemy his son Philoxenus, with several young men his companions; and thus an end was put to all disturbances here for the present. Eurydice doubtless was not a little fearful of giving up her darling Philip into the hands of strangers; her concern, however, was somewhat abated, from the consideration of the worth of Pelopidas, whom she earnestly besought to take care of his education, which he not only promised, but very exactly fulfilled. On his return to Thebes, he placed the young prince in the hands of Epaminondas his friend, who had in his house a Pythagorean philosopher of great reputation. Under his care Philip learned the principles of philosophy, and under Epaminondas himself he acquired the art of war. Thus his exile became beneficial, not only to himself but his country; and he acquired amongst foreigners those abilities which enabled him afterwards to triumph over them. This was especially owing to his making Epaminondas his model; for by studying that great man's temper and disposition, he joined qualities which are seldom met with together, that is, indefatigable activity and a steady composure. As for his temperance, justice, disinterestedness, and candor, those Philip meddled not with, as suiting little with his temper and circumstances<sup>z</sup>. Perdiccas in the mean time governed Macedon with a mediocrity of fortune, till he came to be engaged in a war with the Illyrians, a very martial nation, the ancient hereditary enemies of his subjects. Against these Perdiccas, at the head of a very considerable army, marched as soon as possible, that he might hinder them from plundering the country. A general engagement quickly ensued, wherein the Macedonians were routed with great slaughter, and, which was still worse, with the loss of their king, who left behind him a son named Amyntas, then in his infancy; who, tho' the lawful heir of the kingdom, was unable to govern it; so that now a field was opened to civil dissensions, while at the same time the kingdom groaned under the weight of a foreign war<sup>a</sup>.

The reign of P H I L I P.

IT was the peculiar felicity of this prince, of whom we are now to record the actions, that his fame suffers no diminution, which ever end of his reign we consider, and whether we enquire from what condition he raised his kingdom, or to what height under his auspice it arrived. When he went suddenly and secretly from Thebes to Macedon, on the news of his brother's death, he found the people dejected, and the state in the utmost confusion, a king just slain, the whole strength of the kingdom routed, the Illyrians preparing for a new invasion, and the Peonians on the point of making one; a child on the throne, and two powerful competitors contriving to dispossess him; Pausanias, supported by the Thracians, and Argæus, to whose assistance the Athenians had sent their general Mantias with an army: Yet was Philip, tho' but twenty two years old, so far from sinking under this mighty load, that he not only kept up his own spirits, but invigorated and re-encouraged his despairing countrymen. He applied especially to the army, whom he care-fed with the tenderest expreffions, and the nobility, whom he bound to his interest by the ftrongeft testimonies of confidence, and vaſt promiſes. Things a little quiet at home, he began immediately to provide for what was requiſite to put foreign affairs in a better ſituation. In order to abate the vigour of the Athenian army, king Philip cauſed Amphipolis to be declared a free city, and left it to its inhabitants to govern it how they would. By this ſtep, tho' it ſeemed a leſſening to his kingdom, on account of the importance of the place, yet he was a great gainer ; for chiefly for the ſake of this city the Athenians undertook the war, and ſupported his competitor, and by leaving it free, he took away all ground of quarrel with reſpect to himſelf ; and yet added nothing to the power of the Athenians in theſe parts. To the chief men in Peonia he made conſiderable preſents, and thereby avoided a diſpute in the field, for which as yet he was unprovided. By the ſame arts he took off Pauſanias, his friends knowing well, that to a feeble ſtate, gaining time is gaining all<sup>a</sup> (A).

(A) The diſcerning reader will eaſily perceive, that we have taken the liberty to diſcourſe at large on the policy of Philip, which is indeed a liberty we ought to account for, this work being intended for an univerſal register of facts, not of lectures upon them. Firſt then, let it be obſerved, that this was the moſt glorious reign which was ever ſeen in Macedon ; for Alexander cannot be ſaid to have reigned in Macedon after his conqueſts ; on the contrary, he rather deſpiſed it ; and of his ſucceſſors none, in point of prudence, fortune, or true greatneſs, can be compared with Philip. It is requiſite therefore, that this reign, which laid the foundation of the Greek empire, ſhould be copiouſly treated of. Secondly, the reign of Philip, though crowded with wars, and adorned with many remarkable victories, was, however, a reign of policy, in which the judgment of the prince wrought more than the force of the people. The Macedonians were a brave and generous nation before his time ; but it was he who fixed fortune to their arms, and, by making a right uſe of their valour, procured them thoſe advantages they had deſerved, but had ſcarce taſted before. He found them a nation inured to war ; yet he taught them a new diſcipline, incomparably better than any at that time in uſe, by which they were enabled to bear away the victory, not only from more numerous armies, but from the beſt troops in Greece, having alſo numbers on their ſide ; ſuch as the Phocians, who made war a trade ; and the Athenians, in pitched battles held, till then, the experteſt among the Greeks. He found his ſubjects low, beaten, and alike

THAT the best use might be made of this interval of His prudence in settling of affairs civil and military. quiet, Philip, who at first acted as guardian only to his nephew Amyntas the son of Perdiccas, laying the youth aside, stepped into the throne, with the unanimous consent of the Macedonians, who declared, that necessity ought to supersede loyalty; and that, since the public safety required a man, they ought not to pay allegiance to a child. He then proceeded to introduce a new and stricter discipline among the troops, which probably he had learned from the Thebans, at least in part. He particularly instituted, or rather modelled, the phalanx, and taught the soldiers how to become more without spirits and without allies. He left them feared by their neighbours, dreaded by the great king, and sovereigns of Greece, and all this by dint of genius. Thirdly, they who opposed Philip, considered him rather as a politician than as a hero (unless we take that in the oriental sense, and conceive it to signify a person distinguishable alike for the excellence of his wisdom and for his extraordinary valour). His enemies, I say, considered him in this light, and so ought we, otherwise we shall have but an imperfect idea of his character, as is ingeniously hinted by a great French writer, who says, Philip is in esteem only with such as understand history (1). Our political reflections are inserted for that very purpose. We have collected them from the best authors, not invented them ourselves; and we have inserted them in such places only, as with great difficulty would be intelligible without them. Thus much on this subject may suffice; let us close this note with a few words on the school wherein Philip learned this extraordinary wisdom: It was the house of Polymnas the father of Epaminondas, the greatest man among the Greeks, if we will subscribe to the opinion of the most judicious of the Romans (2), frequented by the most learned and the most virtuous citizens of Thebes, wherein Lyfidas of Tarentum read his lectures (3). In all probability Philip rather studied Epaminondas, than any system of philosophy. That great man raised Thebes to be mistress of Greece; Philip did the same by Macedon. Epaminondas looked on discipline as the main skill of a general, as well as the main strength of an army; Philip taught it his Macedonians, and took care they should not forget his lessons. Epaminondas was secret and sudden in all his enterprizes; so was Philip. We might easily carry the parallel farther; but this is enough to shew, that what Plutarch (4) and others of the antients have advanced on this head, is well founded, and that we ought to regard this Macedonian statesman as a copy of the Theban.

(1) Mr. Turreil in his preface to Demosthenes. (2) Cicero. Tuscul. l. i. (3) Diodor. Sicul. l. xv. & xvi. Ælian. Hist. Var. l. iii. Pausan. in Boeotia. D. Chrysof. Orat. inscript. Recusatio magistratus. (4) In vit. Pelopid.

formidable from order and a just conception of the rules of war, than from force ; and by the help of frequent instructions, kind language, and, when it was necessary, some bold strokes of severity, he attained his end. Most authors attribute all things in the Macedonian discipline to Philip, which in one sense is certainly true, but in another false. Philip fixed the rules of discipline amongst his troops ; but it is not likely he invented them, which though a new opinion, is yet probable, as we shall shew in a note <sup>b</sup> (B). Argæus with a body

(B) It is certain, that in a strict sense Philip could not be the inventor of the phalanx, since we find the Purgos or Tower, which was a kind of phalanx, and the very reverse of the plinthion or tile, mentioned by Homer (5). To say the truth, the phalanx was in use among the Greeks in general, as our present learned and venerable primate has fully demonstrated (6), though it is probable, that the Macedonian phalanx was better disposed, and those who composed it better disciplined, than any of the Greek armies had been before. Officers usually improve one on the other. The Spartans were famed in the earliest times of Greece for exact order ; then the Athenians came into high reputation from the improvements made by Iphicrates ; after these came Epaminondas, or rather Pelopidas, who taught war as an art to the Thebans, from whom Philip learned it, and quickly surpassed his masters. That he was not, however, the first who introduced the phalanx into Macedon, seems evident from the testimony of Diodorus, who tells us, the Illyrians, when first attacked by Philip, had their plinthion (7) ; and inasmuch as they lay farther from Greece than the Macedonians, it would be unreasonable to suppose them better skilled in the Greek discipline ; we must therefore conceive, that the phalanx was known to his countrymen before the reign of Philip, tho' it was new-modelled, and received a fresh set of rules from him ; which discipline became peculiar to them, rendering the Macedonian infantry invincible then, and admirable yet. Whoever reads Ælian (8) will discern, that the whole doctrine of drawing up armies conformable to the ground assigned for the line of battle, the methods of changing these forms, marching, countermarching, charging, retreating, and encamping, was thoroughly studied by the Grecians, and practised by the Spartans, Athenians, Thebans, Theffalians, &c. with great facility and success. As this art of discipline was of great consequence and public utility, it was taught by public professors, stiled Tactici, or masters in military exercise, from a verb signifying to exercise. That what we have advanced may be justified, as well by authority as from probable con-

body of mercenaries advancing as far as Ægæ, and being constrained by the citizens to retire, Philip determined to try the mettle of his troops by pursuing them ; which accordingly he did, and coming up with them, engaged and defeated them with great slaughter ; an action which mightily revived and encouraged the Macedonian army, taught them to confide in their prince, and to discern the singular advantages they received from regular discipline. The king, however, shewed on this occasion the moderation which distinguished his character from most of the chieftains of his age, by admitting a great body of troops, which had retired to an eminence, to a composition. By this method he secured a present victory, and established a reputation of clemency, which proved of infinite service. *

IMMEDIATELY after this victory, he dispatched ambassadors to Athens, and having instructed them to give up all his right to Amphipolis, he easily procured a peace ; for tho' the Athenians drew great benefit from their colonies and conquests in Thrace and Macedon, yet the vast expence of sending and of maintaining armies there, discouraged them much, and inclined them to make peace whenever it was offered them, especially on honourable terms, which, as they consisted chiefjecture, it will be necessary to remark, that Ælian before-mentioned expressly mentions the alterations introduced by Philip in the evolutions of the Macedonian phalanx ; whence it is evident, he did not either invent or introduce the phalanx itself. The great change he made was in the mode of their altering their wings at the beginning of an engagement. According to the old method, the motion contrived to effect this purpose had the air of a retreat ; Philip had penetration enough to perceive, that this motion reversed would effect the same thing, and yet shew rather as an onset. As all things are of the utmost consequence which have a tendency to encourage the soldiery, Philip laid aside the old method, and brought in this which had been practised by the Lacedæmonians (9). To these remarks we may add one general one, that discipline, under the eye of an able general, renders troops invincible ; but, under officers of small abilities, it is far from being of such high advantage. Men of inferior genii have no ideas of those changes which the alterations induced by time require, and therefore, by adhering too scrupulously to old rules, ruin themselves and those under their command, as we shall have occasion to shew, when we come to speak of the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans.

ly in words, Philip failed not in gratifying them<sup>d</sup>. Another thing which contributed to the speedy conclusion of this peace was, the mean opinion the Athenians had of Philip's power, which inclined them to believe all his ambassadors told them, and made them little apprehensive of his breaking the peace. Thus delivered from one potent enemy by his own address, nature quickly freed him from another, by taking off Agis king of Peonia. This news no sooner reached the ears of Philip, than he determined to lay hold of this opportunity of revenging himself of the Peonians, and accordingly invaded their country, took their cities, and reduced them to such extremities, that they were constrained to submit to him, and become his subjects. This war thus happily concluded, he without delay marched against the Illyrians, with an army of ten thousand foot and six hundred horse. This was one of the boldest and most martial nations in those parts, and had within a few years often beaten the Macedonians. Bradylis, however, who was their king, offered to treat with Philip of a peace, on this condition, that each should keep what he possessed. Philip answered, that he always preferred peace to war, but could not think of obtaining it, by quitting his claim to those places in Macedonia at present in the hands of the Illyrians. Bradylis upon this encouraged his troops, from the consideration of their victories, to behave gallantly; and with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, offered Philip battle. The engagement was both bloody and obstinate, and, as Diodorus Siculus intimates, the Illyrians had their phalanx as well as the Macedonians. In the end, however, chiefly thro' the conduct of Philip, who brought a body of horse to charge the Illyrians in flank, whilst himself with the phalanx charged in front, the enemy was routed, and the Macedonians pursued, and slew in the whole no less than seven thousand men, which exceedingly broke and disordered the Illyrians, and constrained them to buy a peace at the expence of all their conquests<sup>e</sup>.

By this time the affairs of Macedon were in a tolerable posture, and Philip, from the success which he already had experienced, animated to greater things. It is not probable, that he already meditated the subjection of Greece, because as yet he was master of no force adequate to such an undertaking, but it is most likely he proposed even now the rendering his kingdom not only independent, but raising it to a state of pre-eminence over its neighbours. Whatever his views were, he did not continue long at rest, but suddenly, and when it was least expected, attacked Amphipolis. This city, as we have already seen, was always a mighty curse to the Macedonian princes, and therefore, from the beginning of his reign, Philip had kept his eye continually thereupon, watching for a fit time to reduce it. The Amphipolitans, sensible of the danger to which they were exposed, sent Hierax and Stratocles to Athens, to offer themselves and their city to that commonwealth. Demosthenes, and those who, with him, foresaw how formidable Philip would one day become, seconded the deputies of Amphipolis; but the agents of Philip giving out, that the king intended to deliver it up to the Athenians when taken, they suffered themselves to be amused, and denied the Amphipolitans relief. Philip prosecuted the siege briskly, both by force without, and by negotiation within. At last he took it by storm, and treated it as he did other places, that is, he put to death or banished such as were not in his interest, and treated the rest of the inhabitants kindly. This blow once struck, he proceeded to reduce Pydna and Potidæa, in the last of which was an Athenian garrison, which he drew out, and dismissed with all the marks of honour. After this he delivered the city to the Olynthians, according to his maxim, That those are to be obliged whom we cannot overcome. These conquests made a great noise, and Philip now began to grow terrible to all his neighbours. If this terror had engaged them in a league, in all probability they had set very narrow bounds to the Macedonian king; but as it produced a desire of obliging the conqueror, and turning his arms from themselves, the bordering nations concurred to ruin each other; and this they did the more effectually, because Philip was so perfect a master in dissimulation, that he seemed to give implicit credit to whatever was told him, though at the same time he communicated his real sentiments to nobody, his success being known as soon as his design.

WE have heretofore shewn, in our description of Macedonia, that the tract of country between the river Strymon and Nessus, was extremely rich in gold. Indeed the fame of its mines had made it often change its masters. When the Athenians were first powerful at sea, it belonged to the Thasians, from whom they conquered it. This republic declining, it fell into other hands; and a few years before this time the Thracians possessed themselves of it, and fortified Crenides its capital city. Philip, who looked upon gold as the best weapon, and the best servant in the world, resolved to seize upon this country, and to extract out of its bowels a treasure sufficient to buy that empire for which he so passionately longed. He executed this scheme before it was known that he had formed it, and having taken Crenides, he not only altered the city, but in a manner rebuilt it, changing also its name into Philippi<sup>a</sup>. He likewise gave directions for working the gold mines to greater advantage than had been made of them before, and having by this means established a certain revenue of a thousand talents per annum, which was in itself a large sum, and so much the larger in that it was extracted out of the earth, and not from his subjects, he began to turn his eyes towards other conquests.

IN the first year of the one hundred and sixth olympiad, Philip, being then in the field received advice, that his wife Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus king of Epirus, was brought to bed of a son at Pella. This son was the famous Alexander, justly surnamed the Great. At the same time Philip received advice, that his chariot had gained the prize at the olympic games; and upon the heels of this a third courier came, with an account that Parmenio had beaten the Illyrians. This surprizing run of good fortune is said to have affected Philip so much, that he wished it might be tempered by some slight mishap, not that he was insensible of felicity, but because he was afraid that his fortune might decline as swiftly as it had risen<sup>1</sup> (C).

(C) The birth of Alexander we have fixed to the first year of the one hundred and sixth olympiad. Antient authors are much divided on this head, and therefore it is but reasonable to shew on what grounds we have adhered to some, and rejected the authority of others (10). Arrian from Aristobulus informs us, that Alexander died in the month of Thargelion the last but one of the Attic year, in the close of the first year of the one hundred and fourteenth olympiad, being then thirty-two years and eight months old (11). This plainly refers his birth to the year wherein we have fixed it. Ælian indeed says expressly, that he was born and died on the sixth day of the month Thargelion (12). Plutarch places his birth in the month Hecatombeon, which, he says, answered to the Macedonian month Lous (13); but in this he was mistaken, for it appears clearly from a letter of Philip's still preserved in the orations of

AT this time all Greece was in confusion; the Phocian, or, King Philip as it was otherwise called, the sacred war, of the cause and consequences of which we have spoken elsewhere<sup>k</sup>, then raged with prodigious fury, which gave Philip an opportunity of securing and extending his frontiers without interruption. It also produced various applications from the contending parties in order to incline his assistance, the effects of which we shall hereafter see. In the mean time, let us follow the track of his conquests. The little city of Methone had given him some umbrage; he conceived that his conquests in Thrace might be in some danger, if it fell into the hands of his enemies; to prevent which he immediately invested it. The inhabitants made a very stout defence, and submitted at last, on condition, that they might have free leave to quit the place, which was agreed to and executed; after which Philip caused the city to be razed, and divided its territories among his soldiers<sup>l</sup>. At this siege he had the misfortune to lose an eye, by a very extraordinary accident, if the circumstances transmitted to us may be believed (D). This evil was, however, in some measure alleviated by the skill of his surgeon, who,

Demosthenes, that at this time the Macedonian month Lous did not answer to the Attic month Hecacombeon, but to the month Boedromion (14). In after-times indeed the month Lous answered to Hecatombreon, which, without doubt, was the source of Plutarch's mistake in this point. Plutarch hath fallen also into another mistake on this subject; he says, that Philip received this news immediately after he had taken Potidæa; yet, without doubt, Potidæa was taken two years before, viz. In the third year of the one hundred and fifth olympiad, where we have placed it, on the authority of Demosthenes, who was Philip's contemporary (15), and of Diodorus Siculus, a more accurate writer in point of chronology than Plutarch (16). There is one thing which may be urged against thus settling the birth of Alexander as we have done, and that is, his father's receiving the news of his victory in the olympic games on that very day (17). But admitting that this is improbable, had we not better allow that Philip received this news a little before, than depart from a fact so clearly and so exactly settled by Aristobulus, who is acknowledged to have been the most authentic historian in whose works the actions of Alexander were found?

(D) There is something so fabulous in the story we are told of Philip's losing his eye before this place, that we could not judge it

As soon as Philip was recovered, he began to think of marching into Thessaly, where the petty princes of the country earnestly desired his presence, to redress those mischiefs which the ambition of a single family had brought upon all Thessaly. Alexander of Phærea, the original tyrant, had been murdered, for his insupportable arrogance, by his wife and his brethren, who thereupon grew into great reputation with the Thessali-

fit to appear with those circumstances in the body of our history. The reader, when he has perused the relation as it is commonly told, will judge of the propriety of our conduct. It is said, that when Philip invested Methone, one Aster, a most excellent archer, was recommended to him with this commendation, that he could strike the swiftest bird in its flight. Very well, replied Philip, we will call for him, when we make war with starlings. This so stung the archer, that he immediately threw himself into the city besieged, from the walls of which, when Philip was one day viewing the place, he discharged an arrow with this inscription, For the right eye of Philip; which it accordingly struck, and put out. The king shot back the same arrow with this answer on the opposite side, Philip, when the town is taken, will cause Aster to be hanged; which he also performed (18). It was not here only that Philip felt the effects of war; his courage pushed him into all places of danger; and darts, stones, and javelins make no distinction of persons. Demosthenes therefore, who cannot be suspected of flattering Philip, could not forbear, when the subject afforded him a proper occasion, painting his personal bravery in such a light, as might have roused the Athenians to emulation. “ I will shew you, said that glorious orator, this same Philip, with whom we dispute for sovereignty and empire; I will shew him to you as he is covered with wounds, blind of an eye, his skull cracked, lame of a hand and of a leg, ready to throw himself into the midst of new dangers, and to put it into the power of fortune to deprive him of some other limb, in hopes with the remainder of his body to live with glory and honour; such, Athenians, is Philip (19)!” It must be owned, that if in the rest of his orations Demosthenes had shewn this monarch to be a very bad man, he has here acknowledged him to be the greatest prince of his time; which it is certain was a character so much his due, that how much soever they might seek to lessen, even his enemies could not deny him.

ans; but Lycophron the elder brother assuming the government, and acting no better than Alexander had done, the Alluadæ, so the Theſſalian chiefs are called, addreſſed themſelves to Philip, and beſought his protection. He, having ſettled his affairs in Thrace and on the ſea-coaſts, marched into Theſſaly, and made war on Lycophron; who, finding himſelf too weak to conteſt with the Macedonian foot, joined with the Theſſalian cavalry, demanded aid of the Phocians, or rather of Onomarchus their general, who ſent his brother Phayllus with ſeven thouſand men, to preſerve Lycophron in his dominions. The tyrant, after the junction of theſe troops, no longer declined battle; yet his ſucceſs no way answered his expectation, for he was defeated by Philip, and the Phocians driven out of Theſſaly. Onomarchus hearing this marched with all his forces to ſupport Lycophron, and in two general engagements vanquiſhed Philip, and compelled him to retire out of Theſſaly in great diſtreſs. But tho' his army was beaten, his ſpirit remained unconquered ſtill; ſo that perceiving the reduction of Theſſaly was abſolutely neceſſary to his propoſed empire, he applied himſelf with all diligence to the recruiting of his army; and, as ſoon as it was in a tolerable condition, marched immediately againſt Lycophron. The tyrant did not wait his coming; but withdrawing his troops to a ſecure camp, ſent again to invite the Phocians to his aſſiſtance. Onomarchus, being determined to put an end to the war, marched with twenty thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, to oppoſe the Macedonian. Philip in the mean time had prevailed on the Theſſalians to make their utmoſt efforts in his favour; ſo that at length his forces conſiſted of twenty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, and then he no longer delayed a general battle. This action proved deciſive, chiefly through the valour of the Theſſalian horſe; for the princes who commanded them, knowing that they were to expect nothing but deſtruction from Lycophron, if he prevailed, fought with deſperate reſolution; inſomuch, that ſix thouſand of the Phocians were ſlain upon the ſpot, and amongſt them their general, and three thouſand were taken priſoners. There had been ſtill a greater ſlaughter, if the engagement had not happened on the ſea-ſhore, when the Athenian fleet commanded by Chares paſſed by, and thereby afforded ſuch of the Phocians as could ſwim a refuge. Philip cauſed the body of Onomarchus to be ſearched for, and when it was found, he directed it to be hung up with ignominy, denying alſo funeral rites to all that were ſlain, looking on them as ſacrilegious perſons for having violated the temple at Delphi. Lycophron and his brother Pitholaus, ſeeing now no hopes of retaining their princity, were content to resign it; and being dismissed on giving their oaths to be quiet, they delivered up the city of Phœrea into the hands of Philip, who, as he had promised the Thessalians, restored all the cities to liberty, and having thereby secured the friendship of so powerful a nation, he attempted to pass through the Pylæ, in order to make war upon the Phocians°. This was a very bold attempt; for since the defeat of the Persians at Platæa, no Macedonian prince had ever set foot in Greece. The Athenians therefore, having notice of his design, marched with the utmost expedition, seized the passes, and obliged him for this time to abandon his purpose, and return into *Macedon*².

the ruin of the Athenian power.*

WE may reasonably look on this retreat as the æra of Philip's hatred to the Athenians. He saw, that they were the only people in Greece capable of defeating his projects, or of giving him uneasiness in his own kingdom; he therefore provided with much diligence a fleet composed of light ships, which continually disturbed their trade, and at the same time enriched his subjects by bringing in wealthy prizes. He also increased his army by new levies, and projected the destruction of the Athenian colonies in Thrace. Besides these preparations at home, he practised very successfully in Athens itself; and by large appointments secured some eminent orators to charm the people with delusive hopes of peace, or to frighten them with very expensive estimates, while they pretended a zeal for carrying on the war. Demosthenes was the only man in Athens, who had a just idea of the danger his country was in from the growing power of Philip, and who had likewise capacity enough to point out the proper methods for reducing his exorbitant greatness³. He shewed the Athenians, that the measures they had hitherto pursued were unworthy of them, and would never answer their ends. He told them, that running hither and thither, according as they heard that Philip marched this way or that, looked more like following him as their general, than making war upon him as their enemy; he therefore advised transporting two thousand foot and two hundred horse into Macedonia, assuring them, that if they had once an army, how small soever, there, the enemies of Philip would soon advance it to a formidable greatness¹. The Athenians approved, but they did not follow, his advice; all the effect it had was this, that Philip, being informed of it, provided with greater vigour, and determined at all events to have neither state nor prince independent of himself within the limits of Macedon, that the Athenians might be deprived of all hopes of treating him as they had done his ancestors, viz. compelling them, by the assistance given to their neighbours, either to put all to the hazard of an unequal war, or to become absolute dependents on their republic <sup>c</sup>.

Olynthus had now, in a great measure, recovered that power and authority, which it had when Amyntas the father of Philip called in the Lacedæmonians to assist him in making war against it. Philip himself had contributed to this recovery, by giving up thereto certain cities and territories, when he first began his conquests; but this was only to lull the Olynthians asleep, and to save himself the expence of garisons, when it suited not his circumstances to maintain them <sup>c</sup>; but now, when his affairs were altered, he began to think not only of resuming what he had bestowed, but of making himself master of Olynthus, and thereby subverting a republic, which had been heretofore an over-match for Macedon. The Olynthians were too discerning not to suspect Philip's design, before he actually put it in execution; as soon therefore as they observed that he was advancing towards the Chalcidian region, they put themselves on their guard, and sent embassadors to Athens to intreat a considerable and speedy assistance. Demosthenes failed not to espouse the cause of the Olynthians. He began with putting the Athenians in mind, that till now they had held the balance between the kings of Macedon and this state; and that, if they held it not still, they were as sure to be ruined as the Olynthians themselves. Hence he inferred, that a prompt and considerable succour should be sent according to the request of the embassadors, and that commissioners should be appointed for abrogating such laws, as hindered the settling the necessary funds for carrying on a war of such importance with vigour <sup>u</sup>. Demades and the rest of the orators, who were corrupted by Philip, opposed this proposition with all their eloquence: but as they had not either truth on their side, or a power of speaking equal to Demosthenes's, the people inclined to follow his advice <sup>w</sup>, and accordingly decreed, that relief should be sent to the Olynthians. Philip in the mean time took Zeira, a town in the Chalcidian region, and razed it to the ground. He soon after marched against Mycaberna and To-

rone, both of which he subdued. After this he openly attacked the Olynthians, defeated them twice in the field, and at last shut them up in their city *. The Athenian succours consisted of mercenaries, which therefore did the Olynthians but little service, and were besides so much suspected, that they were little less dreaded than the Macedonians themselves; the citizens therefore sent ambassadors a second time to Athens, to intreat fresh assistance, and that it might be of Athenian troops. Demosthenes seconded this proposition with his usual vehemence, and on his motion Chares was sent a second time with seventeen galleys, and a land army of two thousand foot and three hundred horse, all citizens of Athens; but, alas! the cordial came too late. It did indeed revive the fainting spirits of the Olynthians for a time; and the Athenians, hearing of some slight successes of theirs, grew so elate, that they took no farther care of the war, as appears from an oration of Demosthenes yet remaining †; but in the end Olynthus was taken, not so much by the bravery of the Macedonian troops, as by Philip's corrupting its principal magistrates, Euthykrates and Lasthenes, who basely betraying their country, after the city had made a glorious defence, secretly opened its gates, and let in Philip and his army. The king on this occasion proceeded with great severity; he gave up the houses of the citizens to be plundered, and exposed their persons to sale, acquiring thereby an immense treasure, at the same time as he ridded himself of such as were his implacable enemies. After this he celebrated olympic games in honour of this victory, which happened in the first year of the one hundred and eighth olympiad, causing splendid shews to be exhibited for the diversion of his army, making magnificent feasts, at which they might be merry, and giving great rewards to such as had signalized themselves during the siege, that his soldiers might be encouraged to serve him both gallantly and faithfully ‡.

Two incidents happened amidst these solemnities, which deserve to be recorded, because they shew the temper of Philip on both sides, and consequently must enable us to form a better idea of the motives on which he acted, than we could possibly have done without them; for without doubt the reasons of actions are better found by knowing the mind of the actor, than by the most circumstantial accounts of the things acted. The first of these incidents was a complaint brought by Euthycrates and Lasthenes against the Macedonian soldiers for calling them traitors. To which Philip gave this answer, You must never mind what such fellows say; they are a sort of clownish people, who will call a spade a spade <sup>a</sup>. As to the other remarkable incident, Satyrus a player, whom Philip had admitted to a great familiarity with him, was the only person who wore a grave countenance, and reached not out his hand to receive any of the gifts which Philip bestowed upon his friends. The king observed it, and with his usual complacency asked him, How he came to look so dull? and why he would not suffer himself to be obliged as well as other people? To which Satyrus answered, I don't either affect gravity, Sir, or put any slight on your presents; on the contrary, I should be extremely glad if you would give me yonder girls, pointing to two young women who were among the slaves; they are the daughters of a man in whose house I lodged. I ask them not out of greediness, but with an intent to give them such portions as may procure them honest husbands. Philip commended his generosity, granted his request, and loaded him with presents of great value <sup>b</sup>. This affability, and particular care in rewarding every man who served him, gained Philip friends in every city, and made them eager to run any risque to obtain his favour. He was sensible of this, and was so far from being ashamed of it, that he was wont to say publicly, that he was no less indebted to his purse than to his sword.

THE Phocian war was still unextinguished, and Philip, tho' he affected a neutrality, placed all his hopes in putting an end to this war, and thereby making himself the arbiter of Greece. His hopes were well founded. The Thebans, who were at the head of the league formed for reducing the Phocians, solicited him on one side; the states confederate with the Phocians sought his friendship on the other. He answered neither, yet held in dependence both. In his heart he favoured the Thebans, or rather placed his hopes of favouring his own cause on that state; for he knew well enough, that the Athenians, Spartans, and other states allied with Phocis, would never suffer him to pass Thermopylæ, and lead an army into their territories <sup>c</sup>; yet he shewed so much respect to the embassadors from these states, particularly to Ctesiphon and Phrynon, who were sent from Athens, that they believed the king was in their interest, and reported as much to their masters. The Athenians, who were now dissolved in ease and luxury, and consequently were afraid of being disturbed with wars, received this news with great satisfaction, and named immediately ten plenipotentiaries to go and treat of a full and lasting peace with Philip. Of the number of these plenipotentiaries were Demosthenes and Æschines, the most eminent orators in Athens. The king of Macedon gave directions, that these ambassadors should be treated with the utmost civility, naming at the same time three of his ministers to confer with them, viz. Antipater, Parmenio, and Eurylochus. Demosthenes being obliged to return to Athens, recommended it to his colleagues not to carry on their negotiations with Philip's deputies, but to proceed with all diligence to court, there to confer with the king himself. On this, he told them, all things would depend, as on what they did depended the safety of their country. The ambassadors, however, were so far from following the instructions of Demosthenes, that they suffered themselves to be put off for three months by the arts of Philip and his ministers. In the mean time the king took from the Athenians such places in Thrace as might best cover his frontiers, giving their plenipotentiaries in their stead abundance of fair promises, and the strongest assurances, that his good-will should be as beneficial to them as ever their colonies had been. At last a peace was concluded; but then the ratification of it was deferred till Philip had possessed himself of Phærea in Thessaly, and saw himself at the head of a numerous army; then he ratified the treaty, and dismissed the plenipotentiaries with assurances, that he would be ready at all times to give the Athenians proofs of his friendship. On their return to Athens, when this matter came to be debated before the people, Demosthenes plainly told them, That in his opinion, the promises of Philip ought not to be relied on, because they appeared to be of little significance in themselves, and came from a prince of so much art and so little fidelity, that they could derive no authority from their maker<sup>d</sup>. Æschines, on the other hand, gave it as his sentiment, that the king of Macedon's assurances ought to give them full satisfaction. He said, That, for his part, he was not politician enough to see any thing of disguise or dissimulation in the king's conduct; that there was great danger in distrusting princes, and that the surest method of putting men upon deceit, was to shew that we suspected them of it. The rest of the plenipotentiaries concurred with Æschines; and the people, desirous of quiet, and prone to pleasure, easily gave credit to all that was said, and decreed that the peace should be kept. All this was the easier brought about, because that Phocion, the worthiest man in the republic, did not oppose Philip; which was owing to his having a just sense of the state his country was in. He conceived, that the Athenians of those times were nothing like their ancestors, and therefore, as he expressed himself on another occasion, he was desirous, since they would not be at the head of Greece themselves, they would at least be upon good terms with that power which would be so<sup>e</sup>.

Philip, who knew how to use, as well as to procure, opportunity, while the Athenians were in this good humour, passed Thermopylae, without their knowing whether he would fall on Phocis or Thebes; but he quickly undeceived them, by commanding his soldiers to put on crowns of laurel, declaring them thereby the troops of Apollo, and himself the lieutenant-general of that god. He then immediately entered Phocis, with an air of triumph, as if thunder and lightning had been at his command; which so terrified the Phocians, whom he had caused to be proclaimed sacrilegious persons, that they immediately dismissed all thoughts of defence, and without more ado submitted to his mercy. Thus the Phocian war, which had so long employed all Greece, was ended without a stroke, Phalaccus, with eight thousand mercenaries, being permitted to march off into Peloponnesus, and the judgment on the Phocians remitted to the Amphictyons, or grand council of Greece. By their decree the walls of three Phocian cities were demolished, the people were forbid to inhabit in any but villages, to pay a yearly tribute of sixty talents, and never to make use either of horses or arms, till they had repaid to the temple of Apollo the money they had taken sacrilegiously from thence. Their arms were taken from them, broken to pieces, and burnt; their double voice in the council was taken from them and given to the Macedonians. Other orders were made for resettling the affairs both of religion and state throughout Greece, all of which were executed by Philip with great exactness and moderation, paying the most profound respect to the council; and when he had performed its commands, retiring peaceably with his army back to Macedon, which gained him great reputation<sup>f</sup>. This seems to have been one of the greatest achievements of his life, and that which laid the foundation of his empire. Hence one historian remarks, that the Grecians paid the next honours to divinity, to a prince who had vindicated the honour of the gods<sup>g</sup>; and another tells us, that from this time forward Philip prospered

AT Athens alone the justice and piety of Philip was not understood. The people began to see, tho' a little of the latest, that they had been abused and deceived by those who had negotiated the late peace; they saw, that, through their acceptance of it, the Phocians were destroyed, that Philip was become master of Thermopylae, and might enter Greece when he pleased; that in abandoning their allies they had abandoned themselves; and that, in all probability, they might soon feel the weight of his power, whom they had so foolishly trusted: They therefore began to take new and violent measures; they ordered, that the women should retire out of the villages into the city, their walls should be repaired, and their forts new strengthened. They seemed inclined to question Philip's election into the council of the Amphictyons, because it had been done without their consent, and even to proceed to an open war. In all likelihood they had carried things to extravagancy, if Demosthenes had not interposed. He told them, that tho' he was not for making the peace, he was, however, for keeping it; and that he saw no manner of occasion for their entering into so unequal a contest as would needs ensue, if they took up arms, not only against Philip, but against all the states concurring with him in the late transactions. This seems to have cooled the rage of the Athenians, and to have brought them to think of ruining Philip by degrees, as by degrees they had raised him <sup>i</sup> (E).

(E) Libanius and Photius have taken pains to prove, that the oration to which we refer above, ought not to be ascribed to Demosthenes. We might well enough defend ourselves by alledging, that it has been generally esteemed his, and, as such, as constantly maintained its place in his works. This would be sufficient for our purpose; but, in truth, the arguments on which the opposite sentiment is built are so easily overturned, that we might be justly blamed for neglecting so favourable an occasion of setting this point in its true light. Demosthenes, say those who will not allow this oration to be his, charged Æschines with betraying his country on account of his recommending warmly a peace with Philip; they cannot therefore think, that Demosthenes would run openly into those measures, which he had so lately and so warmly decried, or that he, who, on every other occasion, singly opposed Philip, and

THE fame of his atchievements without the bounds of Diopithes Macedon having disposed the subjects of Philip to hope every thing from his conduct, and the several states of Greece to desire above all things his friendship ; that prudent monarch laid hold of this favourable situation to fix his dominion on such a stable foundation as that a reverse of fortune should not immediately destroy it. To this end, while he carried on his negotiations through Greece, he likewise kept his army in exercise by taking several places in Thrace, which terribly incommoded the Athenians *. Diopithes, who had the government of the Athenian colonies in those parts, perceiving well what end Philip had in view, did not stay for any instructions from home ; but having raised with much expedition a considerable body of troops, taking advantage of the king's being absent with his army, entered the adjacent territories of Philip, and wasted them with fire and sword. The king, who on account of the operations of the campaign in the Chersonese, was not at leisure to repel Diopithes by force, nor indeed could divide his army without eminent hazard, chose like an able general rather to abandon his provinces to insults, which might be afterwards revenged, than by following the dictates of an ill-timed passion to hazard run all hazards to bring him into odium with the people, should now be single on the other side, and attempt to cross the disposition of the Athenians in favour of peace and Philip (20). These objectors forget, that Demosthenes was a patriot as well as an orator ; that he did not pursue Philip with implacable hatred, because he was king of Macedon, but because he thought him both willing and able to obstruct the designs of Athens, and even to reduce her from that splendid pre-eminence which she now held in Greece, to the ordinary rank of a state in name free, but in truth dependent upon him ; this was the motive of Demosthenes's heat on other occasions ; and the motive to his coolness now was the strict alliance between Philip and the other Grecian states, which rendered it a thing impracticable for Athens to contend with him and them alone. Besides, as he rightly observes in the harangue, it would have been ridiculous for those, who refused to enter into an equal war for rich cities and fertile provinces, to have rushed suddenly into a most unequal contest about an empty title, or, as he emphatically expresses it, To take away the shadow of Delphos from him who was master of Delphos itself (21). We therefore acknowledge this to be the oration of Demosthenes, because he was worthy of it.

the loss of his veteran army, whereon lay all his hopes. He contented himself therefore with complaining to the Athenians of Diopithes's conduct, who in a time of peace had entered his dominions, and committed such devastations, which could scarce have been justified in a time of war. His partisans supported this application with all their eloquence; they told the Athenians, that unless they recalled Diopithes, and brought him to a trial for this infringement of the peace, they ought not to hope either for the friendship of Philip, or of any other prince or state; neither could they justly complain, if, prompted by such a precedent, others should break faith with them, and fall without the least notice upon their dominions. Demosthenes defended Diopithes, and undertook to shew, that he deserved the praise, and not the censure, of the Athenians. Those of the other party began to charge him then with crimes of a different nature; they alledged, that he had oppressed the subjects, and mal-treated the allies of Athens. Demosthenes replied, that of these things there were as yet no proofs; that when such should appear, a single galley might be sent to bring over Diopithes to abide their judgment, but that Philip would not come if they sent a fleet; whence he inferred, that they ought to be cautious, and to weigh well the merits of this cause before they took any resolution. He said, that it was true, Philip had not as yet attacked Attica, or pretended to make a descent on their territories in Greece, or to force his way into their ports; when it came to that, he was of opinion they would be hardly able to defend themselves, wherefore he thought such men were to be esteemed as fought to protect their frontiers, in order to keep Philip as long as might be at a distance; whereupon he moved, that instead of disowning what Diopithes had done, or directing him to dismiss his army, they should send him over recruits, and shew the king of Macedon, they knew how to protect their territories, and to maintain the dignity of their state as well as their ancestors. These arguments had such an effect, that a decree was made conformable to his motion <sup>1</sup>.

THE reader must certainly be somewhat at a loss as to the grounds on which these parties proceeded; nor is it easy to set them in a clear light. Philip is, generally speaking, represented not only as a politic and over-reaching, but a fraudulent and perfidious, prince, one who had small regard to treaties, and who set no bounds to his ambition. But then it must be considered, that we have all these reports from the sworn enemies of Philip; he had the misfortune to have been at variance all his reign with the Athenians, and the Athenians were at that time the most eloquent, as their authors are yet esteemed the most excellent, among the Greeks. The orations of Demosthenes many of them remain, but for any answers that were made to them, time has swallowed them up; and we have scarce any apologies for Philip; yet in spite of these cross accidents, it may be discerned, that Philip's character ought not to be considered in altogether so bad a light as the orator has placed it. For, first, all speakers in popular assemblies are wont to exaggerate the subjects on which they declaim, and like the painters of domes and cupolas make large allowances for the distances between their pictures and those who are to look up to them. Secondly, The Athenians naturally hated kings, and conceived all nations to be barbarians who were governed by them. Thirdly, they held their territories in Thrace by a very dubious title, which we shall take this occasion to explain. When the republic was in the zenith of its glory, they had possessed themselves of the Chersonese by force. When Iysander destroyed Athens, the inhabitants of the before-mentioned country put themselves under the protection of the Lacedæmonians <sup>m</sup>. Conon afterwards reduced them to the obedience of their antient masters <sup>n</sup>, and Cotys king of Thrace conquered them once more from Athens. Chersobleptes his son, finding himself unable to oppose Philip of Macedon, gave up this place again to the Athenians, reserving only the city of Cardia which stood on the isthmus <sup>o</sup>. Philip having now dispossessed Chersobleptes of his kingdom, the citizens of Cardia, unwilling to fall under the Athenian yoke, submitted themselves voluntarily to Philip; whereupon Diphithes began the war, on a supposition, that so enterprising a prince would not stop here, but would make use of the advantages he had already gained, utterly to dispossess the Athenians of their colonies in these parts <sup>p</sup>. Such were the sources of those differences, which so long embroiled the Athenians and Philip; sources which, lying as they did in the constitutions of Macedon and Athens, could never be dried up; for the prudence of Philip giving him to understand, that till he was master of Greece, he would never be able to keep the Athenians under ; and till that was done, knowing himself to be unsafe at home, and scarce to be called a king ; he chose to run all hazards in order to be the former, chiefly because of all situations he dreaded to be in the latter (F).

WHILE affairs stood thus, the Illyrians, recovering courage, and seeing Philip at such a distance, harassed the frontiers of Macedon, and threatened a formidable invasion ; but this attempt of theirs prejudiced none so much as themselves, and for Philip by quick marches arrived on the borders of Illyrium, and struck this barbarous people with such a panic, that they were glad to compound for their former robberies

(F) The extended country of Thrace was inhabited by many nations. The reader will meet with what can be collected respecting their history hereafter, at present it will be necessary to say something of the families of those kings with whom Philip had to do. Teres king of the Odrysians, by the conquest of many little princes, raised himself to a very high rank, and swelled his dominions to a large extent ; he had two sons, Sitalces and Spartocus (22). The descendants of these sons were engaged in continual wars amongst themselves, which extremely broke and ruined all their principalities, till at last Seuthes raised a considerable kingdom out of the conquests he made, and left it to his son Cotys the father of Chersobleptes, as Demosthenes tells us (23) ; but Diodorus will have him to be his brother (24). After the death of Cotys, his dominions were shared by Chersobleptes, Berisades, and Amadocus. Chersobleptes quickly dispossessed the other two, and, flushed with these conquests, and the hopes he had of the friendship of the Athenians, he began to contend with Philip, who, falling upon him with a veteran army of well-disciplined troops, defeated and dethroned him. This Chersobleptes we shall hear much of hereafter : The Athenians granted him the honour of being inrolled in their city-register, and he, when he found Philip too strong for him, resigned a part of his dominions to them. The truth is, conquest was the best title that any of them had, except the Thracians, who may be said to have had a birth-right in their own country. Philip therefore wisely added that tract of land he conquered, between the rivers Strymon and Nessus, to Macedonia, without pretending to make himself absolute master of Thrace. His son Alexander indeed did conquer it, but after his death, it fell again under the obedience of a native, viz. Seuthes the son or grandson of Chersobleptes, who defended his right and his possession against the Macedonians, more successfully than his ancestors had done (25).

at the price he was pleased to set<sup>a</sup>. Most of the Greek cities in Thrace now sought the friendship of the king, and entered into a league with him for their mutual defence. As it cannot be supposed, that each of these free cities had a power equal to that of Philip, we may therefore look upon him as their protector. This is exactly conformable to the account which Diodorus gives us of this matter ; but Demosthenes represents this transaction as downright robbery, insinuating, that to have Philip for a protector, was to own him for a master ; and that consequently his proceeding in this manner was making a conquest of so many cities, and an injury to all Greece<sup>r</sup>. About this time Philip's negotiations in Peloponnesus began to come to light ; the Argives and Messenians, growing weary of that tyrannical authority which the Spartans exercised over them, applied to Thebes for assistance ; and the Thebans, out of their natural aversion to Sparta, sought to open a passage for Philip into Peloponnesus, that, in conjunction with them, he might humble the Lacedæmonians. Philip readily accepted the offer, and resolved to procure a decree from the Amphictyons, directing the Lacedæmonians to leave Argos and Messene free ; which if they complied not with, he, as the lieutenant of the Amphictyons, might, with great appearance of justice, march with a body of troops to enforce their order. When Sparta had intelligence of this, she immediately applied to Athens, earnestly intreating assistance, as in the common cause of Greece. The Argives and Messenians, on the other hand, laboured assiduouly to gain the Athenians to their side, alleging, that if they were friends to liberty, they ought to assist those whose only aim was to be free. Demosthenes at this juncture out-wrestled Philip, if we may borrow that king's expression ; for by a vehement harangue, he not only determined his own citizens to become the avowed enemies of the king, but also made the Argives and Messenians not over-fond of him for an ally<sup>r</sup> ; which when Philip perceived, he laid aside all thoughts of this enterprize for the present, and began to practise in Eubœa.

This country, now called Negropont, is separated from Greece by the Euripus, a streight so narrow, that Eubœa might easily be united to the continent. This situation made Philip call it, the Fetters of Greece, which he therefore sought to have in his own hands. There had been for some years great disturbances in that country, under colour of which Philip sent forces thither, and demolished Porthmos, the strongest city in those parts, leaving the country under the government of three lords, whom Demosthenes roundly calls tyrants, established by Philip<sup>r</sup>. Shortly after the Macedonians took Oreus, which was left under the government of five magistrates, styled also tyrants at Athens. Thither Plutarch of Eretria, one of the most eminent persons in Eubæa, went to represent the distresses of his country, and to implore the Athenians to set it free. This suit Demosthenes recommended warmly to the people, who sent thither their famous leader Phocion, supported by formidable votes but a very slender army; yet so well did he manage the affairs of the commonwealth and her allies, that Philip quickly found he must for a time abandon that project, which, however, he did not, till he had formed another no less beneficial to himself, or less dangerous to Athens<sup>u</sup>. It was the prosecution of his conquests in Thrace, which he thought of pushing much farther than he had hitherto done, or could be reasonably suspected to have any intention of doing (G).

(G) We have shewn above of what importance Eubæa was both to Philip and to the rest of Greece; we shall here take occasion to speak of the form of government which Philip would have established there. We no-where find, that he had any idea of annexing it to his dominions, or of obliging the people to live under new laws, or new modes of rule. Eubæa was full of great cities, each of which was a kind of republic, and, together with the benefits of freedom and independence, were sometimes disturbed by that spirit of dissension which frequently enters where liberty is adored. In these disputes both parties were wont to have recourse to foreign assistance, the Athenians, Thebans, Lacedæmonians, all in their turn, had sent auxiliaries to support their friend in this island; and now it seems the king of Macedon thought fit to do the like, without doubt on a principle of interest, for when do princes act from any other? We have very imperfect accounts of this war, which ended at last to the disadvantage of the Athenians: Instead therefore of drawing together all the jejune passages in antient authors, wherein the Eubæan war is mentioned; we will from Demosthenes himself give a succinct detail of the tyranny which Philip set up in Oreus, one of the principal cities of Eubæa. Philistides, Menippus, Socrates, Agapetus, and Theas, were at the head of affairs, and were professed friends to Philip of Macedon; Euphreus, who had

THE preparations he made for the campaign were extraordinary, his army larger than he was wont to make use of, and the precautions he took for the safety of his dominions in his absence, by appointing his son Alexander regent, such as shewed he had vast designs in his mind. At length when the season of the year permitted, he marched with thirty thousand men and invested Perinthus *. This city was one of the most considerable in the Propontis, always firm to the Athenians, and consequently both dreadful and dangerous to Philip. The siege was hardly formed before the king received advice, that his restless neighbours had taken arms, supposing that they could easily deal with forces commanded by a child; for Alexander was not above fifteen. But before he had leisure to reflect on this danger, he was farther informed, that Alexander had marched against them with such secrecy and expedition, as to fall upon them before they were aware, and thereby struck them with such consternation, that, making a precipitate retreat, they covered themselves with shame, and crowned the youth they despised with laurels: Philip, however, sent for his son immediately to the camp, fearing that this success might make him adventurous, and that fortune might not be always so favourable as, upon this occasion, the had formerly dwelt at Athens, began to treat these magistrates as traitors; he alledged, that they were entirely devoted to the Macedonian, and would betray the city into his hands, Philistides and his colleagues immediately threw this man into prison; the people it seems concurred with their magistrates, and looked upon him as a disturber of the public peace. When the disorders in the rest of Eubœa had occasioned Macedonian troops to be sent thither, the magistrates of Oreus owned them for their protectors, banished such as had confederated against them, and assumed the direction of public affairs to themselves, which had such an effect on the patriot they had imprisoned, that he laid violent hands upon himself. Philistides and his colleagues are qualified by the Athenian orator with the name of tyrants, and Philip, who was their protector, is made the tyrant of tyrants (26). This was the true style of Athens, where all power, underived from, or unexercised for, them, was held tyrannical. It is very possible, the Eubœans might speak another language, and without question the partizans of Philip protested loudly, that he interested himself in the affairs of Eubœa, in order to preserve the people from being oppressed by foreign states.

had been. The Perinthians, however, made a gallant defence, their city being well fortified, as well as remarkably strong from its situation. Philip on his side pressed it closely both by his artillery, that is, Battering engines, and by sap : he caused also moveable towers to be erected, and bringing them near the walls, his soldiers from thence threw all sorts of missile weapons into the city<sup>1</sup>. Athens, for whose sake Perinthus thus suffered, heard the complaints of her ambassadors, supported by the pathetic orations of Demosthenes, with compassion. Succours were immediately decreed in spite of all the arts which the friends of Philip could make use of ; however, Chares was made choice of to command them, and if Philip had been to have appointed a general, he would probably have been the man. He was vain, luxurious, haughty, insolent, and unjust ; was very indifferently skilled in military matters, yet so full of promises of what he would perform, that the promise of Chares became a proverb, to signify an undertaking which would never be fulfilled. This commander in chief set sail with a small squadron of galleys, a considerable body of land-forces, and an excellent band of music, which he chose with great care, and paid at an extravagant rate. His character was so well known, that the Perinthians, in as bad a state as they were, refused to admit him into their port, so that he was forced to return home, without doing any thing more than plundering the allies, and thereby bringing disgrace on the Athenian name<sup>2</sup>.

writes a letter to
ans.

As Philip was perfectly well acquainted with the state of Athens at that time, and knew that the engaging it in a war would in all probability revive that spirit of ambition and that appetite of glory, which had in former times rendered it so powerful ; he had recourse to those mighty talents which distinguished him in that age, and which may be said to have distinguished him from all kings. He wrote the Athenians a letter, which is still extant, and which it would be injurious to his memory to abridge, or to publish in any other than his own words. It was intended as a manifesto to the commons and to his enemies in Athens, and as a scheme of instruction to his friends ; how well it answered both purposes, the reader will discern, and form from thence a just Idea of a prince, who was his own secretary, as well as his own general, his own minister, and his own treasurer ; not that he was opinionated of his own parts, but because he was a perfect judge of those of other men, as appears from a saying of his relating to these Athenians. He was told they elected annually ten generals : They are a happy people, said he, who every year can find ten generals, since I in my whole life have found but one, which was, Parmenio<sup>a</sup>. But to the letter, thus it ran :

Philip to the senate and people of Athens, greeting ;

“ After applying to you often, though always in vain, by “ my ambassadors, in order to engage your paying the same “ regard to your oaths and treaties that I do to mine ; I am “ determined to explain to you myself the mischiefs I sustain “ by your persisting in a contrary conduct. Do not be sur-“ prized at the length of my letter ; to enter into a detail “ of your infractions and my patience, requires no small “ room.

“ I begin with Nicias my herald, taken out of my do“ minions. Instead of punishing such as were concerned “ in this fact, you were pleased to detain him in prison for “ no less a time than ten months before you sent him back, “ neither did you make any difficulty of taking from him,
 “ and reading in the public assemblies, the letters with “ which he was intrusted by me. After this the ports of “ the isle of Thasus were opened to the Byzantine gallies, or “ rather to all sorts of corsairs, which you saw with the same “ indifference, as if this practice did not involve you in the “ guilt of evident perjury. Then your general Diopithes en“ tered my territories in a hostile manner, carrying into fla-
 “ very the inhabitants of Crobylus and Tiristafas, pillaging “ and sacking all the villages in that part of Thrace. When “ Amphylochus my ambassador went to treat for the ransom of “ the prisoners. Diopithes, to crown his worthy exploits, “ clapped him up, and forced him, to rescue himself from “ ill usage, to pay down nine talents, and all this he did “ with your participation and countenance. Ought the vio“ lating the respect due to a herald at arms, or an embassa“ dor, to be borne rather from you than from other people ?
 “ What think you of the business at Megara ? As soon as “ its inhabitants had injured Anthemacrites, cloathed by you “ with a public character, you thought yourselves oblig’d to “ take a public and proportionate revenge ; you excluded such “ as were guilty from any commerce with you ; and you e“ rected a pyramid before your gates to perpetuate the mo“ mory of your justice and their crime. Well then ! an “ outrage held so intolerable, when done to yourselves, doth “ it pass for nothing when you yourselves do it ?

“ Callias, one of your generals, made not the least scru-“ ple of reducing under your obedience all the towns seated “ on the Pegasæan gulph, though they were expressly com-“ prehended in our treaty under the name of my allies.
 “ This done, he attacked all the vessels bound to Macedonia ; “ passengers, merchants, all were held good prize, and sold “ for slaves. These piracies you have applauded and justified “ by your decrees ; for my part, I don’t see what you could “ have done worse, if you had declared open war against me.
 “ Nay, heretofore, when the sword was drawn, you con“ tented yourselves with carrying on hostilities in an open “ manner ; you made reprisals on my subjects ; you did all you “ could to injure their trade ; you supported my enemies, and “ endeavoured to make descents on my territories ; but now, “ while we are at peace, you stop not at these things, your “ rancour and your injustice have pushed you on to stir up
 “ a barbarian to become my enemy ; and your ambassadors
 “ have solicited the king of Persia to over-whelm Macedonia.
 “ What strange conduct is this ? to beseech that monarch to “ ally himself with you against me, without remembering,
 “ that before he had subdued Egypt and Phœnicia, you re“ solved to invite me and the rest of the Greeks into a confe“ deracy against him as the common enemy. Very consistent !
 “ T’other day you were for going with me against him, “ now you desire him to go with you against me, Your “ ancestors, as I have been informed, objected it as an un“ pardonable crime to the children of Pisistratus, that they “ invited the great king into Greece ; yet the same thing is “ done by your modern politicians. You are not thus it seems “ ashamed to injure me by methods you condemned even in “ your tyrants, so that all things become lawful and laudable,
 “ as soon as it is discerned they will spight Philip. You “ have given me a signal mark of this in your decrees, in-“ joining me to put Teres and Chersobleptes, as citizens of “ Athens, into quiet possession of their estates. I shall not in“ quire whether they were comprized in our treaty of peace, “ whether their names are to be found in your list of citizens,
 “ or whether they are natives or descendants of Athens ;
 “ this I know very well, that I have seen Teres serving in “ my armies against you, and Chersobleptes being on the very “ point of swearing to a treaty concluded with my embassa-“ dors, declined it, terrified by the menaces of your general, “ who

“ who threatened to proclaim him an enemy to your republic, “ What justice ! what equity ! what consistency is here !
 “ when he was about to become my friend, you threatened “ to declare him your enemy ; after doing me all the mischief
 “ he could, now truly he is your citizen. You who hereto“ fore received and protected a murderer, while yet red with “ the blood of Sitalces ! Sitalces king of Thrace ! Sitalces, “ whom you called your citizen ! yet in regard to this title,
 “ you are now for taking Chersobleptes under your protection,
 “ and for making war on me on his account ; however, “ upon other occasions, you have more than once regarded “ in another light these adopted citizens, your laws, and “ your decrees. But to cut short this dispute, you cannot “ deny, that you have seen dethroned, and ignominiously “ banished, Evagoras of Cyprus and Dionysius of Syracuse, “ two kings, who for themselves and their descendants were “ honoured with the high titles of citizens of Athens. If “ your eloquence can be so effectually employed as to per“ suade those who have driven these tyrants from their thrones “ to replace them again, you may be assured, that you will “ find me no less tractable in resettling Teres and Chersoblep- “ tes in all and several their dominions in Thrace. If you “ look upon that to be a crime in me, with which you “ will not so much as upbraid others, can you wonder, that “ I pay little regard to your censure ? I could say many “ things more upon this head, but I chuse rather to suppress “ them.

“ WITH respect to other things, be it known to you, that “ if you attack the Cardians, they shall be succoured ; I “ will and I ought to do it, not only in respect to the strict “ alliance there has been between us, long before I conclud“ ed the treaty with you, but on account also of your ob“ stinacy in refusing to submit the differences between you
 “ and them to arbitration, as they and I have often desired
 “ you to do. Would you not take me for the meanest “ creature in the world, if upon this occasion I should de“ sert my old and constant friends, for the sake of people “ who thwart me in every thing I do ? I can no longer be “ silent, your insolence is come to a height not to be borne ;
 “ your late proceedings are of such a cast, that moderation “ is no longer a virtue. The Peparethians did but tell you “ they were oppressed by me ; and, without further inquiry,
 “ you direct your generals to avenge these islanders, whom I “ had chastised more mildly than they deserved. These “ faithless people had in full peace surprized Halonnesus, nor “ would they part either with the island or the garrison, tho’
 “ I often

“ I often solicited them by my ambassadors. When I was “ thus insulted, you said not a word ; but when I came to “ do myself justice, what a clamour have you set up ? You “ know very well, that I took this Halonnesus neither from “ them nor you, but from Sostrates the pirate. If you say “ that he held it under your protection, you declare your“ selves his accomplices : If you disown him and his robbe“ ries, why should you think of depriving me of my just “ reward, for clearing the seas and protecting trade ? I be“ lieve I can guess the reason. All things I do offend you, “ kindneses not excepted. I offered you this Halonnesus “ merely out of the great respect I had to your friendship ; this “ did not please your demagogues, they talked you into a “ refusal of my offer, and which was somewhat singular, they “ talked you into reclaiming what they made you refuse to ac“ cept. Would you know the reason ? Come, I’ll tell it you :
 “ Either I must have restored the island, which you know “ would have been a full proof of my taking it unjustly ; or “ I must have refused to restore it, and thereby have opened “ a way to those violent motions which they long to make “ in your assemblies. Well, I penetrated all this, and, to “ be even with them, offered to submit our disputes to arbi“ tration, resolving to make you a present of the island, if “ it was adjudged to me, and to have yielded it up, if judg“ ment had gone against me. Many a time did I offer this,
 “ and as often did you reject it. The Peparethians in the “ mean time seized the island. Well, what was I to do “ then ? Was I bound not to punish those violators of their “ oaths ? Was I patiently to submit to injuries of such a na“ ture, offered in such a manner ? Consider a little ; if Ha- “ lonnesus belonged to these people, how came the Athenians
 “ to demand it ? If it belonged to you, why did you not “ attack the usurpers ? Things came at last to such a pass, “ that, to secure the passage of Macedonian vessels from the “ privateers, fitted out from your colonies by order of Poly- “ crates, authorized so to do by your decrees, I was constrain“ ed to come in person before the ports of these corsairs, “ in order to keep them in awe. I had little reason to act “ with all this caution, when that general at the same time “ sent to the Byzantines to join with him, and declared pub“ licly, that, when occasion should offer, he would make “ war upon me. All this did not engage me to act with a “ violence proportioned to yours. I attempted nothing “ against you ; I seized not either your gallies or your domi“ nions, though it was in my power to have taken a part, if “ not the whole, of both ; and all this time I continued to “ solicit

“ solicit you, that our differences might be put to arbitra“ tion. Judge for yourselves, whether equity is best award“ ed by reason or the sword, and whether it be fit, that “ you or I should be judges in our own causes ; consider too “ with yourselves, how unreasonable it will appear, that “ the Athenians, who forced the Thasians and the Maronites “ to be content with an arbitration made on their respective “ claims to the city of Stryma, should refuse to submit to “ the decision of their own differences with me in the same “ way. Your obstinacy must appear still more unreasona“ ble, when it is remembered, that the arbitration I offered “ would not have left you exposed to the incertainties which “ usually attend such judgments. If it went against you, you “ were to lose nothing ; a decree in your favour would have “ given you my conquests.

“ To crown all your oddities, you refuse to hear my em-“ bassadors, who are impowered, in the name of me and “ my allies, to assure you that we are willing to compro“ mise upon reasonable terms whatever differences subsist “ between us and other Greeks. Could you take any bet“ ter method than complying with this proposition ? At all “ events, it must have been beneficial to you ; for I must “ either have acted conformable to my offers, or not : In “ the first case, you would have had the honour of protect“ ing all the Greeks, who, you say, have taken umbrage at “ my power : In the second, you would have had the great“ est advantage over me ; my want of faith could not have “ been concealed, I must have passed for a traitor convict “ throughout Greece. To say the truth, my propositions “ were perfectly suited to your people ; but, alas ! your de“ magogues could not find their accounts in them. Those “ who are best acquainted with your government say, that “ these sort of people know no sort of war so cruel as a “ peace, and never taste so much of peace as in the midst “ of war. When the sword is drawn every Athenian ge“ neral is tied down to compound with them ; and must ei“ ther pay for their crying him up, or for their not crying “ him down. Your dealers in words carry it still far“ ther : In order to have reputation, a man’s character “ must be publicly given by them. This is a general bu“ siness, nor is it of any great consequence what country
“ he is of, who desires to be commended ; the noble “ citizen, the illustrious stranger, a whole string of these “ sort of epithets are at their command ; and, once bestowed “ in the assembly, those who are honoured with them become “ most excellent commonwealth’s-men in the opinion of
“ the

“ the vulgar. I could upon very reasonable terms have “ silenced their invectives or even have converted them into “ eulogies ; but I scorn to acquire your friendship in so “ scandalous a manner. I should be ashamed to have any “ thing to do with these mercenaries, who, because they “ did not sell me Amphipolis, have the impudence to say,
 “ I usurp it. I am positive, my title to that city is built “ on reasons too strong for them with all their eloquence “ to overthrow. For, if Amphipolis ought to belong to its “ most antient possessors, how do I hold it unjustly ? Alex- “ ander, one of my ancestors held it first : witness the riches “ taken by him there from the Persians, the first fruits of “ which he consecrated in a statue of gold, set up in the “ temple at Delphi. Well, if you don’t like this reason, “ shall Amphipolis belong to its last master ? I am content, “ for by this title also it is mine. I took it from the Lace- “ dæmonians, who, after they had driven you out, settled “ in it a colony of their own. As I take it, all cities are “ held either by a right of succession or a right of con“ quest. Now both these rights have I ; you have neither “ the one or the other ; and yet, because you held the “ city some time, you are pleased to set up a claim to it, “ though you have confessed my right in the most authentic “ manner in the world. For in your answers to my letters “ on this subject, you have over-and-over acknowledged me “ for the lawful sovereign of Amphipolis ; besides you have “ recognized me for its master by your last treaty of peace.
 “ Is it possible to have the possession of a place better gua“ ranteed than I have this ? My ancestors held it formerly,
 “ I have conquered it, you have acknowledged my right,
 “ you who never parted with any thing, to which you “ had so much as the colour of a title. You see then the “ grounds of my complaints. Because you are without “ contradiction the aggressors, because I have spared no pains
 “ to prevent your having any reason for a rupture, you “ load me with reproaches, and make it your business to “ blacken me all you can. I take the gods to witness the “ goodness of my cause, and the necessity I am under of “ doing myself that justice which you have refused me <sup>b</sup>(H)”.

THE judicious reader will not be displeased at the extraordinary length of this letter, when he considers, that it is an accurate and authentic history of many curious events, and at the same time an artful apology written by the most potent prince and most consummate politician of his time. Happy would it have been for us, if more such letters as these had been preserved; but time has swallowed them up, and we have only a few short epistles, which serve barely to demonstrate, that this is truly Philip's from the conformity of its stile, as it must be allowed worthy of him from the consideration of its matter.

IN all probability, this epistle had wrought its desired effect, if Demosthenes the constant adversary of Philip had not Measures taken by the Athe- ble family, and a man of great spirit; he persuaded his fellow-citizens to throw off the Persian yoke, which they did under his conduct, and conquered a great part of the island; he was afterwards slain by Nicocles; however his son Evagoras the younger pretended to the kingdom of Cyprus, and was supported by the Athenians against Protagoras the successor of Nicocles. The Athenians were induced to take his part on account of the great assistance his father had given their admiral Conon, when he laboured to restore Athens to her former grandeur (27). As to Dionysius the younger, the reader has had his history already; there is, however, a passage relating to him, which deserves to be mentioned here. It is said, that Philip, having an interview with this prince, could not help asking him, how in so short a time he had lost the flourishing kingdom left him by his father? Dionysius answered frankly, Because, Sir, my father did not leave me his fortune with his kingdom (28). When the king of Macedon wrote in a high strain to the Lacedæmonians to leave the Argives and Messenians free, he received this Laconic answer: Dionysius at Corinth; by which they intimated, that he was no less a tyrant than Dionysius, and no more out of fortune's power than he (29). The islands of Peparethus, Halonnesus, and Sciatbus, lie in the Ægean sea, where they form a triangle. Philip, as he tells us in the letter, would have given up Halonnesus to the Athenians as a present, but Demosthenes engaged them to refuse it in that light, alledging, that their acceptance would be injurious to them as a republic (30). Æschines, however, told them plainly, that it was foolish to refuse an island, and dispute about words; that these sort of proceedings would do service to Philip, and afford him an opportunity of charging them with haughtiness and insincerity, as often as they upbraided him with breach of faith (31).

undertaken to open the people's eyes, and to convince them, that the king's design was only to suspend their judgments, and to hinder their taking any vigorous resolution, till he had subdued such places in the country where his army now lay, as would leave him without apprehensions from that quarter <sup>c</sup>. It happened, that about this time the news arrived at Athens of Chares's being excluded the ports of the allies; this occasioned great heats in the assembly, the partizans of Philip insisting warmly on the contempt shewn towards the republic, by first soliciting supplies, and then refusing to admit them. Phocion cleared up this; he told them in few words, that the allies had not insulted the people of Athens by endeavouring to secure themselves from a rapacious Athenian; and that, if they would retrieve their reputation, they ought to send back their succours under the command of some man of honour <sup>d</sup>. According to the wonted flexibility of popular councils, this motion was approved, and Phocion himself named admiral and captain general. In this flow of their good humour, the Athenians did every thing that could be expected from them; as, on the other hand, Phocion shewed himself a true patriot by accepting readily this command, when he found it in his power to execute it with honour to himself and to the state; though upon other occasions he had opposed their declaring against Philip, when he judged those declarations would only serve to irritate him and do themselves no good. Such were the enemies of Philip on this side. The Persian kings, as we have already frequently noted, were wont to regard the Macedonian princes, not only as their tributaries, but as their faithful allies. The fortune of Philip, the continual clamour of the Athenians against him, and his dethroning at his pleasure the petty princes of Thrace, concurred to make the Persian view him in another light. When therefore he led his troops against Perinthus, the great king, as he was stiled by the Greeks, sent his letters mandatory to the governors of the maritime provinces, directing them to supply the place with all things in their power; in consequence of which they filled it with troops, granted large subsidies in ready money, and sent besides great convoys of provisions and ammunition. The Byzantines also, conceiving their own turn would be next, exerted their utmost force for the preservation of Perinthus, sending thither the flower of their youth with all other necessaries for an obstinate defence <sup>e</sup>. Thus

THESE difficulties, which would certainly have made a strong impression on a prince of less firmness or more moderate abilities, served only to stimulate the ambition of the Macedonian. As soon therefore as he saw a small breach made in the wall, he proceeded to the attack, and stormed Perinthus with a vast effusion of blood on both sides. It is not likely that, with all these advantages, the Perinthians would have been able to have sustained many such efforts, if the situation of the city had not proved of greater use to them, than either themselves or Philip foresaw. For standing as it did on the side of a hill, and their houses being built with great regularity, every street, with the help of a few works, was converted into a new wall, which, while the besiegers battered, they were exposed to all the shot of the besieged; which, as the houses rose gradually one above another, did prodigious execution. Philip seeing this, and being informed by his engineer named Polindus, that nothing but time could overcome these difficulties, he instantly bethought himself of a method, whereby he hoped to indemnify his army for their long and great fatigue, though for the present he increased it; for marching suddenly with a great corps of troops, he blocked up Byzantium, which as it was in a manner exhausted by the succours sent to Perinthus, had well nigh fallen into his hands immediately, and could never have endured a siege even of a moderate length. But while Philip dreamt of gaining two cities at a time, he was compelled to leave them both; for Phocion, arriving with his fleet, quite changed the face of affairs. The inhabitants of the Chersonese declared immediately for the Athenians, and Philip, seeing all hopes of succeeding taken away, raised both his sieges, and marched off with an army excessively harassed, and not a little dispirited†. Phocion made the best use of his absence, he retook such places as the Macedonian had garrisoned, took many of his ships, and by frequent descents raised contributions throughout the maritime provinces of Macedonia‡.

THIS reverse of fortune served only to aggrandize the character of Philip; he sent immediately to treat of a peace, and that the reputation of his arms might not suffer from his late disappointment, he turned them instantly on a Scythian prince, who sought to take advantage of his misfortune; and, having totally defeated his forces, made the Macedonians rich with their plunder. The Triballi, a fierce and barbarous nation, refused him passage through their country, unless he would share with them the spoil he had taken. Philip, considering rather the wound his reputation would have received by complying with such a proposition, than the worth of what they required, absolutely rejected their demand, and marched to give them battle. The engagement was obstinate and bloody, and had well-nigh been fatal to the king; for after receiving a wound in his thigh, his horse was killed under him, and himself trampled to the ground. This being perceived by the young Alexander, he flew immediately to his assistance, and having covered his father's body with his shield, slew or put to flight such of the Barbarians as were got about him. Philip being remounted gained a signal victory, and returned into Macedon, as he was wont, covered with laurels, and received with loud acclamations, tho' in himself he was much dissatisfied, and began to form new projects for depressing the Athenians, who, kept continually warm by the orations of Demosthenes, were far from being so ready as they had formerly been to clap up a peace <sup>b</sup>.

Philip succeeds in his project of entering Greece. THE effects of the Athenian war became daily more and more insupportable to the subjects of Philip; for, as the Macedonians were never very powerful at sea, the Athenians now deprived them of all their trade, by keeping continually such squadrons on their coasts, that their vessels durst not stir out of port. If Philip's design had succeeded in Thrace and on the Hellepont, he would have starved Athens, her provisions as well as her revenues being chiefly drawn from those countries; the Athenians were now even with him in the same wars, with this unlucky circumstance, that the king knew not how to relieve himself <sup>c</sup>. Yet he did not despair; he formed, on the contrary, a project of invading Attica, though he had no fleet to transport his troops, and notwithstanding that he knew well enough the Thessalians were not to be depended on, if he attempted to march through the Pylæ, and that the Thebans would even then be ready to oppose his march. To obviate all these difficulties, he had recourse to Athens itself, where, by means of his partizans, he procured Æschines his old friend to be sent their deputy to the Amphictyons; this seemed a small matter, and yet this was the hinge on which his whole project turned. By that time Æschines had taken his seat, a question was stirred in the council, whether the Locrians of Amphissa had not been guilty of sacrilege in plowing the fields of Cyrrha in the neighbourhood of the temple at Delphi. Sentiments being divided, Æschines proposed a view, which was accordingly decreed. But when the Amphietyons came in order to see how things stood, the Locrians, either jealous of their property, or spurred thereto by the suggestions of some who saw farther than themselves, fell upon these venerable persons so rudely, that they compelled them to secure themselves by flight. The Amphietyons, considering this matter in council, decreed, that an army should be raised under the command of one of their own number to chastise the delinquents ; but as this army was to be composed of troops sent from all the states of Greece, the appearance at the rendezvous was so inconsiderable, that the Amphietyon sent to command them durst undertake nothing. The whole matter being reported to the council, Æschines in a long and eloquent harangue shewed, how much the welfare and even the safety of Greece depended on the reverence paid to their decrees ; and after inveighing against the want of public spirit in such as had not sent their quotas at the time appointed by the council, he moved that they should elect Philip for their general, and pray him to execute their decree. The deputies from the other states, conceiving that by this expedient their respective constituents would be freed from any farther trouble or expence, came into it at once ; whereupon a decree was immediately drawn up, purporting, that ambassadors should be sent to Philip of Macedon in the name of Apollo and the Amphietyons, once more to require his assistance, and to notify to him, that the states of Greece had unanimously chosen him their general, with full power to act as he thought fit, against such as had opposed the authority of the Amphietyons <sup>k</sup>. Thus of a sudden, and before any body foresaw it, Philip by this round-about method acquired all that he sought ; and having an army ready in expectation of this event, he immediately marched to execute the commands of the Amphietyons in all appearance, but in truth to fulfil his own deligns ; for having passed into Greece with his army, he meddled not with the Locrians, but seized immediately Elatea, a great city in Phocis, on the river

Cephus <sup>1</sup>. This amazed all Greece, nor was there any body who could pretend to say what step he would take next (H).

The Athenians and Thebans resolve to oppose him.

THE Athenians were in the utmost confusion on the news of Philip's march; an extraordinary assembly was called, in which the people demanded advice of Demosthenes by name. That great orator with much presence of mind exhorted them to send' ambassadors throughout all Greece, but especially to the Thebans to engage them to rise at once and oppose the Macedonian torrent before it bore down all.

(H) This was Philip's master-piece; upon this occasion he shewed that he was able to over-reach all the statesmen in Greece; for it is morally certain, that if any of the Grecian states had suspected his design, they would never have consented to the decree, which gave him a passage into the heart of their country. By seizing Elatea, he provided himself the fittest place in the world for his head quarters, since it awed Bæotia, and opened him a passage into Attica. It is true, the Thebans barred his passage, but that was what he could not foresee; for inasmuch as he had done them very considerable services, particularly in the Phocian war, he might better have reckoned upon them than upon any of the Grecians. These were not the only people who were not over-grateful to the king of Macedon; the Peloponnesians, for whom he had done much, openly hissed his chariot at the Olympic games, offering him thereby the highest affront in the sight of all Greece. When it was reported at the court of Philip, there wanted not some to declare, that such insolence ought to be chastised; but Philip, who was practised in the art of swallowing injuries (32), answered very mildly: If the Peloponnesians hiss us for doing good turns, what will they not say, if we should do them ill ones (33)? This calmness of his had its desired effect. His enemies, while they indulged their tongues, never thought of acting to his prejudice: When therefore he seized Elatea, they stood amazed, instead of running to arms, and, as if they had been fascinated by the charms of Philip, stood gazing on his army, expecting where it would march next. This sight was doubtless as pleasing to Philip as his subsequent victory at Cheronea, since it was the avowed maxim of this sagacious monarch, that an advantage gained by policy was more glorious than a conquest by arms, because in the glory of the latter his whole army had a right to share, whereas in respect to the former the same resulting therefrom belonged to himself alone (34).

The people instantly assented, and Demosthenes went to Thebes at the head of the embassy <sup>m</sup>. Philip had sent to the same city Pytho as his ambassador ; he was a man of great abilities, by birth a Byzantine, by his merit a citizen of Athens, by choice the minister of Philip <sup>n</sup>. This orator easily overcame the colleagues of Demosthenes ; but Demosthenes himself who could overcome ? His speeches had such an effect on the Thebans, that forgetting all the obligations they owed to Philip, they considered him no longer as their benefactor, but as one who sought to arrive at the sovereignty of Greece. Fired therefore with resentment, they concurred unanimously with the Athenians, and concerted with Demosthenes the measures proper to be taken in so nice a conjuncture. Philip, on the other hand, did not sit still, he sent his ambassadors to Athens to treat of peace, and he is said to have engaged the priestess at Delphi to prophesy nothing but destruction to those who should make war against him. Demosthenes defeated both designs, he engaged the Athenians not to listen in any degree to his propositions, and encouraged them also to pay no regard to the oracle, by telling them that Pythia Philipized. An army was immediately raised, which marched with incredible diligence to Eleusis, where they were joined by the Thebans, who shewed a laudable zeal for the liberty of Greece. The confederates made the greatest appearance that had ever been seen in Greece, and the troops were without doubt exceedingly good, but, unfortunately generals were wanting. Chares, that scandal to his country, and Lyficles, a man without conduct, commanded the Athenians ; the Thebans were without any general of note ; however, they prepared for a battle, which all circumstances considered, could not but be decisive <sup>o</sup>.

Philip, when he found his arts defeated, and that all his negotiations could not hinder this extraordinary junction, And are defeated at resolved as his last resource to have recourse to an engagement. Cheronæa. Thus determined, he advanced to Cheronæa, in the neighbourhood of which city the confederates were encamped. The next day, by that time the sun was up, both armies were in the field. The king gave the command of the left wing to his son Alexander, then about nineteen years of age ; but he placed about him his most experienced generals to prevent any accident his extraordinary courage, unsustain-ed by experience, might draw on him. The right he commanded in person. On the other side, the Athenians were on the left, the Thebans on the right. Alexander began the charge, and his troops seconded his ardor with an alacrity conformable to his wishes. The sacred band of the Thebans, however, made a steady and gallant resistance<sup>p</sup>. The Athenians in the mean time had the better on the left, and having pushed the enemy from their ground, Lysicles their general had the imprudence to cry aloud, Come on, my fellow soldiers, let us drive these cowards to Macedon. On which the Athenians losing all order rushed on to the pursuit. Philip, who saw and heard this from the side of a hill, whereon his phalanx remained in excellent order, said coldly to those who were near him, These Athenians don't know how to conquer<sup>q</sup>. Then bearing down upon them, all in confusion as they were, he obtained an easy, though a very bloody, victory; a thousand Athenians being slain on the spot. At the same time, and with a like effusion of blood, Alexander triumphed over the Thebans: Thus the confederates were totally overthrown, and the authority of Philip effectually established. Demosthenes, who had been so instrumental in bringing the Athenians and Thebans into the field, was there in person; but it seems he wanted military courage, for in the beginning of the rout he threw away his shield and betook himself to flight. We are farther told, that a stake catching hold of his robe as he fled, he, not doubting but it was an enemy, cried out, Alas! spare my life<sup>r</sup>. On his return to Athens, he was well received, though Lysicles was put to death. As to Philip, in the first transport of his joy, he behaved very ridiculously; he caused the decree of Demosthenes to be sung in his presence, spoke contemptibly of the powers of Greece, and insulted his prisoners, till Demades the Athenian brought him to his senses, by telling him, Heaven, O king, hath assigned thee the part of Agamemnon, and thou wilt needs play that of Therfites<sup>s</sup> (I). It was the peculiar felicity of this prince, that

(I) We need not wonder at Philip's intemperate joy on account of his victory. Heroes and kings are the greatest of men, but they are still men. Demosthenes, who alone preserved his courage, when Thebes and Athens were struck with terror, lost it when he came to engage those Macedonians, against whom he made it the business that he would hear advice, and receive those things kindly which to monarchs of a weaker brain would have sounded like treason. He instantly ordered Demades to be released, esteemed him as his friend, and loaded him with benefits ever after. His conversation, Diodorus tells us, gave Philip so high a relish of the Athenian civility, that he dismissed all his prisoners. But when they afterwards demanded their baggage, though he granted their request, he could not help saying, These men, I believe, do not think we fought in earnest. The reflection of Polybius on this act of clemency ought ever to accompany its recital, since it is no less honourable to its author, than the act itself was to Philip. By this, says that polite Grecian, he gained a second victory more glorious than his former; for whereas at Cheronæa he triumphed only over such Athenians as opposed him, he now vanquished the whole city.

business of his life to excite enemies and raise armies. Philip, so wise in his designs, so cool in the execution of them, could not behold this success without transports. When the news of Philip's death reached Athens, Demosthenes put on a garland and appeared publicly in pomp, though his daughter was but just dead. He did that for the death of Philip, which Philip had done for the political death of Athens; both were mad from the same motive, and both, if either, were excusable alike (35). It is indeed alledged in favour of Philip, that his senses were overcome with wine; but methinks the joy of his victory might intoxicate him sufficiently. He had good sense enough to foresee that he should fight no more battles against Greeks; that this victory would establish the pre-eminence of Macedon, and leave him at liberty to pursue those vast designs he had formed. But if all that has been said will not wipe off the stain of his intemperance on this occasion, his future conduct ought to obliterate it; he buried the Athenians who fell in the battle honourably, and on all occasions afterwards acknowledged them to be the bravest and politest people in Greece. Nay, he was wont to do justice to the merit of Demosthenes, at whom when some of his courtiers were railing, Let the man speak freely, said Philip, since he is not in our pay, though we would gladly give him a larger appointment than to any of our household (36). At another time, speaking of the different kinds of eloquence, Isocrates, said he, fences with a foil, but Demosthenes with a sword (37). 'Tis plain, that if Philip had vices and follies, he had also many good qualities, and much good sense.

He carried his moderation still farther; for he concluded a peace with Athens on their own terms, and leaving a good garrison in Thebes did the rest of the Bæotians no manner of hurt.

THUS Philip of Macedon, with an army of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse, effected what Xerxes with his millions attempted in vain. He attained by one victory the sovereignty of Greece, though it cost the Greeks many to establish its liberty. He did not indeed disturb his countrymen with the rattling of their chains; but when there was a necessity, he did not spare to shew them that he was, and would be, their master. The Athenians in the mean time acted as they were wont, that is, violently and beyond all bounds of reason. They cried up the virtue of Demosthenes to the stars, they inveighed loudly against such as had any share in betraying Greece, they interred those who were slain at Cheronæa at the public expence. Demosthenes published their virtues in a funeral oration, and, if we may be allowed to express our sentiments in a metaphor, they shewed by the solemnity of its interment what a high value they set upon their liberty<sup>w</sup>. The rest of the Greeks did not either so readily perceive, or did not think it prudent so publicly to lament, the change which this expedition had made in their affairs; instead of deploring their servitude, they rejoiced in the lenity of their sovereign, and seemed rather to regard the greatness of Philip as due to his merit, than acquired by his arts and arms.

We are now to behold the king of Macedon in a new light; hitherto we have seen him struggling with his neighbours, courting the Athenians, and practising as the times required with the other states of Greece. He was now lord of all, and the use he made of his power was to convoke a general assembly of the Greeks, wherein he was recognized generalissimo, and with full power appointed their leader against the Persians. Having by virtue of his authority settled a general peace amongst them, and appointed the quota which each of the states should furnish for the war, he dismissed them, and returning into Macedon began to make great preparations for this new expedition; an expedition which, beside the ancient hatred of the Greeks towards the barbarians, occasioned by the injuries received from them, he coloured with a new pretence relating particularly to himself, viz. the assistance given by the Persian to the cities of Perinthus and Byzantium<sup>x</sup>.

FROM the very time that Xerxes invaded Greece, its inhabitants had projected a return of his visit, not in a piratical way, by making descents on his sea-coasts, for that they did immediately after they had driven him back into Asia †; but with a view of making an absolute conquest of his dominions, or at least so much of them as might suit them best; of this we have seen already, that one of the Spartan kings had some thoughts, and actually gave ear to a plan laid before him for that purpose ‡. One of his successors, Agésilas, carried it still farther, and with an inconsiderable army gave law to the lieutenants of the great king. It is true, Agésilas did not openly profess a design of conquering the whole empire, but that he really intended no less may be gathered from his affecting to sacrifice in the same manner with Agamemnon, when he went upon his expedition, and his reply to one who called the Persian emperor, as the Greeks were wont, the great king. In what, said Agésilas, is he greater than I, if he be not braver or better. His sacrificing shewed, that he meant to emulate Agamemnon, who did not harass but subvert Troy, and his apophthegm, that he desired to make himself equal to him who was called the great king ‡. Jason of Thessaly is thought to have been meditating the same thing when his thread of life was abruptly cut off through a domestic conspiracy <sup>b</sup>. Philip seemed to have entered upon this momentous conquest with more probable and auspicious hopes; he was by common consent elected general of Greece, and he had so effectually humbled the Grecians, that he had reason to expect they would obey him; he had besides a numerous, well-disciplin'd, and victorious army, and, which might be justly reckoned his peculiar felicity, able and faithful ministers, brave and experienced officers: At the head of the former stood Antipater, whose character might have taken up a page, if his master had not summed it up in a line; having risen later than usual one morning, he said, rubbing his eyes at his levee, I have slept soundly to day, for I knew Antipater was waking <sup>c</sup>. This was an eulogium worthy of the prince and of his minister; yet Alexander described him better, when it was observed to him, that all his lieutenants except Antipater wore purple; true, said he, but Antipater is all purple within <sup>d</sup>. In short, he was a man of prodigious abilities, but made no display of them. And, as his master rightly depicted him, was alike aspiring in his thoughts, and humble in his manners. Parmenio was of another cast, Philip, the best judge in Greece, had pronounced him the only general he ever met with<sup>c</sup>. Parmenio returned his master's compliment upon another occasion, in a manner which shewed the penetration of a statesman and the frankness of a soldier. The ambassadors of the Grecian states expressed some uneasiness, that Philip came not out earlier in the morning. Be quiet, gentlemen, said Parmenio, for while you slept he was waking. Antipater would have thought this, but only Parmenio would have said it, who as he conceived justly is remarkably famous for speaking freely, which under Philip procured him the highest honours, under Alexander a violent death ; such was the state of things in Greece and in the court of Philip, when he projected the conquest of Asia † (K).

• PLUTARCH. Apophthegm.      † DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xvi.

(K) We have in the text attempted to make some discovery of those motives which induced Philip to undertake the conquest of the Persian empire. It may not, however, be amiss to put the reader in mind, that the Persians, by their foolish attempt to conquer Greece, had first inspired the Greeks with a thirst of conquering them, and by their subsequent proceedings cherished and kept up that desire, either thro' want of foresight, or from a fatal necessity. We do not mean by this any enevitable destiny, but such a necessity as is the constant attendant on imprudence and luxury: When governors, either through want of thought, or which is often the case, from a wrong turn of thought, suffer those of whom they have the care to sink into all the excesses of debauchery, they must not expect from these weak and effeminate men either generous thoughts, or gallant actions. When a people become slaves to their lusts, they are in the fairest train imaginable of becoming slaves to their neighbours. Politicians may for a time indeed ward off the blow ; but how ? Why, by making use of mercenary troops. Thus the cowardly spendthrift pays a bully to fight his quarrels, and when he pays him no longer, is beaten by him himself. This was the fate of the Persians ; they hired Greek troops, maintained them in the exercise of their discipline, made them perfectly acquainted with their country and their manners, suffered them to see and to consider those errors in their government, which made it in spite of its grandeur appear contemptible ; and then those very Greeks on their return home were continually prompting their countrymen to go and pull down that empire whose weight scarce permitted it to stand. If the Persian emperors had always encouraged feuds in Greece, the Greeks could never have turned their arms upon them ; for we see, that till one state subdued the rest, an expedition into Asia might be talked of, but could not be executed. Instead of this,

How great soever he appeared there, how happy soever Diffensions he might be here ; in his family, he was not only uneasy, but in Philip's miserable. His wife Olympias was the daughter of Neoptole- family. mus, brother of Arymbas, king of Epirus, whom Philip raised to a participation in the kingdom ; his son Alexander, by the favour of the same monarch, was raised to the sole possession of the throne to the prejudice of Æacidas the son of Arymbas ; all which testifies how great a share Olympias once had in the affection of her husband. She was a woman of a high spirit, great abilities, a fine address, much cunning, and has been terribly wronged, if she had not more intrigues than that with Jupiter, to which Alexander sought to ascribe his birth<sup>s</sup>. The reader must remember, that Philip in his letter to the Athenians, speaks with great heat of their seizing his herald, taking from him his letters, and reading them in a public assembly, in which if they shewed their disrespect to Philip, they shewed at the same time a high regard to Olympias, to whom they sent a packet of letters taken at the same time without presuming to open them<sup>h</sup>. How this lady embroiled herself with her husband might be somewhat mysterious even in those days ; at present it is impossible to give a very distinct account of it. Whatever it was, the king was so extremely offended with her, that he proceeded to a repudiation, and married Cleopatra the niece of Attalus<sup>i</sup>. This conduct of his, added to some other slights, either real or so conceived, inspired Alexander with a warm dislike of his father ; and as young princes have seldom prudence enough to conceal their this, the necessity I before-mentioned compelled the Persian to compose the quarrels of the Grecians, that they might furnish him with troops. Peace enervated the Greeks, the facility of recruiting their mercenaries made the Persians neglect all martial discipline. In the mean time Philip, blessed with an excellent education, exercised with early troubles, endued with invincible fortitude, and full of restless ambition, raised the nation he governed from an indigent and dependent state to be first the terror of its neighbours, then the mistress of Greece, last of all a match for Persia. On this foundation stands the fame of Philip ; these were the causes of his being in a condition to pass into Asia ; and these the sources of that weakness and inability to resist, which afterwards appeared, in the Persian administration (37) sentiments,

sentiments, he gave evident tokens of it, infomuch, that the whole court knew and observed it. An accident happened which put all things into a flame. At the nuptial feast, Attalus, the young queen's uncle, was so unpolite as to tell the king in the hearing of his son, that his Macedonians hoped he would give them now a lawful heir to the throne. Alexander in the heat of his resentment cried out, What then, rascal, do you take me for a bastard? And, while he spoke, threw a flaggon at his head. Attalus returned the compliment in the same way, and the king, extremely provoked at this disturbance, drew his sword, and, forgetting that he was a cripple, hastily made towards his son; but in his passage fell down, which gave the courtiers time to get between them. Alexander rising up, and forgetting that he to whom he spoke was both his father and his prince, had the assurance to say in quitting the room, The Macedonians are likely to conquer Asia, when led out of Europe by a prince who cannot go from one table to another, without hazarding his neck. He rightly conjectured, that it would not, after this, be proper for him to remain in Macedon, where his father Philip was both revered and beloved; he therefore retired with his mother into Epirus * (L).

[* PLUT. in vit. Alex. ARRIAN. l. iii. c. 6.

(L) Philip's greatest fault was his proneness to feasting and flattery. If we may believe a certain author, he made one of his flatterers, whose name was Thrasidæus, king in Thessaly, merely because he had a happy way of making his compliments. Neoptolemus, the Athenian poet, was at once his favourite and the chief manager of his affairs in that city. At this time of day a poet would be thought a very indifferent agent in politics; but it was quite otherwise at Athens. That writer knew how to manage the people so well, that he gave umbrage to Demosthenes, who failed not to raise a spirit of persecution against him, which constrained the poet to retire to Macedon, where he was extremely well received by Philip, and became the darling of the whole court (38). When his affairs required it, the king was patient, abstemious, and attentive to every thing; when they allowed of relaxation, he made great entertainments, drank hard, and talked very freely with his friends. It would have been well if nothing worse than freedom had mingled in his feasts; but, it is said, they were polluted with every kind of vice, and all the various debaucheries, which the most sensual wits could devise (39); yet it must be allowed, that,

A little after these disturbances at court, Damaratus the Philip re-
Corinthian, who had been Philip's host, and who lived with calls his son familiarity, came to make him a visit. When the first compliments were over, Philip asked him, If all things were quiet in Greece? You have reason, Sir, returned he, to trouble yourself about the peace of Greece; you who have filled your own family with noise and dissention<sup>1</sup>. The king, who, tho' he liked flattery, loved truth, received this reproof as kindly as it was meant, immediately made up the breach between himself and his son, and thereby recalled Alexander to court. It is not clear, whether the king of Epirus engaged heartily in his sister's quarrel or not. In all probability he temporized with Philip, who in a short time after gave him his daughter Cleo- patra in marriage, with an intent, it is likely, to preserve all things in quiet during his absence. It is time now to return to public affairs.

As Philip piqued himself on bearing the character of a reli- Prepares gious prince, he sent deputies to consult the oracle at Delphi for the war as to the success of the Persian war. Pythia returned for an- in Persia.

The king when he received this response, immediately conjectured, that it portended his leading the Persian king as a victim to be offered to the Grecian gods<sup>m</sup>. But when the event shewed that he was mistaken, others held that to be clearly in his graver moments, Philip saw the folly of this, and reflected severely enough on the inequality of his own conduct. He would often say, That he was obliged to Messieurs the speech makers of Athens for pointing out his faults, and thereby giving him an opportunity to amend them (40). Indeed he always heard reproofs, not only with patience, but with pleasure, and shewed, upon every occasion, a strong inclination to reward such as put him upon doing right.

 Once at a public sale of captives, a poor man, approaching the tribunal, whispered in his ear, Sir, it would be more decent if you let your robe fall lower. Here, cried Philip, set me this man at li- berty; I did not know he was my friend (41). The regard we owe to truth obliges us to record these things.

pointed out, which had been utterly unsuspected before (M). Attalus and Parmenio, who with an excellent corps of troops were detached to open the war, had orders given them to set the Grecian cities at liberty ; for how much soever Philip might be esteemed a tyrant at Athens, he affected to pass for a lover of liberty at home, requiring that as a just respect from others, which the Athenians called a slavish submission. Without question the Greek cities, whose inhabitants had so readily libelled him, when Phocion forced him to raise the sieges of Perinthus and Byzantium, were now as ready to load him with panegyrics, since they were entirely at his mercy, the Athenians having it neither in their power nor their will to afford them now any kind of assistance ; on the contrary, Athens herself at this time sought to sooth the victor, and began, with

(M) There is no subject that hath been oftener treated, and remains yet less clear, than this of oracles and their responses. Some, struck with particular instances of the correspondence between their answers and the events which followed them, have been led to confess, that there were in them undeniable marks of supernatural assistance (42). Others, fixing their eyes on the many instances of doubtful, and even false, responses which are recorded in history, have attributed the whole to priestcraft, and have excluded the devil's having any further share in the answers of the oracles, than he may claim as the patron of fraud and the father of lies (43). We do not pretend to unravel in a note a knot twisted by so many volumes ; on the contrary, we shall confine ourselves to the response mentioned in the text, and shall propose to the learned some difficulties which have occurred to us, and which, we cannot think, can be resolved by either of these systems. Philip had been, in a particular manner, the protector of the temple at Delphi ; if therefore any dæmon delighted in the worship offered to him there, why did he not give this royal friend of his a fairer caution ? Or, if the oracle was a mere engine of priestcraft, and, as Demosthenes alledged, had by this time learned to philippize, how came he to give such a response, as particularly enough pointed out, not only Philip's sudden death, but the very manner of it ? It should seem, that a verse might easily have been contrived to have spoke the future success of Philip, without wearing that cloudy aspect, which was evident in the verse delivered. We shall enter no farther into this matter here ; but when we come to speak expressly of the methods in use among the Greeks for penetrating into the mysteries of providence, we shall shew, that Chance was chiefly relied on in these cases, and that the clearness in some instances, the doubtfulness in others, and the falshood in many, resulted intirely from hence, and from nothing else.

the rest of Greece, to philippize, as Demosthenes emphatically called it. Indeed Philip had been very kind to them, giving up the places they so much desired in Eubæa, and removing as far as was consistent with his own safety, whatever might be grievous to them, or afford them apprehensions. They seemed also to be highly pleased with the expedition he was about to take, and sent their deputies to compliment him upon that occasion. The rest of the Grecian states did the same thing; so that Philip had now need of a second monitor. He had already appointed one of his pages to salute him every morning with this sober compliment, Philip, remember thou art a mortal; a caution, which, as we shall see, he forgot long before night, being in himself much addicted to pleasure; tho', when it was necessary, no one was more indefatigable in business. Amongst the rest of his cares, that of making his family easy gave him a good deal of concern. He had not only a young wife, whom he had lately married, but several concubines also, by whom he had children. Alexander was very jealous of these, and Philip no less uneasy at his jealousy; he sought, however, to sooth him; and when the prince would sometimes break out into harsh expressions, Philip would say, Be patient, my son, and let my having other children engage you to act in such a manner, as that the preference I give you may appear the effect of your own merit rather than of my choice (N). To quiet also the relations and friends of Olympias,

(N) It may be justly said, that Philip was a better father than Alexander proved a son. As soon as the young man was capable of instruction in the sciences, Philip put him under the care of Aristotle, from whom, such was that monarch's modesty, he was contented to receive lessons in government himself. The king formed the design of educating his son thus on his very birth. Here is his letter to Aristotle on the occasion, alike concise and inimitable; "You are to know I have a son. I thank the gods for it; not so much for that they have given me one, as that he is born cotemporary with Aristotle. I promise myself, from your care, he will become worthy of succeeding us and of ruling Macedon" (44)". We have given some instances of his care of that young prince's person, of his concern for his reputation at the battle of Cheronæa, and of his desire to infuse into him noble and heroic principles. To these let us add, that tho' Philip, as a politician, had a great opinion of the force of gold, and was wont to say, that no city was impregnable, through the gates of which an ass laden with that metal could pass, tho' he was addicted to the retaining pias, the king of Macedon thought it necessary to celebrate, in a public and splendid manner, the marriage between her brother Alexander and his daughter Cleoptara. He accordingly appointed Ægæ for the place wherein this solemnity should be performed, and also signified, that there, for the last time, he would regale the Greek ambassadors, before he marched into Asia. The concourse on this occasion was prodigious, not only the Macedonians, but all the Græcian states, striving to outvie each other in expressions of zeal and friendship, towards Philip and his government. Amongst the rest the Athenians, always ingenious in flattery, sent him a gold crown, which, when presented by their minister, he also declared, that if any plotter of treason against Philip should, for the future, endeavour to shelter himself in Athens, he should immediately be delivered up. The king was mightily pleased with this, and no less delighted with a dramatic entertainment composed by Neoptolemus the Athenian, a famous tragic poet and highly in Philip's favour. The title of this piece was Cinyras; and it was intended to represent the king as having already triumphed over the Persian, and made himself lord of Asia. The following lines, representing the pride of those antient enemies of Greece, particularly affected Philip, insomuch, that he caused them to be more than once repeated.

*Your tow'ring hopes above heaven's concave stray,
O'er all the globe of earth you seek to sway;
Palace to palace join, and, madly vain,
Think that no bounds should life or lands restrain.*

pensioners in every state, and also lavish of his money to domestic flatterers, yet he checked this humour as soon as he perceived it in his son. He wrote him a letter on the subject, full of excellent philosophy: "How came you, young man, said he, to reason so
" wretchedly with yourself, as to fancy those will serve you
" faithfully, whom daily you corrupt with money? Do " you this, that the Macedonians may hereafter take you not for " their king, but for their steward or pay-master? If you dis" charge these offices well, you must make but a pitiful prince.
" They are spoiled who take gifts, by being taught thereby a ha" bit of taking (45)". Thus, as a father, he endeavoured to eradicate those vices, which he practised and boasted of as a prince. Perhaps he thought them lawful, or at least more excuseable, when done from political motives, than when springing from an idle inclination of wasting and throwing away.

(45) Cicero de Offic. l. ii.

*Alas! that lot, which ye wou'd far remove,
 With hasty step, your constancy shall prove.
 Secure in thought, a stroke doth now impend,
 Which to extended views shall give an end;
 Sudden and sure it falls, nor shall your pow'r defend*.*

The correspondence between the response of the oracle and this prediction of the poet gave Philip an unusual confidence, and spread an air of joy and satisfaction through the greatest part of his court. Some, it is said, there were, who suffered themselves to doubt of these omens; they thought the answer of the oracle equivocal; they held the compliment of the Athenian ambassador portentive of some secret conspiracy; they conceived those lines, which so much moved the king, descriptive, not so much of the Persian state, as of his own. Whether these conjectures were made before the king's death is a little uncertain; if they were, certain it is, that they were well grounded; for a plot there was against the king's life, a plot as dark in its circumstances as in its nature. We are indebted to Diodorus for the fullest account of it; and from him therefore we shall take it (O).

(O) We have different accounts of the manner in which Pausanias was injured. Some say, that Attalus himself abused him at a feast, and afterwards prostituted him to the rest of the guests (46). However it was, Attalus without question was much to blame, and so also was Philip, in not doing justice upon the complaint of Pausanias. On another occasion he shewed himself remiss in the same way, and was recalled to his duty by the quick answer of a poor woman. She had offered him a petition several times, and as often had been told, that he had not leisure to hear her. At last stung with this ill usage, she could not forbear replying, If you have not leisure to do justice, be no longer a king. The propriety of this reproof was at that time so visible to Philip, that he immediately heard her complaint, and redressed it. Happy had it been for this monarch, if the good woman's logic had made a deeper impression on his heart. Certain it is, that a politician could not have made a nicer distinction than this, that a denial of justice is an abdication of magistracy (46). At other times Philip was more strict, and would not sacrifice his duty to his passions. His courtiers once pressed him vehemently to interpose in favour of a man who was

THERE were in the court of Macedon two young men of quality of the same name, viz. Pausanias. One of these was in great favour with the king, who treated him with such indulgence and familiarity, that it began to be suspected the king's inclination for him transgressed both the bounds of reason and of nature. This had reached the ear of the other Pausanias, who, having frequent quarrels with the favourite, was wont, by way of reproach, to call him either sex. The lad, stung with this terrible outrage, addressed himself to Attalus one of the king's friends, and whose niece Cleopatra he afterwards married, shewing him how he had been insulted, and wishing for some opportunity to wipe off the stain. Some time after this, in a general engagement against the Illyrians, this Pausanias fighting near the king, and perceiving that the enemy directed against him a shower of arrows, threw himself before his master, and received them into his own body, falling immediately afterwards dead upon the spot. The extraordinary courage of the youth, his fidelity, and the manner of his death, made him much spoken of. Attalus thought fit to inform the king of the cause from whence the young man grew desperate; he also took it into his head to revenge him upon the other Pausanias; which he did in a manner alike cruel and detestable. He invited him to an entertainment, and having taken care to drink him down, he exposed him, when void of sense, to the lust of his grooms, who abused him according to their beastly appetites. Pausanias, who was an Orestian by birth, and had all the haughtiness natural to his countrymen, applied himself frequently to the king, passionately demanding justice against Attalus. That monarch, always partial to his friends, and especially to the uncle of his young wife, put him off with good words; and, in order to make him forget his disgrace, made him captain of his guards. Herein he greatly mistook the temper of Pausanias, who was not to be wrought upon by such methods. Instead of growing easier he became more impatient, and, from hating At- on the point of being condemned; and they gave this reason for it, because, if judgment went against him, all the world would decry him. Very well, said Philip, I had rather the world should decry him than me (47). Attalus, it seems, had a better interest than this man; but his interest cost Philip dear. His death however, ought to be a lesson to princes, and teach them, that injustice begets injustice; which therefore they should be afraid to commit, because it is the only means by which themselves can suffer.

Attalus, began more grievously to hate the king. It happened, while he was in this sullen disposition, that conversing one day with Hermocrates the sophist, he put to him this question, What must he do who would be famous? He must, replied Hermocrates, kill him who has done the greatest things; for when the fame of him whom he slew shall make him often remembered, that remembrance will of course lead to the mention of him who slew him. Pausanias, after meditating some time longer on his own wrongs and the sophist's advice, came at last to a resolution of killing the king, in hopes thereby of restoring that reputation which Attalus had taken away from him; a strange resolution this! and a strong testimony of the weakness of human reason, both in the sage and in his disciple! A bad resolution is always easier executed than amended. Pausanias, having directed horses to be placed for him at the gates of the city, contrived within himself how to dispatch Philip, and afterwards how to preserve himself. These things busied his mind, while the king was taken up with the solemnities of which we have before given an account. We come now to the accomplishment of Pausanias's plot, and the last scene of the king's life<sup>n</sup>.

THE next day, after the open audience of the ambassadors of Greece, Philip went in state to the theatre, where certain shews were to be exhibited in honour of his daughter's marriage. All the seats were early taken up, and the shews began with a splendid procession, wherein the images of the twelve superior deities of Greece were carried, as also the image of Philip, habited in like manner, as if he now made up the thirteenth. At this the people, who, as the humour takes them, readily make a man either a god or a devil, shouted aloud. Then came Philip alone, in a white robe, crowned, his guards at a considerable distance, that the Greeks might see he placed his safety not in them, but in the loyalty of the people. Pausanias had fixed himself by the door of the theatre, and, observing that all things fell out as he had foreseen they would, took his opportunity, when the king drew near him, to draw his sword from under his garment, and plunging it into his left side, laid him dead at his feet. He then fled as fast as his feet could carry him to the place where his horses were, and had escaped, if the twig of a vine had not caught his shoe, and thrown him down. This gave Attalus, Perdiccas, and Leonatus, who pursued him time to come up with him. Perdiccas threw himself on the assassin first, and wounded him with his sword, and then the rest quickly put an end to his life °. Thus fell this great prince by the hand of his own subject, not without strong suspicions, that Olympias and Alexander were not altogether ignorant of his death, being about forty seven years of age, and having reigned twenty four (P).

(P) The deaths of kings, especially when violent, are usually attended with mysterious circumstances. From the account given above, it seems, as if Pausanias had, out of a mad pique, murdered his sovereign, without consulting any but his passions, and the sophist Hermocrates indirectly; yet, as we have hinted above, suspicions have not been wanting, that tho' the arm of Pausanias dispatched Philip, yet it received its direction from other minds than his own. If this had been only a flying rumour, or the suggestion of a single or suspicious historian, it would not have deserved a place here; but the fact is otherwise, and we shall shew from indubitable authorities, that Philip lost his life by a conspiracy, and not merely from the malice of Pausanias. Ptolemy the son of Lagus, judged to be in truth the son of Philip, who was the bosom confident of Alexander, and afterwards king of Egypt, wrote the history of Alexander's reign. From this history Arrian chiefly took his; and in his history we have a letter from Alexander to Darius, wherein the former, setting forth the causes of the war, hath these remarkable words; My father was slain by traitors, whom you had hired for that purpose, as you have publicly boasted in your letters (48). The fact is now clearly established, that a conspiracy there was, which wrought the death of Philip. We can also name some of the conspirators, viz. the sons of Eropus the Lyncesthean, Alexander, Amyntas, Hieromenes, and Arrabæus (49). Of these Amyntas fled to Darius, and actually fought against Alexander at the battle of Iffus. As to the suspicion which fell on Alexander, it seems to have taken rise from two causes; the first, his embroiling himself with his father on account of his mother Olympias, which we have heretofore mentioned. This quarrel, it seems, went so far, that several persons of distinction, who were deep in Alexander's interest, were forced to quit Macedon, and durst not return till after the death of Philip: particularly Harpalus Ptolemy the son of Lagus, Nearchus, and Erigyus and Laomedon brothers (50); all of whom were in high favour with Alexander afterwards. The second cause of sus-

WE ought now, according to the established method of His cha- historians, to enter into the character of this monarch, whose *ra*cter. actions and whose death we have recorded ; but we have already taken so many opportunities of illustrating the recital of events during his reign, by manifesting their motives and consequences, not from conjecture, or to gratify a partiality which too frequently grows on writers, in favour of those of whom they write, but to render the narration clear ; that on this account therefore we have the less to say here, and shall content ourselves with a very short portrait of this glorious prince, of whom it may be reckoned his peculiar felicity, that he has been always most admired by the most knowing. Philip of Macedon then was in the cabinet by very much the most sagacious prince of his time. He had a perfect idea of the state of his own country, the condition of Greece, and the weakness of the Persian empire. He was secret, without affecting closeness ; eloquent, without either being ready to speak or vain of speaking ; obliging in his deportment as a king, and yet never departing from the king in any act of complaisance. In the field he was in all things a complete general, an expert engineer, an indefatigable soldier. He studied war as an art, and acted as coolly in an engagement, as if he had been only attending to a praxis on the lessons he picion resulted from Alexander's behaviour after his father's death ; for notwithstanding Amyntas the son of Æropus fled into Asia, and it was known that himself and his brethren were in the conspiracy against the king, yet he not only pardoned Alexander one of the brothers, on the slight pretence that he was the first who saluted him king, but made him afterwards general of his horse ; which had well nigh proved fatal to him ; for, as we shall see hereafter, Alexander conspired against him too, and sought to deprive him at once both of life and kingdom. There is one circumstance more that deserves mention on this subject ; and it is this. Alexander, when he visited the temple of Jupiter Ammon, inquired of the oracle, if all his father's murderers had been punished (51) ? To which the oracle answered in the affirmative ; but as every body knows there was no credit given to what passed at this interview, this question recoils upon him who put it ; the rather, because if the oracle really made that answer, it was certainly false, Alexander the son of Æropus, who was a confederate in that business, being at that time alive. There is this however, to be said for the oracle, that Alexander alone consulted it, and in justification of his own character, might report what answer he pleaded (52).

had given his soldiers. His discipline was strict, but without severity, which he effected by treating all who served under him with familiarity ; whereby he convinced them of the necessity of order, which he exacted not more for his own service than for their safety. He was not so much the commander in the camp, as the father of those who were in it, the meanest of whom he treated upon all occasions with the endearing titles of comrade and fellow-soldier. If a private man distinguished himself, Philip personally praised and rewarded him ; if he grew old ; he provided for him ; if he fell in the field he was interred with honour, and his family taken care of. In private life there was no man more affable, chearful, or kinder to his friends than Philip. He was himself learned, and a great patron and lover of learning. He esteemed wit in an enemy, and rewarded it amply in those who professed their respect for him. With these shining qualities he had some very dark ones. His ambition had no bounds ; his treaties always gave way to his interest. He was the most finished dissembler of his time ; he treated such as opposed his designs with great severity, when they fell into his hands. He was greatly addicted to women ; and yet was suspected of a lust too foul to name. He would drink immoderately, took delight in flattery, was surrounded with pimps, panders, buffoons, pantomimes, and all that rabble of parasitical vulturs, which gnaw the bowels of the people through the folly of their prince. To sum up all, he was a great man, but had great vices ( Q ).

(Q) Throughout the whole of this life and reign of Philip, we have followed no direct guide, tho' such an one we might have had in Theopompus, who wrote fifty books upon this subject, all of which have been swallowed up by time. Some fragments indeed there are remaining, preserved by such authors as were happy enough to have perused his accurate work. It may seem strange, that Plutarch, who was so industrious in preserving the stories, and vindicating the characters, of the Grecian heroes, should altogether neglect Philip's ; but for this an excellent French critic has accounted thus : “ I doubt, whether Alexander can be compared to “ Cæsar, notwithstanding that comparison has been generally receiv“ ed, or universally maintained. Neither the unanimous agree“ ment of the antients and moderns upon this subject, nor my “ unwillingness to be singular in an opinion, can hinder me from “ thinking, that this comparison is built upon a wrong principle.
 “ I believe there will appear a greater resemblance between Philip
 “ and Cæsar, at least if we ground it upon their manners and cha“ racters,

BEFORE we conclude this chapter, it will be necessary to And progeny. speak of the offspring of Philip. By Olympias he had Alexander his successor, and Cleopatra, who married her uncle Alexander king of Epirus. By an Illyrian lady, whose name was Audaca, he had a daughter named Cyna, who was married to Amyntas the lawful heir of the Macedonian crown, being the son of Perdiccas Philip's elder brother. By Nicasipolis, a Thessalian lady, he had Nicæa who became afterwards the wife of Cassander. By Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus, he had a son named Caranus and a daughter Europa, both slain by Olympias, the last in her mother's arms. Arfinoe one of his mistresses he gave in marriage to Lagus, when she was big with child; which child proved a son, and was the famous Ptolemy king of Egypt. By Philena of Larissa, a dancer, he had Aridæus, who for a while was titular king of Macedon; but afterwards put to death by the cruel Olym-

“raeters, rather than their successes. Philip perhaps had no place “in the lives of Plutarch, because that historian, pre-possessed “in favour of his own nation, wanted the conqueror of Asia to “oppose to him of Rome; and foresaw very well, that, in the “eyes of the multitude, the most illustrious of the Romans, mas“ter of an empire that laboured under its own weight, would “be too great a match for a Macedonian, who acted in a narrow “sphere, and whose conquests had no other theatre than the ad“jacent parts of a petty kingdom. At first glance indeed there “seems a resemblance in every thing between Cæsar and Alexan- “der; the extent of their conquests, their valour, activity, vi“gilance, and that sublimity of soul, which made them sensible “that they deserved to command the rest of mankind, together “with an imperious passion that would let them endure no supe“rior; but made them look on the world as their inheritance.
 “But when we come to examine them at leisure, trace them from “their cradles, study their inclinations, observe their proceedings
 “and their progresses, we shall find this resemblance to diminish “or fall to nothing (52)”. However, Plutarch in other treatises, Diodorus Siculus in his most learned, comprehensive, and excellent work Pausanias in his survey of Greece, Polyænus in his stratagems, with many other Greek writers and not a few of the Latins, have recorded enough to shew, that Philip was indeed the greatest man of his age. And with respect to his son, Cicero has given such a judgment, as, we believe, none of the critics will reverse. Phi- lip of Macedon, says he, in deeds and glory was surpassed by his son; but, in point of disposition and humanity, he seems to me to have surpassed him (53).

pias <sup>P</sup> (R). If Philip had not fallen so suddenly, he would certainly have provided for the safety of these unhappy branches of his family ; whereas, by his unforeseen death, they fell under the power of their greatest enemies ; yet did they not immediately perish, the veneration the Macedonians had for Philip defending them. But by degrees, when the glory of Alexander had in some measure swallowed up that of his father, and again the miseries, which the Macedonians endured, had withdrawn their affection from the royal house, they fell apace, as will be seen in the subsequent part of this history ; whence the propriety of treating so fully of the life and actions of Philip, as we have done, will clearly appear.

The reign of ALEXANDER the Great.

THE new-erected empire of Macedon, so formidable to the Greeks and so dreadful to the Persians, did not change its fortune with its prince ; on the contrary, it seemed to reap new advantages therefrom, and to derive from the vigour of Alexander that exalted grandeur, of which it was rendered capable thro' the policy of Philip. How this came to pass, how so violent a shock went off without disordering the government ; how a prince of twenty years old became truly the father of his country ; how he so readily took up, and so happily conducted the thread of his father's design, without weakening or breaking it ; and all this in spite of violent

(R) Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus, is by Arrian called Eurydice (54). There are also some variations, in respect to the rest of the proper names, to be met with in antient authors ; but these, as they occur in the subsequent part of our work, we shall take notice of, without troubling the reader with a long critical detail here. However, it may not be amiss to take notice of some other princes of the blood of Macedon. Amyntas was the son of Perdiccas, the son of Amyntas, Philip's father. Archælaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, were the natural sons of the same Amyntas king of Macedon, by his concubine Cygnæa. There were besides several sons of Æropus, brethren of Pausanias, from whom Amyntas the father of Philip took the kingdom (55). We do not find, that Philip, in his life-time, either was uneasy, or had any occasion to be uneasy,

A MAP of the EXTENT of ALEXANDER'S CONQUESTS

According to M. Delisle Geographer to Lewis is Compared with those of other Modern Geographers Anno 1731.

violent and obstinate opposition, leads us to the view of Alexander's character at this time, on which the understanding these passages intirely depends. This we shall draw from sober and authentic historians, leaving whatever favours of the wonderful to those rhetorical declaimers, who love to amaze their readers, and to illustrate with a pomp of words stories altogether incredible<sup>a</sup>.

THE natural capacity of the Macedonian prince was every way suited to sustain the mighty fabric, which his father intended to raise thereon. It was lively, but not slight; solid, without being intractable, and tho' capable of judging by its own lights, inquisitive and fond of conversation. When the Persian ambassadors were at the court of Philip, Alexander, then a perfect boy, entertained them with much civility and politeness; but, instead of asking questions about the hanging gardens, the splendid palaces, the vast retinue of the king, or other marks of grandeur, for which the Persian court was famous, he inquired about the road leading into the Upper Asia, the forces which the great king could raise, their discipline, and the place in which the king took post when his army drew into the line of battle<sup>b</sup>. This admirable genius was cultivated by an excellent education. Philip was a lover of letters, as some think, to a fault; but this hindered not his regarding other things necessary, as well as learning, to the forming of a prince. Alexander had therefore all sorts of easy, about these princes; but we shall see, that it fared otherwise with his successor. The truth is, Philip was so kind to his people, and put them into so different a state from that in which he found them, that they could not avoid loving and admiring him. Whoever would see this placed in the strongest light, need only turn his eyes on a speech of Alexander's recorded by Arrian. It was otherwise with this son of his, who, great and glorious as he was, found it enough to do to keep the Macedonians and Greeks in obedience. In the very dawn of his reign he was vexed with conspiracies, and was never out of the fear of them during his life, though he did not spare very rigorous and cruel executions; a fault with which none can charge his father, whose conduct was so full of clemency, that he was accountable for no man's death except his own masters, according as his years and improvements required them. Leonidas, who was his mother's relation, a man of severe morals, and of a very exact behaviour, was his governor; Lyfimachus the Acaranian, a man of very moderate abilities, his preceptor; and Aristotle, when he was grown old enough to receive his instructions, became not only his tutor in respect of literature, but his master also in respect of politics, which gave that wonderful perfection to his acquirements, which remain as unequalled as his conquests. In his exercises he distinguished the useful from the fanciful, in his diversions he declined whatever was unmanly, and in his studies despised alike whatever was trifling or pedantic. He diligently cultivated what may be stiled the art of speaking with dignity, or the rhetoric of kings, in which none ever exceeded him. He applied himself to metaphysics and natural philosophy; but morality especially pleased him, and the knowledge of the duties which are essential to social life. In order to understand these he studied Homer, Aristotle having corrected an edition of that poet's works for his use. This study made him the man he was; nor can any thing more truly speak his character than this short sentence, Alexander was a hero formed on the principles Homer hath laid down. Taking this as a key, we may easily decypher the actions of this prince, or rather trace them to their source; but we must have a care of thinking, that the sublimity of the verse, the beauty of the composition, the surprizing majesty of the poet's thoughts, captivated the mind of Alexander, and inclined him to doat upon this poem. On the contrary, his extraordinary regard for it was owing to the recommendation of Aristotle, who taught him the true merit of the piece. Homer's poems in such hands were a complete body of divinity, morality, and politics, delivered not in dry discourses, but set forth in strong, moving, and most natural characters; and so they were afterwards considered by the learned, particularly by Horace, who prefers them to the labours of all the philosophers. Such were the foundations of Alexander's magnanimity and prudence. They were continually strengthened by the conversation of the ablest men in Philip's court, and the superstructure carefully and quickly raised by a happy mixture of theory and practice. The turbulent transactions in the midst of Philip's reign served as a school of war to Alexander, as the last years of peace afforded an opportunity of teaching him true policy and the interests of Greece. Above all he was happy in the indulgence of a father, the greatest statesman and the greatest captain of his age. He it was, who cast his eyes on Aristotle for the tutor of Alexander; he it was who taught the youth to execute what the philosopher laid down; and he it was who excited the Macedonians to turn their eyes on this rising sun, whom, in Philip's life-time, they began to stile their king, allowing his father only the title of their general. Philip himself carried the compliment still higher; for, embracing Alexander, who shewed more skill than all the grooms in Greece in breaking Bucephalus, O! my son, (said he) look thee out some kingdom as extensive as thy abilities; Macedonia will be too narrow for them. From a person thus accomplished all things were to be hoped; we may now therefore proceed to shew how he accomplished all things, and gave laws to Greece, at a time of life when modern princes are scarce held of age to govern themselves<sup>d</sup> (A).

THE first act of Alexander, as a king, was doing justice on his father's murderers, it may be from a double motive, of shewing affection to Philip's memory, which he always honoured, and to wipe away the imputation of being concerned in it, which was not easily done, if we credit Plutarch. Next he turned his attention to matters of state, which in a moment were all in confusion. As soon as the

(A) If we were to record exactly every incident relating to the childhood and infancy of Alexander, it would undoubtedly swell our work excessively; we have therefore chosen as the more useful, and at the same time the conciser method, to throw together such circumstances as may serve to elucidate his character, and to refer the curious and inquisitive reader, for further information, to the life of Alexander written by Plutarch, and to the two orations of the same author, which treat of the virtue and fortune of Alexander the Great. As to the rest of the writers, who have transmitted to us the history of Alexander, they are such as either have written expressly of his actions, as Diodorus, Arrian, and Curtius; or they speak accidentally of particular actions of his, as Strabo, Polyænus, Pausanias, and many others. We shall make use of them all, preferring, however, Arrian, not only on account of his great impartiality, but also because his history is collected from those of Aristobulus and Ptolemy, which, of the many accounts of Alexander's expeditions once extant, were always preferred to the rest. But inasmuch as Arrian is sometimes very concise, and many circumstances, relating to the facts he speaks of, are preserved in other authors, we shall make use of their writings to supply what he has omitted, without pretending to set their authority on the same level with his.

neighbouring nations heard of the death of Philip, they conceived themselves intitled to liberty, and began to think of disclaiming the authority of Macedon. In Greece its respective states longed to throw off the yoke; and at Athens Demosthenes, by his example, drew the people into open testimonies of excessive joy, and into immediate negotiations against Alexander, whom he stiled a giddy boy, unfit for and unbecoming empire. As for the Persians, before the death of Philip they were contriving to transfer the war to Macedon; but now, as if all danger had died with that monarch, they thought nothing of his successor, till his fame grew so loud they were unable to think of any thing else. Attalus, who, with Parmenio, had the joint command of the Macedonian army on the frontiers of Asia, aspired to the crown, and sought to debauch the soldiers. Thus was the morning of Alexander's reign disturbed with the noise of foreign wars, and at the same time overcast with the gloom of domestic treasons<sup>e</sup>.

IN the councils held on this distracted state of things, it was judged adviseable, by Alexander's best friends, that dissimulation should take place of force, and that he should cajole those whom he could not subdue. Alexander disliked this; he thought vigorous measures at first would check some present, and prevent many future inconveniencies; wherefore he betook himself to arms, and boldly looked every danger in the face<sup>f</sup>. First he marched southwards into Thessaly with a numerous army, yet without committing any act of hostility. The princes assembling, he made a long and eloquent oration, wherein alledging their common descent from Hercules, the kindness between their ancestors, and the victories they had won together, he so strongly charmed them to his interests, that, as the son and successor of Philip, they declared him general of Greece. The neighbouring states he drew over in the same manner, partly by awing them with his army, partly by the charms of his eloquence; for being perfectly versed in their interests, he spoke home and warmly to their passions. Having restored tranquillity on this side, and procured the title of generalissimo of Greece to be conferred on him, he returned to Macedon. Heccateus, a person in whom he confided, was dispatched with recruits for the Asiatic army, with orders to seize Attalus, if it was practicable, or, if not, to dispatch him. As for that ambitious general, perceiving the presence of Parmenio, and the same of Alexander with-held the soldiery from following his purposes, he suddenly changed them, and sent to Alexander an epistle of Demosthenes, and professed himself wonderfully loyal; which professions, whether true or false, had no weight with the king, whose instructions Heccateus followed in putting Attalus to death<sup>a</sup>. Thus the dawn of his government began to clear, and the first rays of his glory to display a pleasant prospect, which afterwards appeared brighter and brighter, till it overspread the noblest countries on the globe.

AT the approach of the spring, Alexander marched with his forces towards Thrace, intending to penetrate into the country of the Triballians and Illyrians, now called Bulgaria and Sclavonia. In this expedition he followed rather his own sentiments, than the counsels of others, acting regularly on the principle he had laid down, that the power of Macedon was to be supported by the same vigorous measures by which it had been attained. In consequence of this resolution he ordered his army to assemble at Amphipolis, from whence he marched towards the river Nessus, and, leaving the city of Philippi and mount Orbelus on the left, he in ten days reached mount Hæmus<sup>b</sup>. This post the barbarous nations, against whom he made war, had seized and fortified, in the best manner they were able. On the tops of the cliffs, and at the head of every passage they placed their carriages and waggons, so as to form a sort of parapet, with their shafts inwards, that when the Macedonians should have half ascended the rock, they might be able to push the heaviest of these wains upon them. They reckoned the more upon this contrivance, because of the close order of the phalanx, which, they conceived, would be terribly exposed, by the soldiers wanting room to stir, and thereby avoid the falling waggons. But Alexander, who had studied the art of war under the ablest masters, defeated their design; for, having directed his heavy armed troops to march, he gave orders, that, where the openness of the way would permit it, they should open to the right and left, and suffer the falling carriages to go through; but that, in the narrow passes, they should throw themselves on their faces with their shields behind them, that the carts might run over them. His contrivance had the desired effect, and the Macedonians reached the enemy's works without the loss of a man. Then the light-armed troops began the attack. The barbarians made an obstinate resistance for some time, till Alexander himself charged at the head of the targeteers. Then they began to break, and on the approach of the phalanx fled out-right, leaving their camp, full of women, children, and cattle behind them. Three days after the king reached the river Ister, in an island of which, called Peuce, the Triballians, Thracians, and other barbarous nations, had conveyed their wealth and women, resolving to defend them with all their force. Some few ships there were, which, through the Euxine sea, had come to Byzantium; on board of these Alexander embarked as many of his troops as he could, and endeavoured to make a descent with them on the island before-mentioned; but the river being rapid, the shore steep, and the enemy pressing thither in great multitudes, he relinquished this design, and landed his forces at their old camp. Alexander observing, that the Getæ, who inhabited on the other side the river, were inclined to give him all the trouble they could, and had for that purpose, raised an army of four thousand horse and ten thousand foot, determined to be before-hand with them, and by subduing them strike a terror into all their neighbours; the same night therefore he caused a considerable number of boats to be got together, and having ranged them from one side of the river to the other, he re-embarked his forces on board his small fleet, which made a line a little higher. He then caused the tents, which, as they were made of skins, floated in the water, and yet afforded firm footing, to be thrown into the middle space; whereby he passed over fifteen hundred horse and four thousand foot. He then marched through the standing corn, the spears of the phalanx being reversed, and the horse behind them, till they arrived in the open country; and then gave the command of the left wing, consisting of the foot, to Nicanor, drawing up his horse on the right, under his own command, with intent to give the Getæ battle. These, tho' a brave and bold people, were so astonished at his passing the river, without either a bridge or a fleet, that they did not sustain even the first shock; but fled immediately to the next town, which they intended to defend; but when they saw that Alexander did not follow them impetuously, but drew his foot slowly along the side of the river, to prevent his falling into any ambuscade, they conceived that no place would protect them against such a general; and therefore abandoning the town, they placed all hopes of safety in the distance of their flight. Alexander entered the city, and having collected the spoil, delivered it to Nichagor and Philip, officers of great rank in his army, that it might be conveyed to the sea, and then razed the place. Here he sacrificed to Jupiter Soter, i. e. the Saviour, to Hercules, and to the Ister, for affording him a safe passage<sup>1</sup>.

The next day he brought all his forces into his camp on the other side of the river, whither immediately ambassadors came from all the neighbouring nations to make peace with him; amongst the rest from Syrmus king of the Triballi, who saw that it was to no purpose to resist him; as also from the Celtes, a robust and high-spirited people. The king treated them all with great civility; but, as he was always inclined to indulge his vanity, he could not help asking the deputies from the last mentioned nation, What, of all things, they feared most? supposing they would have answered, his arms; but they very roundly told him, That, except the falling of the clouds upon their heads, they feared nothing; which so pleased the king, that, after saying the Celtes were a haughty people, he granted them his friendship, and ranked them in the number of his allies. Soon after he adjusted his differences with the rest of the neighbouring nations, and then prepared for his return into Macedonia *.

As he passed through the countries of the Agrians and the Peonians, he was informed, that Clytus, the son of Bradilis, had revolted from him. This Bradilis had been king of Illyria; and his son, it seems, had a mind to remain no longer a dependent on the king of Macedon: He therefore entered into a league with Glaucias king of the Taulantii, and into a treaty with the Autariatae, to defend themselves against Alexander, whom they looked upon as their common enemy. The king immediately resolved to attack these enemies, and began to enquire of the force and situation of the last-mentioned people. Langarus king of the Agrians being near him said aloud, Sir, trouble not yourself about these people; I, with my own subjects, will make an inroad into their country and find them so much employment, that they shall be able to give no interruption to your march. This accordingly he performed to so good purpose, that he put it absolutely out of the power of this nation to proceed in their defection. Alexander on his return to the camp, received him with great honour, and promised him his sister Cyna for a wife; but that promise did not take place, king Langarus dying soon after. The king being come into the neighbourhood of Pellion, a strong city into which Clytus had thrown himself with a great body of troops, resolved to besiege him therein; and accordingly caused the place to be invested; but Glaucias king of the Taulantii, coming with a great army to the relief of Clytus, the king was obliged to raise his siege, and to give them battle, wherein, after a stout resistance, he was victorious. Three days after Alexander surprized Glaucias and Clytus in their camp, and after making a great slaughter of their troops, forced them to fly for shelter to the mountains <sup>1</sup>.

He makes a very quick march into Greece.

IN the midst of these victories, Alexander received advice, that all Greece was in commotion. This was occasioned chiefly through the indefatigable zeal of Demosthenes, the inveterate enemy of Macedon; and the several disaffected states were encouraged to shew their inclinations more openly, by a report confidently spread about, that Alexander was dead in Illyria. The Thebans laying violent hands on Amyntas and Timolaus, eminent officers in the Macedonian garison which held their citadel, dragged them to the market-place, and, without any form of process, put them to death. They then disposed all things for the siege of the citadel, and openly excited the rest of Greece to throw off the yoke. The king, as soon as he had intelligence of this, immediately bent his march towards them, with such diligence, that in seven days he arrived at Pellene in Theffaly, and in six more entered Bæotia, before the Thebans had any intelligence of his passing Thermopylae. When they were informed of this, they said it must be Antipater with a body of Macedonian militia; nay, when repeated advices acquainted them, that the army was commanded by Alexander, they would still have him dead, persuading themselves, that this was Alexander the son of Æropus. The king however, did not leave them long in their mistake, advancing briskly to the temple of Iolaus, where he made a halt, that the Thebans might have time to return to their senses, and thereby prevent his having recourse to extremities; for it was no-way his inclination, as indeed it was no-way his interest, to embroil himself with the Greeks; he therefore endeavoured, by the terror of his presence, having with him thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, to compel his enemies to lay aside their malice, rather than to gratify his own <sup>m</sup>. This sudden march had in part the success he wished; for it prevented the rest of the Grecian states from aiding the Thebans, tho' they were actually assembling forces for that purpose; and so affrighted the Athenians, that, repairing their walls and filling their magazines, they provided, not for their neighbours, but for their own defence, answering exactly what Alexander had said when he entered Bæotia, that to this Demosthenes, who called him a child when he was in Illyria, and a youth when he came into Theffaly, he should certainly appear a man when he approached the walls of Athens <sup>n</sup>. The Thebans, far from profiting by Alexander's

moderation, attacked his outguards ; and tho' their troops were repulsed with great disadvantage, yet they determined to hazard all rather than purchase peace by their submission. The king seeing this encamped over-against the gate leading to Attica, that he might be near the citadel, which they had surrounded with a double wall, in order to prevent their cutting his garison to pieces before his face. He did not, however, invest the city, or pretend to besiege it ; but caused open proclamation to be made, that he was ready to receive any Thebans who would join with him in defence of the common liberties of Greece. Whereupon the Thebans made proclamation, that they were ready to receive any who would join themselves to the great king and them, to fight against the tyrant of Greece. This exceedingly provoked Alexander ; however, if we may believe Ptolemy, he gave no orders for an attack : But Perdiccas, who lay nearest the walls, perceiving some advantage, suddenly attempted them, and, being seconded by Amyntas, broke into the city. Alexander, seeing his friends engaged, was constrained to support them ; and thus the Thebans were driven to the temple of Hercules. There the citizens recovered their consternation, and having desperately wounded Perdiccas, fell upon the Macedonians with such resolution, that they drove them with great slaughter out of the city ; which Alexander perceiving, he, with a fresh body of troops, attacked the Thebans in flank, routed them, entered the city pell-mell with the flying garison, and, after a prodigious slaughter, took the place by storm. The Macedonian garison, issuing from the citadel, contributed not a little to this event ; which, however glorious to the king, was extremely fatal to the Thebans, who for several hours were slain and destroyed, without regard either to sex or age. Afterwards the city was razed, excepting only the house of Pindar, a famous poet out of respect to the merit of its owner, and for that he had celebrated Alexander the first king of Macedon ; a circumstance which might well weigh with his successor<sup>o</sup>. The lands, except such as were destined to religious uses, were shared among the soldiers, and the prisoners sold for slaves ; whereby four hundred and forty talents were brought into the king's treasury. The king, however, took care to colour this extraordinary severity, by procuring a decree of the Amphictyons, enjoining him to do what he was already inclined to, under pretence, that the Thebans, in allying themselves with the great king, were become enemies to the Greeks ; wherefore the decree was clothed with an express prohibition to any Greek, either to conceal or protect a Theban: Yet it must be owned, that these generous Thebans fought solely for liberty, refusing quarter, and provoking the Macedonians, during the sack of the place, to take away their lives, esteeming them not only worthless, but burdensome, when held at the will of a master. To carry on the same shew of zeal for the freedom of Greece, Alexander ordered the cities of Orchemenus and Platæa to be rebuilt, giving special directions for adorning the latter, out of regard to the generous conduct of its inhabitants, when Pausanias fought in its neighbourhood that decisive battle, which destroyed the Persian hopes. This behaviour of Alexander struck all the Greek states with terror; the Eleans restored their exiles because they were his friends; the cities of Ætolia deprecated his wrath by a most submissive embassy; as for the Athenians, they were terrified to such a degree, that they made themselves ridiculous; for they sent to compliment the king on his safe return from his expedition against the barbarians, and also to assure him of their great satisfaction in his chastising the rebellious Thebans <sup>P</sup>. Alexander took all in good part; only he demanded by letter, that Demosthenes, Lycurgus, Hyperdes, Polyeuctus, Charetes, Charidemus, Ephialtes, Diotimus, and Merocles should be delivered up to him, alledging, that they were the authors of all the mischiefs which had happened in Greece, since his father Philip had been elected general. The Athenians, however, did not comply with his request, tho' Phocion advised them to do it. This was owing to the art of Demades the orator, who having first procured a vote in favour of the persons demanded, drew up afterwards such a decree as might pacify Alexander; the purport of which was, that the orators should submit themselves to the laws of their country, and that the Athenians undertook to punish them, if they appeared to be guilty. Demades himself went at the head of the deputies who presented this decree to Alexander, and who were charged also with other requests, viz. that, notwithstanding the decree, they might be permitted to receive the Theban fugitives; and that the king would for the future regard them as his faithful allies. Alexander, affecting to shew an extraordinary esteem for the Athenians, granted all their requests, excepting that he commanded the orator Charidemus to banish himself; upon which he instantly fled to Darius. He used Demades with the utmost civility, and commanded him to assure his citizens, that they had nothing to fear<sup>9</sup>. The reader, who remembers, that in the history of Athens, we have given a different account of this matter<sup>r</sup>, must not conceive, that this variation happened through carelessness or mistake; we have the authority of antient authors for both relations, and the reader, by considering the citations, will easily discern why we inserted that in the Athenian, this in the Macedonian, history. All authors agree, that the king was sorry for, and greatly regretted, the mischiefs done at Thebes; insomuch, that Plutarch informs us, he never afterwards denied any request a Theban made<sup>c</sup>. To speak the truth, there is no part of Alexander's character better established than this, that as he was violent in his passions, so he was steady in repentance (B).

(B) It is an observation very justly made, in respect of the antient historians, that they seldom mention any great event, without introducing it by omens and prognostics. With respect to this critics are apt to judge according to their own prepossessions; if they have themselves any opinion of these things, then the antients are in the right; if not, they are in the wrong, or at least disbelieve these stories tho' they recorded them; which judgment, by the way, is really more injurious to their memories than the other; for to say, that a man writes what he knows to be false, is to say that he is a deceiver, which is certainly the highest reflection that can be thrown upon an historian: Whereas superstition, which is the imputation in the other case, is a mere human frailty, and affects his character very little. Having premised this, we shall go on to speak of these ominous appearances which are recorded by the ancients, as predicting the fall of Thebes. Diodorus tells us, that in the temple of Ceres, a slender spider's web was observed to spread itself as broad as a cloak, and to represent the rainbow in an arched circumference; upon this deputies were sent to consult the oracle at Delphi, to know what it imported. The answer was,

*This web stands as a sign from heaven confess
To thee, Boeotia, first, then to the rest.*

The oracle, in their own country, explained it thus:

One party's loss, the other's gain, this shows.

As soon as he had settled Greece in tranquillity, he went to Corinth, where, in a general assembly of the states of

This happened about three months before Alexander's march. About the time of his arrival, the statues in the forum sweated, so that great drops stood upon them. In the lake of Onchestus the roaring and bellowing of oxen was heard. The waters in Dirce seemed of a sanguine hue; and advice came from the temple of Delphi, that the roof built by the Thebans, out of the spoils of the Phocians, was besmeared all over with blood. Such, continues our author, as studied the explanation of these things gave it as their opinion, that the web portended the retreat of the gods from their city; its having the colour of the rain-bow, various troubles and dissensions; the appearance of sweat signified extreme miseries; and the smeared roof of the temple, that the city would be stained with slaughter and bloodshed: they therefore concluded, that the Thebans ought to have sought an agreement, and not to have urged all things to extremity (1). But they, it seems, were not to be moved; for when Alexander demanded only Phœnix and Prothyes, who had occasioned the murder of his officers, to be delivered up, they sent him word, he should send them Antipater and Philotas (2). Thus they in a manner sought their own destruction. The circumstances attending the sack of this city, are most exactly recorded by Arrian, who, tho' in the general, a very succinct writer, expatiates on this subject, and shews, that it was the most terrible destruction that any state ever sustained to that time; concluding his description thus: "They are reported to have been " forewarned of this great and tremendous subversion of their " city, by sundry prodigies from heaven, which they all along
" disregarded, till afterwards the events recalling them to their
" remembrance, they were forced to own them fulfilled (3)." This author is frequently cited as a person disregarding omens, and having a slender opinion of all sorts of miracles; yet this notion of him seems to be rashly taken up. He does indeed mention them more sparingly than Diodorus or Plutarch; and the reason is clear, because he was a closer writer, and extremely careful of straying from his subject; yet, on particular occasions, he records both omens and prodigies, without any tokens, that we can perceive, of disbelief or disrespect; but rather the contrary, as the reader may perceive from the passage just cited. Thus much we thought ourselves obliged to say in regard to truth; for as to the credibility of these things, we meddle not with that matter here. The facts themselves either happened, or did not happen; if they happened, and were held ominous, an historian ought not to be blamed for recording them or their interpretations. They are so many points laid before us, which we may consider as long as we will, and on which we may decide at last as we please.

Greece, every thing relating to his dignity as generalissimo was exactly settled. Here he received the compliments, not only of the several states, but also of the most eminent persons among the Greeks, either for valour or wisdom, many of whom thought it not below them to travel a considerable space for this purpose <sup>c</sup>; but Diogenes of Sinope, who was then in Cranium, a suburb of Corinth, did not so much as wait upon the king; which when it was remarked to Alexander, he went himself to visit the philosopher. He found him, as his manner was, lying on the ground, basking himself in the sun. When those who attended the king surrounded him, the sage raised himself a little, and looked upon Alexander. The king with his usual civility, asked him, if he wanted any thing? Yes answered Diogenes, I would have you stand a little out of the way, that I may enjoy the sun-shine. Those who were about Alexander laughed at this saying, as the effect of a haughty and morose disposition; but the king himself said gravely, If I was not Alexander, I could wish to be Diogenes, the sense of which, as it is interpreted by Plutarch, was, that if he had not been capable of philosophising actively, he would have preferred speculative wisdom to the ordinary employments of life <sup>u</sup>. This is certainly a very noble, if it be not the just, sense of Alexander's words. Certain it is, that we ought always to consider carefully the sayings transmitted to us by the antients, lest we should reject a diamond for a pebble, merely for want of knowing how to divest it of its coat. When the assembly at Corinth broke up, the king returned with his army into Macedonia.

AT Ægæ he held a grand council of state and of war, in His preparations for order to advise about his expedition into Asia. The gravest of his counsellors, among whom were Antipater and Parmenio, gave it as their opinion, that he should first marry, and have heirs to the crown, before he thought of any foreign expedition. Alexander disliked this, as indeed he did every motion of delay; but, however, he did not reject it without offering a reason. He said, that after Greece had elected him her general, and he had drawn together that veteran army, which, under his father, had made so many conquests, he should not sit down idle at home, marry, and beget children <sup>w</sup>. He therefore sacrificed to Jupiter Olympius, and revived the games which had been instituted by his predecessor Archelaus. He sacrificed likewise to the muses, consecrating a day to each muse ; then he appointed mighty feasts, entertaining no less than a hundred of his friends at his own table, after which he distributed all the crown-lands amongst them, and even the rest of his revenues, giving one a farm, another a village, a third the customs of a port. Perdiccas, observing this waste of the royal revenue, in which he refused to participate, asked the king, What he reserved for himself ? My hopes, answered Alexander. Very well, Sir, replied Perdiccas, you will not then take it amiss, that among those who are to share your dangers, there are some who desire to share your hopes also *.
